THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

The Education of the People is a subject which has never yet received from society the attention which its vast importance demands. From time to time an effort is made to awaken interest in it. The effort succeeds; and the press teems with books, pamphlets, and leading articles, in which it is considered under all its various aspects. Statesmen speak upon it, prison inspectors bear fearful testimonies to its necessity, benevolent men urge it upon the attention of the Government, and the various religious communities loudly express their conviction of its paramount importance. Then the subject is allowed to drop; or is elbowed out of notice by the more pressing demands of such questions as affect the stability of administrations or the majorities or minorities of Parliamentary parties. For thirty years or upwards this has been the history of the most important question of the age. Every year, however, has increased the interest taken in it. Every agitation of it has tended to redouble the efforts of the friends of the cause: and year after year, the number of schools supported by voluntary contributions, for the education of the children of the poor, has been augmented in a ratio which has borne splendid testimony to the liberality, as well as the true philanthropy of the great mass of the English people. Unfortunately, however, all their exertions, noble as they have been, have not kept pace with the necessities of the population. School-houses sufficiently numerous and ample to accommodate the whole number of children in Great Britain of an age to require instruction may have been built; but there the advantage has, in too many instances, been suffered to

DEATH OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.—(SEE PAGE 3.)

"It is my duty to offer up my life;" and he was heard requently to repeat o himself, "Bonus autem pastor dat vitam suam pro ovibus suis."—Words of the Archbishop

Secure at home, there sat a calm, good man,
Of mind capacious, but of larger heart,
Fill'd with rapt thought and prayer, and now
O'er universal Christendom his eye
Hath gazed in meditation vast and deep,
Ay, from its Church on earth to Heaven above
And he hath form'd blest plans of hope and peace,
Of sober liberty, fraternal love!
When, lo! fierce sounds of mortal rage come nigh,
And arms are clashing in the deadly fray;
The cannon's roar proclaims the deathful scene.
Adown the street the bloody torrents flow.
Malice, and hate, and envy do their worst.
"And these are Christians! these are brethren too,
And I their chief!"—so thought that mind serene—
"And on the morrow will the widow's wail
And orphan's cry reproach my saddened heart."

Hark! there's a moment's pause; the cannon's force
Is held awhile, the dripping sword is stay'd,
The musket, with its bayonet, cease their work,
And all would parley with the calm good man;
For apparition more divinely bright
Ne'er could be offer'd to their mortal view,
Save had an angel step'd upon the earth.
Oh! list the speech of that mild white-robed chief
"'Tis writ, the shepherd for his sheep should die,
And I am ready"—ay, with gentleness
Within his heart, and on his glowing tongue
The words of peace, in sacred martyrdom
Unto the holiest cause that e'er engaged
The mind of man, of angel, e'en of Christ—
His aged frame hath sought its hallow'd sleep.
Noble Archbishop! thou art gone to take
Love's living station 'mid the mightiest dead,
And all must feel that sympathy for thee
Which thou erst felt for all the sons of men,
And most for those the guiltiest in wrath,
And in most impious league too madly joined
Against the social happiness of man.
Noble Archbishop! one whose sacred lore
Whose exposition of the Sacred page,
And even prayer, agreeth not with thine,
Still admiration's grateful tribute pours
For all that meekness, goodness, and true joy,
That like a sunbeam mildly lit thy soul,
And did disarm of all their victory
Death and the grave! O guilty France!
Once beautiful, and honest, and most dear.
O France! bow down thy foul and guilty head,
Let deep repentance settle on thy brow;
Weep burning tears of grief—then canst not cheer
The widow's heart, nor dry the orphan's tear
With money'd pension, or big-swelling words
In praise of him who ne'er can aid them more, inclined, and others with menace in their features and in their language. By zeal which can readily be understood, the combatants on the side of order could not reconcile it to themselves to see the Archbishop thus exposed to the rage of men who had on that very day murdered some persons who had been sent to parley with them. They, therefore, neglected the request of the prelate, and advanced, and were thus face to face with their enemies. Reproaches and threats were exchanged, and personal struggles took place, the disastrous consequences of which the ecclesiastics sought to prevent in the name of religion, and of the prelate who came there to stop the effusion of blood, to save those who had taken up arms, and their wives and children.
Or shield them from a cold unfeeling world—
The husband, father, brother, lost in death!

The Author of "Harbut Shorktop."

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS.

During these altercations, which for some time delayed the accomplishment of the holy mission, a musket was fired; but it is not known on which side, or whether it was by accident or intentionally. In an instant a cry of 'Treason! treason!' arose on all sides; the combatants retired, and the firing became more severe than ever. The worthy Archbishop was thus placed between two fires. he showed no alarm; he never thought of escaping to the right or left. He advanced towards the barricade, and still accompanied by his Vicars-General, he mounted it and reached the summit. He was thus in view of both parties. The balls whistled round him, but at this time appeared to respect him. One of his attendants had three balls through his hat. The mediator showed himself, and what voice could be more eloquent than his heroic opposition! What thanks ought to fall on the head of the prelate, thus offering and giving his blood and his life to the people entrusted to his care! What glory also both for him and for the faith which inspires it! But his sacrifice was to be completed. He came down from the Calvary where death had spared him, and had scarcely descended a few steps when he fell pierced in the loins by a ball which appeared to have come from a window at the side. A faithful servant who followed him, unknown to his master, endeavoured to catch him in his arms, but was himself wounded in the side. Let us, however, render justice to every one: the insurgents ran to his assistance, and carried him to the Hospital of the Quinze Vingts, and placed a guard over him. They procured the signatures of all present to attest that he was not shot by the persons to whom he had first spoken, and they appeared very anxious to have this point clearly stated.

The news of the event soon spread through the faubourg, and produced an extraordinary sensation. In an hour afterwards the firing ceased, not to recommence. The Christian calmness and serenity which induced and sustained the conduct of the Archbishop never left him. On his Vicar-General, M. Jacquemet rejoining him, the Archbishop begged him, as a friend, to tell him what he thought of his condition. 'Is my wound serious?' 'It is very much so.' 'Is my life in danger?' 'It is.'—Well, then,' replied the Archbishop, 'let God be praised, and may He accept the sacrifice which I again offer Him for the salvation of this misguided people. May my death expiate the sins which I have committed during my episcopacy.' His afterwards confessed, and received the sacrament of extreme unction, preserving throughout his severe sufferings all his presence of mind, and expressing a satisfaction full of simplicity and grandeur at having accomplished what he called his duty. 'Life is so short,' he often repeated, 'and the term which still remained to me could have been but short: I have sacrificed little for God, for the men created in his image, and repurchased with his blood.'

"On Monday morning he was carried to his Palace; and, as he passed through the streets, the people all fell on their knees with a feeling of veneration. He was escorted to his residence by a party of the Garde Mobile. The countenance of one of those gallant youths particularly struck him, as he had seen him fighting, and, after having received a wound in the head, wrest a sabre from the hand of his assailant. He beckoned him to approach, and, having still strength enough to raise his arms, he detached a small crucifix which he wore suspended round his neck, and gave it to the young hero, saying, 'Never part with this cross—place it near your heart; it will bring you happiness.' The young man, whose name is François Delavrignère, of the 7th company of the 4th battalion, joined his hands in an attitude of prayer, and swore to preserve for ever the precious souvenir of the venerable dying prelate."

The good Archbishop died shortly after his arrival at his Palace, in the Ile St. Louis, blessing all around, and praying to God that his blood might be the last shed under such circumstances.

On Thursday the post mortem examination of the Archbishop of Paris was made by Drs. Gueneau de Mussy and Vignolot, in the presence of several other members of the faculty. The ball was found to have penetrated into the right side of the lumbar region. It had followed an oblique direction, and coming in contact with the lower vertebræ, fractured them, and then went again in an upward direction, and lodged in the muscles of the left loin, wounding all the vessels adjoining.

On Sunday the body lay in state, in a Chapelle Ardente, at the Palace, arrayed in the Archiepiscopal robes, with the insignia of his sacred office around it. The picquet of honour was formed of a detachment of the Artillery of the National Guard. The Mint could scarcely strike off a sufficient number of medals representing the venerable Prelate. The members of the clergy (twelve in number) in constant attendance, when required, blessed the medals, and placed them in contact with the hands of the illustrious deceased.

Prayers were offered up for the repose of the soul of this eminent divine at several of the Roman Catholic chapels in London, on Monday. He was a contributor to the funds for the erection of St. George's new Roman Catholic Church, and was to have been present at its opening on Tuesday. The late Archbishop of Paris, Monseigneur Affré, was born on the 28th of September, 1793, and was, consequently, in his 55th year.

GENERAL NEGRIER.

Of the twelve or fourteen general officers who were put hors de combat, either as killed or wounded, during the late four days' battle in the streets of Paris, the fate of none has excited so much unfeigned sympathy and regret as that of General Negrier. His noble countenance, his gallant and dignified bearing, the urbanity of his manners, his honourable character, and his great personal bravery, combined to make him an universal favourite, not only amongst the large circle of his more immediate acquaintance, but also in the National Assembly, of which he was a member, and in which, at the time of his death, he filled the office of Questor. He was born in Portugal of French parents, and during the occupation of the Peninsula by the French, under the Empire, Marshal Lannes, who took a strong interest in young Negrier, sent him to France under the care of his Aide-de-Camp, General Subervie, who was lately Minister of War in the Provisional Government. Having entered the army, he rose through the various subordinate ranks to that of General of Division, his promotion being well earned by active services in the field.

When the desperate character of the late insurrection—which has spread desolation so widely over the face of society in France—became fully understood, General Negrier, with that devotion which was so characteristic of him, immediately offered his services in defence of order, and at various points, during the sanguinary conflict, obtained the most signal success over the anarchists. On Sunday evening (the 25th ult.), at the head of a detachment of troops of the line and a body of National Guards—having carried all before him, amidst frightful carnage, in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel de Ville—barricade after barricade having been taken in rapid succession—he proceeded by the Quays towards the Faubourg St. Antoine, to operate against the insurgents, who were strongly posted at the farther entrance of the Rue St. Antoine. He advanced at the head of his men, and when he had got in front of the barricade which defended the entrance to the faubourg, he was struck by a ball which killed him on the spot. General Charbonnel, also a member of the National Assembly, was mortally wounded by his side.

General Negrier was by no means rich, and he has left a widow and two children unprovided for, as far as regards any property at his disposal; but his country has not been unmindful of his services. The National Assembly has taken care that the family of this brave soldier shall not be exposed to want. By a decree of Thursday, the 29th ult., in addition to the pension of 1600 francs (£60) a year, to which his widow has become entitled by his death, the Assembly has made her a grant of 3000 francs (£120) a year, reversible to the two children (a son and daughter—the latter married), half to each. By the same decree, his son, nineteen years of age, who had enlisted as a volunteer in the 7th Regiment of the Line, was promoted to the rank of Sub-Lieutenant; and it was also ordered that the General's heart should be deposited in the Invalides, at Paris, and his body taken to the city of Lisle, which claimed it.

The state defrayed the expenses of his obsequies: the funeral service was performed on Saturday morning last, in the church of St. Gervais. General Perrot and several other general officers, and a number of the members of the National Assembly were present. Detachments of the National Guards, both of Paris and the departments, of the Line, and the Garde Mobile, escorted the body to the terminus of the Northern Railway, whence it was taken to Lisle.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS LYING IN STATE

PRINCIPAL GATEWAY OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S COLLEGE, CANTERBURY.

CONSECRATION OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S COLLEGE, CANTERBURY.

THE fine old City of Canterbury was, on Thursday week (the 29th ult.), the scene of an event of immediate interest to every member of the Christian community, as well as of prospective importance to far distant lands, whereon the spirit of our holy religion has not yet shed its beneficent light. Such was the consecration of the new College of St. Augustine, which has just been reared upon the site of the magnificent abbey dedicated by the piety of our ancestors to that Saint. The locality has been for ages hedged, as it were, with divinity. Twelve centuries and a half have rolled away since Augustine and his forty companions, nigh upon this very spot, met the incredulous King Ethelbert, chanting the Litany, and praying earnestly for the Divine blessing and protection :—

"For ever be this morning fair;
Blest be the unconscious shore on which ye tread,
And blest the silver cross which ye instead
Of martial banner in procession bear;
The Cross preceding Him who floats in air—
The pictured Saviour! By Augustine led,
They come; and onward travel without dread,
Chanting in barbarous ears a tuneful prayer.
Sung for themselves, and those whom they would free!
Rich conquest waits them. The tempestuous sea
Of ignorance that ran so rough and high,
And heeded not the voice of clashing swords,
Those good men humble by a few bare words,
And calm with fear of God's divinity." —Wordsworth.

The Abbey has flourished and fallen in this long interval; but its church is now the cathedral of Canterbury. Though the structure is of date long subsequent to the age of Augustine, it retains its original consecration; "and venerable as the fabric appears to the eye, it acquires a greater title to our respect, when we recollect how long the spot has been hallowed by the worship of the Lord." How auspicious, then, is such a site for the new foundation, seeking to become "a humble instrument in the hands of God and the Church for the encouragement of sound learning, for the promotion of religion, and for the dissemination of Christian truth." Such is the New College at Canterbury, devoted to the training and educating of clergy for missionaries in the service of the Church of England, to the dependencies of the British Empire.

The institution, which is incorporated by Royal Charter, is founded on the general plan of the universities. It will be governed by a warden and a sub-warden, who is to be a master of arts in priest's orders; and there are to be six fellows, to whom will be entrusted, under the superintendence of the warden, the instruction and tuition of the students. The officers of the college are all to be appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London, for the time being, and with those bishops, selection and appointment will exclusively rest. The office of visitor will appertain to the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being.

The candidates for admission into the College will not, under ordinary circumstances, be eligible under eighteen, nor above twenty-two years of age; and they must belong to the Church of England, show certificates of their religious and moral character, and will be subjected to an examination previous to being admitted. The course of instruction will be completed in three years, and the expense to each student will not exceed £30 per annum.

The spot in the city of Canterbury appropriated to the College is the site of the once famous Monastery of St. Augustine; and the only remaining portion of the monastic buildings, the beautiful entrance gateway, has been with great taste and judgment brought into the plan of the College as its entrance. In our first view of the College, this fine specimen of ancient architecture has a prominent object, its embattled towers and exquisite ornaments rendering it a very striking feature. In the A View also are shown portions of the dining-hall and kitchen, the chapel, and next to it the students' and fellows' apartments.

The buildings form a quadrangle in plan, and are of very interesting design The walls are of flint, with colons and dressings of rag-stone; and the style is [illegible] decorated of the fourteenth century.

The apartments for the students are all alike in arrangement They are each 11 feet by 8 feet 6 inches, and lighted by a mullioned window of [illegible] small rooms. The furniture consists of an iron bedstead, a neatly [illegible] washland-stand, a fixed table, having on one side drawers for clothes and on the other a drawer for writing materials, and above the table shelves for books are fastened to the wall; an elbow chair, and two others, complete, the furniture The rooms are well ventilated. On the same level with the building containing the students' apartments, but at right angles with it, is the library, a very elegant pile, 78 feet in length by 39 feet wide. It stands upon ten pillars forming a crypt, with a centre and two side aisles of equal width, paved with red tiles; and this crypt it is intended to use as a museum. A flight of fifteen steps, in a porch lighted by four windows, forms the approach to the library. The apartment is a very noble one, and is lighted by thirteen windows, each divided by mullions and transoms into four lights, the heads being finished in [illegible] heads, and trefoils filling the heads of the windows; the windows are ranged six on each side of the room, and a large one is at the north end; and this contains [illegible] glass representing St. Peter, Paul, and Augustine.

Descending from the raised walk in front of the cloister and library, the chapel attracts attention, the entrance being beneath a porch by a flight of fifteen steps. At the head of the stairs is a very elegant window, containing a representation of Ethelbert in stained glass, and over the entrance is a corresponding window, having, in stained glass, the figure of Bertha, Ethelbert's Queen. The interior of the chapel is of admirable character, and has stalls and seats of oak. The stalls are sixty-four in number, with miserieords. A library stool is placed in the centre of the floor

The windows, all containing stained glass, are of different designs. The east window displays figures of St. John the Baptist, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory, several subjects from Scripture; and, in five trefoils in the head of the [illegible] angels playing on different instruments. The north window [illegible] prophets, and s[illegible] in it; the north contains figures [illegible] apostles, besides subjects from Holy Writ; and the west window, which is [illegible] headed, has thirteen subjects from the life of St. Peter and Paul, in it The roof is open timber-work. The chapel is about 60 feet long, 17 feet 6 inches wide, and 30 feet high, with a [illegible] below it; and we must not omit mentioning, it is paved with red tiles of [illegible] patterns. The dining-hall is a very spacious anartm[illegible], being about 60 feet long by 36 feet wide.

The warder's house contains handsome drawing- and drawing-rooms, a study, and eight bedrooms, with offices. The warder is the Right Rev Bishop Coleridge, and the sub-warder the Rev. Mr. Pearson.

The whole of the buildings have been designed and carried out by Mr. W. Butterfield, of Adam-street, Adelphi.

The site of the College was purchased and given by A. J. B. Hope, Esq., M.P. for Maidstone, and, in addition to presenting a very large donation to the general fund, the same gentleman has most munificently defrayed the entire cost of erecting the chapel.

One of our representations of the College shows the entrance gateway, as we before mentioned; another, the interior of the quadrangle, displaying the long [illegible] and in which are the cloisters and apartments for the students, the [illegible] and a massive picturesquely designed well or [illegible] in the centre of the quadrangle, the gift of J. C. Thorpe, Esq.; the third gives the interior of the cloisters; and for the initial letter we have employed the handle to the bell at the entrance-gate.

The ceremony of consecrating the new institution took place on Thursday week; when there was present a very large assemblage of the dignitaries of the Church and of the inferior Clergy, besides many ladies and gentlemen, who, as members of the Church, evinced a laudable anxiety for her prosperity

His Grace the Lord Primate arrived by an early railway train. Amongst the nobility, clergy, and gentry present were the Bishop of London, Oxford, Brechin, Lichfield, Colchester; the Deans of Canterbury, Hereford, Chichester; Archdeacons Thorpe, Manning, Harrison, Merriman; the Warden of Winchester College [illegible] Dr. Jelf, Preb. of King's College, London; Dr. Pearson [illegible] ly, Dodsworth, Wordsworth, Russell, Spry; the [illegible] Thynne; Lord C. Thynne, J. B. Murray, G. Wall [illegible] Bowdler, W. J. Chambers, J. Mills, T. L. Donaghue, Ernest Hewkins, [illegible] ford, T. Bloomfield, W. Vallance; the Earl of Powis, Earl Nelson; [illegible] Beresford Hope, Esq., the founder; Mr. Justice Patteson; [illegible] Oxbridge, Baron Alderson; W. Forbes, Esq.; C. Fuller, Esq., [illegible] Bowden, Esq.; G. [illegible]

Right reverend the Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by the Bishops and [illegible], proceeded to the College Chapel, where the ceremony of consecra[illegible] and rende[illegible] of the usual morning service in the Co[illegible] had been [illegible] ve[illegible] en the doors were opened, and every [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] unanimously filled

At the conclusion of the service the Archbishop left he throne, and preceded by the vergers and clergy, entered the pulpit. His Grace selected for his text Psalm cxi. 10, "To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known, by the Church, the manifold wisdom of God."

The Archbishop divided the discourse into three parts: first, the meaning of the manifold wisdom of God; secondly, his Grace illustrated the proposition by referring to that spiritual regeneration which arises from the paternal supervision of God over his creatures; and, thirdly, he showed that the Church was the medium through which that spiritual regeneration was administered and maintained

At the close of his eloquent discourse, the Archbishop said—"Persons brought up at this institution, like the Apostle of old, will go forth with the authority of the Church, and with a zeal becoming their high mission. They will carry the Word of God to the Heathen. The occasion reminded him of that passage in our history when, in consequence of the natives of this island, England was relieved from heathen darkness by those pious and holy men, who, braving every difficulty, fearlessly made their way to those shores. The building then consecrated to the worship of the true God was erected more, by an act of munificence that deserved imitation, raised from its ashes." The Archbishop said that those who then heard him had but a comparatively easy day to perform, namely, to implore the Holy Spirit to bless the work that [illegible] hereby begun. The Lord Primate concluded his discourse by enforcing upon the congregation the duties incumbent upon them as members of the Church, in furtherance of the objects of so noble a foundation, for the offerings realized upwards of £900

After the services, an elegant luncheon was served to a large number of invited guests, in the crypt and cloisters of the new college. The repast was served with great taste by Messrs. Bathe and Breach, of the London Tavern During the afternoon, the visitors promenaded within the precincts of the College until the special railway train was in readiness to convey a great number of them to town.

Thus terminated an event memorable as the commencement of a great work which, by the blessing of Providence, will prove of inestimable value in many an age long to come.

THE WEATHER.

Till Tuesday, July 4, the weather was of the same unseasonable kind as that which we have lately had, the sky being almost continuously covered by cloud, rain falling frequently, and the temperature below that of the season. On Wednesday a change took place. The following are some particulars of each day:—

Wednesday, the sky was principally covered with cloud till the evening, after which it was cloudless: showers of rain were falling during the morning; the direction of the wind was S W., and at times blowing strongly; the average temperature of the air for the day was 61°. of good years, but a further diminution upon the returns of even the previous bad year. If this decrease be not checked by diminished expenditure on the one hand, or by improvement of trade leading to an increase in the returns of indirect taxation, it will, at the end of the present year, leave the country with a deficiency of upwards of a million. The only items that show an increase on the quarter over the corresponding quarter last year, are the Excise, the Crown Lands, and the Miscellaneous. On the two latter the increase is too inconsiderable to be deemed other than accidental: while on the Excise the increase is not of such a character as to inspire a wise Minister, a careful Legislature, or an anxious people, with any very confident hopes of a rapid amelioration of our financial prospects. There is an increase upon this department of £372,487 for the two quarters just ended; which is so far gratifying; but, as this department fell short last year no less than £1,093,492, it must be remembered that the increase does not, at this rate, keep pace with the necessities of the country. Upon the item of Customs there is a decrease of £71,287; of Stamps, an apparent decline of £510,436, but in reality a decline of £350,439; of the Property Tax, a decrease of £48,116; and of the Post-office, of £79,000. The last-mentioned is explained by the fact, that arrears of a payment greatly exceeding this amount were due to one of the railway companies for conveying the mails, and that the sum is not strictly chargeable upon the quarter. Hitherto, amid all the fluctuations of trade and commerce, the Post-office revenue has always shown a steady increase from quarter to quarter. It is said that the present quarter offers no exception; but that the rate of increase has been somewhat checked by the commercial depression which the whole of the civilised world is now suffering. Altogether, the returns of the revenue, though somewhat more favourable in the matter of Excise, are not so favourable as to warrant a cessation of the public vigilance over the conduct of the Ministers with respect to the estimates. The financial condition of the country is not satisfactory, and requires care as well as boldness to improve it.

The conduct pursued by General Cavaignac since the defeat of the fearful insurrection of the Communists and Red Republicans has greatly tended to restore confidence in France. The Ministry he has appointed is, generally speaking, composed of men whose talents and character inspire respect. The General himself is considered a sincere Republican—an honest, unambitious, and able man; one who will not endeavour to turn the unexampled crisis of the affairs of his country to his own personal aggrandisement, but who will zealously labour for the public good, without making it subservient to his own interests. He has settled the question of the national workshops after the only fashion left to him—that of immediate suppression. The National Assembly has, however, voted a loan of 5,000,000 francs to the contractors of building in Paris, by which means it is thought the most numerous class of operatives in the capital will be sensibly benefited; and a project of decree has been brought forward for a loan of 3,000,000 francs for the encouragement of associations of working men.

The greatest present embarrassment of the Government is the number of prisoners taken in the late insurrection. The number exceeds 8000 already, and fresh arrests are made every day; and grounds of prosecution have already been established against upwards of 2000. To transport such a number of men would be a very expensive process. It would require a considerable fleet; and even to maintain them in prison is a grievous burden upon the diminishing resources of the Republic. It has been ascertained that upwards of 40,000 persons were under arms on the side of the insurgents, and that fully one-half of that number have been either killed or wounded, or are now in the prisons of the State, awaiting the disposal of the Executive Government. Cavaignac, imitating the policy of his predecessors in the matter of public spectacles (always dear to the hearts of the Parisians, whether the metropolitan be one of joy or grief), has ordered a grand public funeral for the victims who fell in defence of order on the four memorable days of the insurrection. The spectacle was fixed for Thursday, when the bodies were to be deposited with great pomp under the Column of July, and in the vaults beneath the Madeline.

THE REVENUE.

The Revenue returns for the year and the quarter ending July 5, 1848, which have been published during the week, do not present a very satisfactory evidence of the prosperous condition of the country.

The Year's Account shows a falling off in all the items, except "the China money;" the deficiency amounting to £2,815,096 in the whole, reduced by the China money to a net loss of £2,567,709.

The Quarter's Account is not quite so unsatisfactory. The returns, however, show a decrease in the ordinary revenue of the quarter as compared with the ordinary revenue of the corresponding quarter in 1847 by £327,741. The ordinary revenue of the quarter ending 5th April, 1848, was in excess of the ordinary revenue of the corresponding quarter in 1847 by £67,291. The ordinary revenue, therefore, of the first half-year of 1848 falls short of the ordinary revenue of the first half-year of 1847, by £260,450; whilst on the ordinary revenue of the year 1847 there was a decrease of £1,463,143, as compared with the ordinary revenue of 1846.

The only items in which ordinary revenue of the quarter shows an increase upon the corresponding quarter of 1847, are the items, the crown lands, and miscellaneous. The increase on the crown lands is £.8,000; on the miscellaneous, £31,561; and on the excise, £182,785; of which latter about £50,000 must be set down to the transference of the carriage duties from the stamps to the excise.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE Royal children take their usual open air exercise daily.

On Sunday morning the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the Domestic Household, attended divine service, in the private chapel in Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

On Monday evening her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance at the Haymarket Theatre with their presence. The Royal suite consisted of the Viscountess Jocelyn, Hon. Miss Kerr, Earl of Listowel, Major-General Wemyss, and Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour. The Duchess of Kent was also present.

On Tuesday morning the Queen rode out on horseback, accompanied by her Royal Highness Prince Albert. Her Majesty's Master of the Horse, Major-General Wemyss, Equerry in Waiting to Prince Albert, were in attendance on horseback. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback in the afternoon, attended by Lieut.-Colonel Seymour. His Royal Highness visited and minutely inspected the lodging-house for the working classes, erected by the Metropolitan Association in the Old Pancras road.

On Tuesday, his Royal Highness Prince Albert inspected Mr. Maclise's designs for a Nielle bracelet; Mr. Wyon's for a Shakspeare; Mr. Redgrave's for a paper for hanging pictures on, Messrs. Holland's arrangement chair; and other works executing for Summerly's Art Manufactures.

HER MAJESTY'S MARINE ESTABLISHMENT.—The Royal steam yacht Victoria and Albert, Captain Lord A. Fitzclarence, having undergone a thorough renovation or "overhaul," and re-embellishment, was taken from the ordinary ground to moorings lower down the harbour at Portsmouth, opposite the entrance to the Weevil Lake, on Tuesday morning, under steam, for the purpose of trying her machinery, before the ship was declared ready for sea. Her Majesty is expected to revisit the marine palace of Osborne in the Isle of Wight, which place the Queen will embark, after the prorogation of Parliament, for the annual trip to sea. The masters and pilots of the fleet are preparing for service.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTERED IN LONDON.—The number of births registered, for the week ending July 1st, were—males, 753; females, 769; total, 1552, being an increase on the preceding week of 198. The number of deaths registered to the same date were—males, 548; females, 532; total, 1100; being an increase on the preceding week of 150. The number of violent deaths during the week were 17, of which 4 were suicides. The deaths in the metropolitan hospitals were as follow:—Consumption Hospital, 1; St. George's, 13; Westminster, 4; Charing Cross, 2; Middlesex, 7; University College, 9; Royal Free, 8; Fever, 3; Small Pox, 4; King's College, 9; St. Bartholomew's, 15; London, 13; St. Thomas's, 4; Guy's 3; Dreadnought, 2. Total, 89.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Imprisonment for Debt (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Sale of Beer Bill passed through Committee, and was ordered to be reported.

The Bank Court Consolidation Bill was read a second time, and was referred to a Select Committee.

The Health of Towns Bill was also ordered to be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD ABERDEEN.—Sir A. Clifford, the Usher of the Black Rod, appeared at the bar, and informed their Lordships that he was unable to find Lord Aberdeen, charged with forgery, with a view to compelling that noble Lord's attendance before their Lordships' house. On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR the subject was ordered to be referred to a select committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The House having gone into Committee on this bill the discussion of the various items of the Government tariff was resumed.

MR. BARKLY proposed, as an amendment, that the duties now existing under the act of 1846 be continued for six years from the present time.

After a lengthened debate, Lord G. Bentinck moved that the Chairman report progress, which, on a division, was negatived by a majority of 211 to 80.

Eventually, however, the House resumed, and the Chairman reported progress and obtained leave to sit again.

The House afterwards, in Committee of Supply, voted some miscellaneous and naval estimates on account.—Adjourned.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.—On Thursday, Joseph Williams, aged 40, baker, and William John Vernon, described as a lecturer, were tried for misdemeanour. The trial lasted the whole day, and at its conclusion the jury delivered their verdict, finding Vernon guilty upon the first count of being present at an unlawful assembly and riot.

CHARGE OF OFFENCE.—On Friday George William Hewson, aged 45, was indicted for the murder of William Henry Woodhouse, one of the turnkeys of Clerkenwell Prison.—The particulars of the case, which occurred on the 10th ult., have been already given, and it is therefore sufficient to mention that the prisoner committed the crime by stabbing his victim with a knife.—The prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to death.

ROYAL MATERNITY CHARITY.—This admirable institution celebrated its anniversary on Thursday evening, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. The chair was taken by Viscount Bruckley (on the right of the Duke of Cambridge was Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., the president), who acquitted himself in his somewhat arduous office with considerable tact. The secretary, in reading the report, announced the pleasing fact that the institution was most thriving, and that the subscriptions were much more than had been anticipated.

FRANCE.

On Thursday the funeral procession of the victims of the insurrection of the 23d of June passed off without the slightest accident of any kind

M. Carnot, Minister for Public Instruction, has resigned his office to M. Vaulabelle, an undoubted, though not an ultra, Republican. M. Carnot had become most unpopular, in consequence of the publication, under his signature, of a Manuel Republicain, in which the doctrines of Socialism and Communism were advocated.

M. Dubuys, President of the Court of Appeal of Douay, had adopted the son of General Negrier.

SPAIN

THE CARLIST MOVEMENT.—Cabrera entered Spain on the 24th June, at seven o'clock in the morning, by Pié de Salinas, followed by his aide-de-camp, a numerous staff, and an escort of cavalry. He was met by Boquica, with 1000 soldiers. One of his attendants was Gonzales. The whole party appeared full of enthusiasm, and counted upon victories as a prelude to that of Charles VI.

The Opinion Publique, a Carlist paper published in Paris, contains a proclamation from Cabrera, to the Carlists everywhere resident in Spain. A letter from St. Jean de Luz, of the 1st instant says:—"The Carlists are mustering very strong between St. Sebastian and Durango, and, from all accounts, appear to be well supplied with arms and money.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—ALIENATION OF SATTARA.—A special court of proprietors of East India stock was on Wednesday held in Leadenhall-street, in pursuance of the requisition signed by nine proprietors, to take into consideration the following resolution:—"That the Honourable the East India Company having, by a treaty concluded with Pertaub Sheen, the Rajah of Sattara, on the 25th of September, 1819, ceded the territory of Sattara, in perpetual sovereignty, to the heirs, and successors, the East India Company cannot alienate the territory of Sattara from the Central heir (or Rajah Pertaubsingh Sheen) without a flagrant breach of that treaty and of public faith." Mr. Sullivan moved, and Mr. Hume, M.P., seconded the resolution, which was combated by the Hon. Chairman, who contended that it was the property of the whole race of the late ex-Rajah, who had been found a traitor; and the hon. gentleman moved as an amendment the adjournment of the court, which was ultimately carried.

WESTMINSTER REFORM SOCIETY.—On Monday a general meeting of the members of this society, whose object was to extend the franchise, and to send to parliament two representatives who advocated their principles as reformers, was held at the York House, Upper Wellington-street. Mr. W. Geeson took the chair. The minutes of the proceedings which took place at the last meeting were read; and on the question of their confirmation being put, Mr. Prest said that he wished to propose an amendment on the following grounds, that he thought it would not be prudent to confirm the minutes of the last meeting, as no notice was given to the members that at that meeting it was intended to revise and alter the general rules on which the society was founded. His amendment was, "that the society having at their meeting of the 19th ult. materially changed its principles and mode of government, without having given any previous notice thereof to the members, and as a large majority of them must have been ignorant of such intended alteration, the present meeting resolve from confirming the minutes, and convene a special meeting for the reconsideration of the alteration made in their rules and principles."—Mr. Cribb seconded the amendment, which was put and lost by a large majority. The minutes were then confirmed. Mr. Fourny thought that if the resolution which he would now propose was carried, perfect satisfaction would be afforded to all the members of the society. He moved "that a special general meeting of this society be called for Monday, the 17th of July, to reconsider the rules and principles adopted on the 19th of June." Mr. Lagram seconded the motion.—Dr. Bisset moved, and a member seconded, an amendment, that it be not entertained, which was carried, and the original motion lost. It was then agreed that 500 copies of the revised rules be printed and circulated, and a letter having been read from Sir De Lacy Evans, stating his determination to support the petition, which the meeting sent to Mr. Ludlington (M.P.), the meeting then separated.

THE WHITTINGTON CLUB.—The general meeting of members took place on Monday evening last, when the report and statement of accounts, showed the institution to be flourishing. It was unanimously resolved to abolish the entrance fee, and a large accession of members may thus be expected. Several features of interest have lately been added, among which is the holding in the drawingroom of a weekly unceremonious evening party, at which the pleasures of music, conversation, and dancing may be enjoyed.

THE GARDENERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday evening a meeting of the committee and friends of this institution, founded, in 1838, for the purpose of affording relief, by pensions during life, to aged and indigent gardeners and their widows, was held at the London Coffee-House, Ludgate-hill, for transacting general business. The report for the past year congratulated the subscribers upon the steady increase of the institution, which had during the year increased to £1000, and there being thirty-four pensioners receiving annuities, the males £16, and the females £12 each per annum. The financial statement was also very satisfactory.

CONSECRATION OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF ST. GEORGE.—This event, which was looked forward to with intense interest by the Roman Catholic population of the district and of London generally, took place on Tuesday. The church being one of the largest and most magnificent erected in England since the Reformation, for Catholic worship, every effort was made to give eclat to its opening. Great numbers of the Roman Catholic dignitaries from the Continent were invited to the ceremonial, but the troubled state of the times in their own countries prevented most of them from attending. There were present, however, the Archbishop of Trayes, the Bishops of Liege, Tournay, Chalons, and Chersonesus, with their canons and chaplains. Of the British R.C. prelates, there were present (besides Dr. Wiseman, who officiated), Drs. Brown (Liverpool), Brown (Wales), Bramy, Scott (Liverpool), Gillis (Edinburgh), Davis (Madland, Australia), Waring (eastern district), Briggs (York), Morris (Troy). There were 260 priests, together with members of the orders of Passionists, Dominicans, Cistercians, Benedictines, Franciscans, Redemptorians, and Brothers of Charity. The entire body of the church was filled with Roman Catholic laity, amongst whom were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, M.P., Lord Camoys, Lord Stafford, &c. Several distinguished members of the Protestant Church were also present. At eleven, the shops were received at the western door, and the procession formed, consisting of the Thurifer (the Hon. E. Perey), the Incense Bearer (Sir T. Acton), Acolytes (Hon. E. Stonor and Mr. Burke). The secular clergy, in soutan and surplice, two and two; the regulars, in the dresses peculiar to the different orders; and, lastly, the Bishops in their mitres and robes. Youths bearing lights and lilies preceded and followed the procession. The whole presented a most imposing coup d'œil, not the least interesting part of which to the stranger must have been the quaint costume of the regular orders. Dr. Wiseman celebrated high mass, and preached the sermon on the occasion. We had purposed giving an illustration of the most striking portion of the ceremony but are compelled to postpone it to our next Number.

OXFORD COMMEMORATION.

On Monday the procession of racing boats took place. As the various crews passed by the boat at the head of the river (Christ Church), they saluted it by tossing their oars and cheering, which was responded to by the spectators on each side of the river. There was an immense number of persons present, but the unpropitious state of the weather was a great drawback. On Tuesday the Bishop of Hereford (Dr. Hampden) preached the annual sermon on behalf of the infirmary. In the afternoon the oratorio of "The Creation" was performed in the theatre, and a ball at St. John's College took place in the evening. It was agreed by the hebdomadal board to propose that the honorary degree of D.C.L. be conferred on the following individuals: Earl of Harrowby, Baron Hugel, Sir G. Arthur, Bart.; W. E. Gladstone, M.P.; Sir G. G. Morgan, Bart.; J. Masterman, Esq., M.P.; A. J. B. Hope, Esq., M.P.; H. Hallam, Esq., the historian; W. Cotton, Esq.; and H. Layard.

On Wednesday the annual celebration of founder's and benefactors took place. Shortly before eleven the noblemen, heads of houses, doctors, professors, and proctors, met in the Common Hall, and partook of an elegant collation provided by the Vice-Chancellor, after which they formed in procession, and, preceded by the Bedels and other officials of the University, repaired to the Sheldonian Theatre, where the honorary degree of Doctor in Civil Law was conferred on the following distinguished persons:—The Earl of Harrowby, Baron Hugel, the Right Hon William Gladstone, one of the Burgesses for the University; the right Hon. Sir George Arthur, Bart., late Governor of Bombay; Sir G. Gould Morgan, Bart.; John Masterman, Esq., M.P. for the City of London; A. J. Beresford Hope, Esq., the munificent founder of St. Augustine's, Canterbury; H. Hallam, Esq., M.A., of Christ Church, the English historian of the middle ages; William Cotton, Esq., late Governor of the Bank of England, to which important post he was elected for two consecutive years, at a time of unexampled commercial difficulty; Henry Austen Layard, Esq., attached to our Majesty's embassy at Constantinople, and the discoverer of very important antiquities at Nineveh, and other ancient cities of Assyria. They were presented to the Vice-Chancellor and proctors by Joseph Hallmarck, Esq., the Regius Professor of Civil Law, who paid an elegant and appropriate compliment to each as in turn he was introduced to the authorities, and all were loudly cheered as they bowed to the Vice-Chancellor, and ascended to their respective places in the doctors' seats.

During the day there were entertainments at every college, an horticultural exhibition, concerts, the ascent of a balloon, &c., for which nothing could be more favourable than the clearness of the atmosphere.

On Thursday there were also a concert and ball, besides innumerable private parties.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

TRIAL OF THE CHARTIST LEADERS FOR SEDITION.

On Wednesday Joseph Ironsea John Fussell was placed at the bar, charged with having, in the hearing and presence of divers subjects of our Sovereign lady the Queen, uttered certain seditious and scandalous words against our said lady the Queen and her Government. The judges who presided were Lord Chief Justice Wilde, Mr. Baron Parke, and Mr. Justice Maule. The Attorney-General, in stating the case, observed that the circumstances from which the prosecution had resulted, were of such a nature that, had he hesitated to put the criminal law in operation, he should have been wanting in that high and important duty which his position invested him with. The prosecution was not instituted only and for the mere purpose of punishing the defendant at the bar, and those misguided men whose violent language was calculated to excite and delude others; it was not instituted only as a warning to those who were likely to be the victims of the conduct of such men, but to show and to convince the public and all well-disposed members of society that the law was strong enough to vindicate itself strong enough to maintain the peace of the country; and that the general state of the country should not be one of continual alarm and excitement. Three distinct charges were embodied in the several counts of the indictment. The first six charged him with having delivered a seditious speech; a further count charged him with having been present at an unlawful assembly, and the eighth count charged him with having taken part in a riot; and therefore the charge upon which the defendant was arraigned was a misdemeanour, and which he would have to answer, would be a threefold one—sedition, unlawful assembly with others, and riot. The meeting the defendant attended, and at which he uttered the seditious words, took place on the 25th of May, on Clerkenwell-green, after seven o'clock in the evening; an hour selected, no doubt, to produce some degree of excitement in the minds of the persons assembled. That meeting took place by private arrangement; it was held without any previous notice, and it was attended by near upon four thousand persons [illegible] and in fact ran there were some eighteen or [illegible] and which he would have to answer, would be a threefold one—sedition, unlawful assembly with others, and riot. The meeting the defendant attended, and at which he uttered the seditious words, took place on the 25th of May, on Clerkenwell-green, after seven o'clock in the evening; an hour selected, no doubt, to produce some degree of excitement in the minds of the persons assembled. That meeting took place by private arrangement; it was held without any previous notice, and it was attended by near upon four thousand persons [illegible] and in fact ran there were some eighteen or [illegible] the defendant at the bar, a person named Will[illegible] taking part in these transactions. The learned gentleman having then read the several counts from the defendant's speech, on which he grounded the charge of sedition, called evidence in support of that charge and of the others. On the conclusion of the case for the prosecution,

Mr. Sergeant Allen addressed the jury for the defence, and having presented some evidence,

The Chief Justice summed up, and the jury, after deliberating about a quarter of an hour, found the defendant guilty upon those counts charging him with sedition, and attending an unlawful assembly, and acquitted him of the count charging a riot.

The defendant was immediately ordered into custody of the Governor of Newgate.—Judgment postponed.

IRELAND.

STATE PROSECUTIONS.

On Monday, at the Commission Court, the City of Dublin Grand Jury found true bills against Mr. Devin Reilly, on a charge of drinking and toasting. The indictment is founded upon words spoken by Mr. Reilly at a meeting in Jamestreet, on the Sunday previous to the trial of Mr. Mitchel. Mr. Reilly, on Tuesday, having pleaded "not guilty" to the indictment, his solicitor applied to have the trial postponed, to enable Mr. Reilly's counsel to prepare a request was so far complied with as to place the case at the bottom of the list. The trials of the persons charged with violating the Drilling and Training Act were proceeded with on Tuesday. The jury came out three times to take the judges' opinion as to the act. It was supposed that they would have finally disagreed, but the result was very different. At half-past four they found the parties guilty; and the sentence was, Gogarty, the chief, to be transported for seven years, English to be imprisoned for two years, and the others for twelve months. All the prisoners were strongly recommended to mercy.

The little boy who carried the tricolour at the Donnybrook meeting traversed in prison.

The proprietor of the National Guard was tried for having created a nuisance and obstruction of the public way, by posting up his publication on his shop windows. He was acquitted.

THE CLUBS.—It is generally asserted that the formation of Repeal Clubs does not find favour in the eyes of the majority of Roman Catholic bishops, and that the following declaration, which has been published, is directed against the Club movement. At a meeting of prelates held in the College of Maynooth, on Wednesday, the 28th of June, 1848, it was agreed that the following resolutions be republished. Extract from the minute of the proceedings of the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops of Ireland, assembled at the Episcopal-house, Marlborough-street, Dublin, on the 28th of June, 1834, the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Archbishop of Dublin, in the chair:—"Resolved—That our object in meeting is for the purpose of holding therein any public meeting, except in cases connected with charity or religion, and that we do hereby pledge ourselves to carry this resolution into effect, under the sanction of our sacred office. That we do not intend to interfere with the civil rights of those intrusted to our care, yet, as guardians of religion, justly apprehending that its general interests, as well as the happiness of the people, would be compromised by a deviation from the line of conduct which we marked out for ourselves, and impressed upon the minds of our clergy in our pastoral address of the year 1830; we do hereby pledge ourselves, on every respective occasion, to exert the full influence of the instructions we then addressed to them, and to recommend to them most earnestly to avoid in future any allusion at their altars to political subjects. We likewise deem it to refrain from connecting themselves with political clubs, being as chairmen or secretaries at political meetings, or moving or seconding resolutions on such occasions, in order that we exhibit ourselves in all things in the character of ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the mysteries of God. † D. MURRAY, Archbishop." The meeting at Maynooth College was attended by fourteen bishops, including the Most Rev. Dr. Crolly, Dr. C. Tynan; Archbishop Derry; Dr. Rowe, Bishop of Derry; Dr. Ryan, Limerick; Dr. Haly, Kildare and Leighlin; Dr. Denvir, Down and Connor; Dr. M'Gettigan, Raphoe; and Dr. J. P. Brown, Elphin.

THE "PEACE" NEWSPAPER.—Another newspaper has been the arrest of Mr. Martin Burke, editor of the Peace newspaper. A number of policemen went to search the office, on Tuesday, to inquire after the object of their search, but he was not to be found. Mr. Martin has gone until the present commission is over.

ORANGE PROCESSIONS.—The Orangemen marched in great numbers on Saturday, July 1st. At Armagh, Market-hill, Banbridge, Warrenpoint, and various other places, the "anniversary" was celebrated with more than ordinary eclat. In Enniskillen the Roman Catholics gathered their forces, but did not march. The stipendiary of the district intervened, and they separated quietly.

THE CONSTABULARY.—The constabulary will, for the present, consist of 10,678 effective men, and will be officered by 35 county, and 262 sub-inspectors of three classes, and 370 Lord constables of two classes.

RELIEF FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.—The landowners in the baronies of [illegible] county Meath, have come a second time to the relief of the unemployed labourers in their district. A list has been made out; [illegible] 20 acres of land, one labourer shall be employed for a month, or less; an arrangement which will absorb the entire class of the unemployed. The landowners acted with similar spirit and liberality on the commencement of the famine in 1846.

THE QUEEN'S STATE BALL.

SKETCHED BY PERMISSION OF HER MAJESTY.

THE PICTURE GALLERY AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—THE COMPANY ARRIVING.

We have, upon several occasions of state and ceremony, presented to our readers Illustrations of the interior splendour of Buckingham Palace. But, in no instance have our Artists possessed opportunities for insuring accuracy, such as they have been honoured with for their present object—to convey an adequate idea of the superb decoration, as well as the brilliant effect of the company at a State Ball. For this facility, the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS are deeply indebted to the condescension of HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN, who has most graciously been pleased to permit their Artists to enjoy the privilege of access to the State Rooms, as well as to witness the State Ball of Wednesday last—for the purpose of making the Drawings requisite for the accompanying pair of Illustrations.

On such festive occasions as State Balls, the suite of State Apartments in the centre of the Palace are thrown open. These apartments comprise the Picture Gallery, which, placed in the centre of the building, extends nearly the whole length of it, and into which the State Ball-room, the Yellow Drawing-room, and Saloon communicate, on the side overlooking the garden; whilst, on the other side, or that looking into the quadrangle, the Throne-room and Green Drawingroom have communication with the Gallery. From the Green Drawingroom the Grand Staircase is reached, through a small lobby. The Dining-room, in which supper is laid, opens into the Ball-room; and at the other end of the suite of apartments—that is, from the Yellow Drawingroom—the Queen's Closet opens. A second Staircase, called "the Ambassadors'," is at the end of the Picture Gallery.

The Views which we have the pleasure to present to our readers display the PICTURE GALLERY and the STATE BALL-ROOM; and we now give our descriptive as well as pictorial account of the regal splendour of the apartments.

THE PICTURE GALLERY

The Picture Gallery [illegible] and fifty-four [illegible] The walls [illegible] In the middle, on either side, are boldly projecting and decorated doorways, opening into the Saloon and Green Drawingroom respectively. These doorways are supported on each side by terminal figures; in arched panels over the doors are emblematic groups, and above the whole are Regal crowns resting on scroll foliage, of rich design; whilst sceptres issuing from the foliage, and urns filled with flowers, add to the general richness. At the northern end of the Gallery is a doorway of similar general character, though wider, which, as we before noticed, opens to the Ambassadors' Staircase; in the panel over the door is a clock, and above is a gallery, which during State Dinners is occupied by musicians, but on ball nights is filled with choice flowers.

At the southern end of the Gallery, which differs from the northern in [illegible] desiderate of a grand doorway, though [illegible] the Ball-room, Ist ing-room, &c., a temporary stage is erected [illegible] steps of which a magnificent display of flowers is arranged; and in the fire places, of which there are four in the [illegible] of the choicest colours and perfumes [illegible] The [illegible] to marble, and are supported by [illegible] whilst in medallions over the centre [illegible] Leonardo da Vinci, &c. have guilloche patterns wrought on them; and the pendants are square [illegible], with roses in sunken panels in them, whilst traces ornament the [illegible]. The terminations of the pendants are wrought into flowers. In the angular panels in the spandrils, roses and floral enr[illegible] are introduced. The spandrils of the arches between the pendants [illegible] of them, in very high relief, a phœnix, with wings displayed. The [illegible] larger than the side ones, an arched coving rising above the cornice over the arches; and this is divided into eighteen panels, each ornamented with a Cupid, terminating in scroll foliage. The divisions are marked by an acanthus leaf; from them beams stretch across the open part of the roof, dividing it into the same number of compartments as the coving, and these are filled with lantern lights of ground glass. Running down by the sides of the opening is a gilded glory; and guilloche patterns, gilded, fill up the [illegible]ams and other moulded portions of the decorative work. The ground colour [illegible]nels wrought with foliage is deep blue; and other polychromatic tints [illegible] employed to increase the richness of the ceiling. The doors are of mahogany, [illegible]h large panels of looking-glass in the lower parts of them, and mouldings of carved-work, gilded, and of ormolu; whilst in the upper portions are crowns, surrounded by stars within circles, beautifully carved and gilded. The pictorial treasures in this gallery are of great beauty and extreme value, comprising exquisite specimens of the Dutch, Flemish, and other schools; with three pictures by Sir Joshua Reynolds the "Cymon," "Death of Dido," and his own portrait. The specimens of the works of Claude, Teniers, Rembrandt, Mieris, De Hooge, Vandyke, Rubens, Paul Potter, &c., are some of the finest in existence, and form a truly regal gallery of artistic beauties. The gallery is lighted by four chandeliers of gilded brass of great decorative richness, each bearing thirty-six lights.

THE STATE BALL-ROOM.

The State Ball-room is a very handsome apartment, though too small for its purpose. As we mentioned before, it is on the western side of the Palace, and is entered from the south-west end of the Picture Gallery, and also from the Saloon. The apartment may be said to be divided into two portions, one, the chief part of the room, and the other a lesser portion, within which the orchestra gallery is erected. The apartment is divided on its several sides into three compartments, by coupled three-quarter columns of the Corinthian order, carrying a highly-enriched entablature; and from that springs a very deep coving, and thence the ceiling, which is flat; we should observe, however, that the ceiling is not coved on all four sides, but only on the longer sides, the spaces between the entablature and flat ceiling at the northern and southern ends of the room being filled up with rich foliage-work and bas reliefs. The columns are scagliola in imitation of porphyry, and the capitals are gilded, as are all the decorations and enrichments of the entablature. From the entablature sweeping up the coving, spring large acanthus leaves in pairs to correspond to the columns, terminating in brackets, whence beams, having small flowers in panels on their soffits, stretch across the flat part of the ceiling. The squares formed by the intersections of the beams are filled [illegible], containing star-formed mouldings radiating from centres, holding [illegible] form, surrounded by richly-wrought borders, within [illegible] the points of the great stars curving down, and floral ornaments filling the spaces between them. The long panels between the beams forming the squares on the ceiling are filled with fan-mouldings, or hollowed spaces in regular lines. Stars are at the squares at the terminations of the acanthus leaves; and between [illegible] rose-formed flowers in sunken panels. A ridge of small acanthus foliage terminates the coving; and in each compartment of the latter are twenty-four sunken panels of octagonal form, containing flowers of great richness within them; the egg and tongue ornament enriching the mould [illegible] panels; and at the angles of the latter, small lozenges, containing flower-shaped ornaments, are introduced. All the decorated enrichments of the ceiling are gilded, as is the glory within the large circles.

On the western side of the room are three lofty windows, the curtains to which are of yellow satin, with draperies pendent from richly-gilded cornices. By an ingenious adaptation of the curtains of the central window, the effect of a canopy to a throne is produced. The curtains are looped up between th [illegible] on either side of the window, and musl in draperies tastefully arranged in [illegible] between them. And at each end of the room [illegible] and this stage is filled with the choicest flowers in blossom. The whole length of the room in front of the windows, a platform, [illegible] with crimson cloth, is erected; and on it are placed [illegible] for her Majesty and [illegible] Lady, and long seats for distinguished visitors, and the [illegible] Waiters. On the opposite side of the room is the fireplace, above which is a [illegible] and between the two doors of the Saloon, [illegible] portrait of her Majesty [illegible] Prince Albert. [illegible] the Saloon, are four tables made of or-molu, [illegible] panels filled with lapis-lazuli and verd antique: these tables are [illegible] design and workmanship, [illegible] adorned the [illegible] candelabra holding six lights [illegible] and there are [illegible] glasses reflect the gay scene. Above the door leading to the Saloon is a picture by Vandyke [illegible] represents portraits [illegible] Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. The musicians' gall[illegible] richly embroidered with gold, was once part of the dais, [illegible] occasions as that we illustrate. Five chandeliers of richly cut glass [illegible] from the ceiling, containing an immense number of wax candles, which, when lighted, pour a flood of brilliancy on the scene [illegible] filled with company, the appearance of the State Ball-room is very magnificent and imposing.

We have [illegible] on the State rooms, of which we give representations. But we [illegible] in which to notice the other rooms thrown open [illegible] Throughout [illegible] a temporary kitchen is erected similar in [illegible] ter to that we have just described, [illegible] that the window [illegible] are of crimson velvet. A temporary orchestra, raised a few feet from the floor, is erected in this room, and the drapery in front of it, of crimson velvet richly embroidered with gold, was once part of the dais, [illegible] This room was set apart for dancing, as well as the Ball-room, and the Queen visited each room in succession

The Yellow Saloon and Yellow Drawing-room the company promenaded [illegible] in the Picture Gallery, and both are splendid apartments. [illegible] every kind were served in the Green Drawing-room, and the tea and coffee equipage were silver, [illegible] and of beautiful design. In the Dining-room, [illegible] were laid out for supper, and the display of plate on them was magnificent in the extreme. At the luncheon and the supper table [illegible] a truly regal display of gold plate was arrayed, many of the specimens [illegible] were [illegible] size and splendour, and lighted with a profusion of wax-lights, and the effect heightened by flowers, [illegible] superb and characteristic addendum to a supper-room it is impossible to conceive.

On Wednesday evening her Majesty gave a state ball, which was very numerously attended, the invitations exceeding eighteen hundred, and comprising the members of the Royal Family, foreign Princes, and Princesses, the elite of distinction in this country, the Diplomatic Corps, the Ladies of the Queen's Household, the Officers of State, and the principal Officers of the Household [illegible] Majesty and Prince Albert, and most of the nobility and gentry in town.

The company were invited at half-past nine o'clock, but before that time the [illegible] began to arrive, those having the entrée slightly [illegible] Their Majesties [illegible] Assembly Room, which, on their arrival, up the grand staircase, which was lined by the Yeomen of the Guard, under the command of Captain Kincaid, the Exon in Waiting. The officers of the corps present were [illegible] Lieutenant; Lieut.-Colonel Fitzmaurice, the Adjutant; and Captain Oliver Leon.

Her Royal Highness alighted at the Queen's private entrance, and were received by the Ladies of Honour and the Grooms and Equerries in Waiting.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at half-past nine o'clock, attended by Lady Augusta Bruce, Baroness de Speth, Sir George Couper, and Lieut.-Colonel F. Maude.

His Royal Highness the Count of Syracuse was attended by his Excellency General Prince Castelcicala and his Gentleman in Waiting.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess Bernhard of Saxe Weimar were accompanied by Prince Edward and the Princesses Anne and Amelie of Saxe-Weimar, and was attended by the Hon. Miss Harcourt and Captain Somerset.

His Royal Highness Prince Gustavus was also present.

The Royal guests were conducted to the Queen's closet, where her Majesty and Prince Albert received their Illustrious visitors.

The whole suite of state saloons, comprising the Ball-room, the Throne-room, the Picture Gallery, [illegible] the White Drawing-room, the Yellow Drawing-room were all opened, and were most tastefully decorated with the rarest and most beautiful flowers, and were most brilliantly illuminated with numerous magnificent crystal lustres, filled with wax-lights [illegible] Throughout, as well as the Ball-room, were provided for dancing, orchestras for quadrille bands were erected in each

At ten o'clock her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Duchess of Kent, Prince George of Cambridge, Prince Edward and Princess Anne of Saxe-Weimar, and the Count of Syracuse, entered the State Rooms, and were conducted by the Lord Chamberlain to the Ball-room, the quadrille band playing "God save the Queen" [illegible]

The Queen wore a white crape dress, trimmed with white bugles and grapes in [illegible] and frosted leaves, the whole of British manufacture. Her Majesty's head-dress to correspond.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent wore a black crape dress over satin, trimmed with bugles. [illegible] dress of black lace, ornamented with bugles and frosted [illegible] All the articles of British manufacture Directly after the Queen's entrance into the Ball-room a set of quadrilles was formed, and the ball commenced, the quadrille band, led by Mr. Henry Barnard, playing "La Faveur" (Tolbecque).

Supper was served in the State Dinner-room, on a long range of tables, which were decorated with a number of [illegible] vases, and candelabras of silver gilt, while on the buffet were tastefully arranged jewelled and crystal cups, tankards sculptured in ivory, shields and salvers of the largest size, and gold vases in which were inserted different plants of great beauty and rarity, the whole being illuminated with candelabras and sconces, filled with wax lights.

CONCERTS.

M. HECTOR BERLIOZ'S MORNING CONCERT.—On Thursday (last week) this entertainment was given, at the Hanover-square Rooms, which were filled with persons and amateurs. The famed composer was received with several [illegible] on entering the orchestra to conduct his overtures, [illegible] and [illegible] The band assembled on this occasion proved the estimation in which Berlioz is [illegible] by the English profession [illegible] orchestras of the Royal Italian Opera and Her Majesty's Theatre "fraternized" [illegible] Tolbecque, Blagrove, Hill, Nadaud, [illegible] Lazarus, Baumann, Hill, Ourry, Rousselot, Parts, Reed, [illegible] and Berlioz in his under the [illegible] encored boisterously, as were also his "Hungarian March" and the "Pilgrims' March," from his "Harold" symphony. The Chorus and Ballet de[illegible] from "Faust," and his arrangement of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," were included in the scheme. Several vocal pieces, composed by M. Berlioz, were sung by Mdme. Stolzer, and Mdme. Dulcken was encored in a Spanish [illegible] by Viardot and Mdlle. Mendi, was demanded a second time with fervour. Each admirably sang, and the quaintness of the subject produced unusual interest in the audience. Mdme. Dulcken was added, in two movements of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto. The more we listen to the works of Berlioz, the more do we feel persuaded of the originality and charm of his ideas, and the [illegible] and novelty of his forms. He has carried the science of musical acoustics to unknown regions; his effects are startling, and at times overwhelming [illegible] Beethoven, Berlioz's surprises are sudden, his [illegible] quent, and his orchestral treatment powerful and sympathetic. The bold his inspiration [illegible] over the minds and feelings of his auditory is extraordinary; and we have [illegible] the same result in Germany and France, as well as in this country. He is a profound thinker—one who has resolved to quit the beaten track, and trust to the development of his own genius.

MR. A. SEDGWICK'S ANNUAL CONCERT.—This concert is a performer gave his annual entertainment at the Hanover Rooms, on the [illegible] It is [illegible] several pieces with considerable effect, the [illegible] assists being [illegible] [illegible] were added by Mr. Cohan and Julia Adams, pianists; Regondi, guitarist; Miss Rosina Wells, violinist; and Mr. G. Collins, violincellist.

HULLAH'S CONCERT.—This Italian vocalist gave a morning concert on Tuesday, at Mr. [illegible] Rooms, Maddox-street. He was aided by [illegible] Mr. Mount Sainsbury, Mr. Deichmann, [illegible] Mr. Benedict.

MISS CLARA LOVEDAY.—At a mansion of Lady Theresa Lewis, at Knightsbridge, [illegible] and accomplished pianiste gave a concert on Monday night. It was [illegible] some years since [illegible] her return to London have proved the [illegible] She executed divers pieces by Weber, [illegible] displaying not only exe[illegible] but a nice and discriminating appreciation of the styles of the different [illegible] Castellan, the Misses Pyne, Madame Schutzer, Miss Flower, Signor Marini, M. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Copyhold Enfranchisement Extension Bill, the Joint Stock Companies Bill, and the Impeachment for Debt (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The report of the Protection of Females Bill was received.

The Commons Enclosure Bill was read a third time and passed.

THE NAVY.—The Earl of AUCKLAND, in reply to the Duke of Richmond, stated that it was the intention of the Admiralty to give good-conduct warrants to the marines as well as to the navy.—Earl CAREY, with reference to a petition from Mr. Shrapnell, the son of the late General Shrapnell, the inventor of the shell bearing his name, praying for further reward, stated that the subject had been frequently under the consideration of the Board of Ordnance, and it was their opinion, inasmuch as General Shrapnel had received a pension of £1200 a year, [illegible] that no further reward could be granted.

On the motion of Lord REDESDALE, some amendments were made in the standing orders of the House.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

SILCO ELECTION.—On the motion of Mr. O Gore, a petition presented in May last, complaining of a contemplated compromise as to proceedings on the Silco election petition, was referred to the Committee of Privileges.

MILITARY HONOURS.—Mr. F. MAULE, in reply to Colonel Dunne, observed, with regard to the distribution of medals to the survivors of those troops who were engaged in the affair of Maharajpoor, that the medals would be limited to the survivors or those actually in the trenches, or who took part in the storming.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The House having gone into Committee on the Sugar Duties, and the first set of resolutions having been read,

Mr. SPOONER supported the amendment, just as a question of protection or right, but as the only proposition that had been brought forward which would have the effect of checking the increase of slavery.

Mr. GIBSON argued that the plan of reducing the duty on colonial sugars to 10s., and of continuing the duty on foreign sugars at 20s., was an economical plan.

Mr. MANGLES, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Oswald spoke in favour of the amendment.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed it on the grounds that it would increase the price to the consumers, and that it would cause a loss of several hundred thousand pounds to the revenue.

Mr. H. GIBSON condemned all attempts at giving protection to the colonists.

Mr. T. BARING objected to the course pursued by the Government, of proposing to do as little for the colonies as possible when pressed to do something. He urged the claims of the colonists as assistance, and supported Sir J. Pakington's proposal.

Lord J. RUSSELL could not consent to risk a loss to the revenue of £950,000 a year, unless the amendment before the committee would involve neither could he agree to leave the colonies in a state of uncertainty as to what might be their fate at the end of three years.

Mr. DISRAELI did not think the opinion of the noble Lord, on the question of slavery, of much weight, remembering his calculations on that subject made in 1833, precisely at the period of the greatest increase of slavery that had taken place. He was prepared to give to the colonists that assistance which could enable them to compete with slave-owning countries. The evidence taken before the Sugar Committee demonstrated that the difference in the cost of sugar produced by free labour and slave-labour was 16s., and it was for the committee to determine if the proposal of 10s. differential duty was sufficient. The measure proposed by the Government was essentially only the abandonment of the Act of 1846, but was to remedy for the distresses of the colonies. The hon. gentlemen concluded by addressing a few words to the Irish members, which he had predicted in 1846.

Mr. WILLIAMS opposed the amendment, and challenged the composition of the Sugar Committee.

Lord G. HAMILTON read the names of the committee, showing that there were only three known Protectionists on it, the rest being either pledged Free-traders or as to which those opinions were not known.

Mr. CARDWELL made some explanations, and the committee divided for Sir J. Pakington's proposal, 169; against it, 231: majority against the motion, 62.

Mr. GLADSTONE suggested to the Government the advisability of having a temporary resolution to continue the present duties on sugar, in order to enable the House to deliberate calmly on the whole scheme submitted by the Government for the relief of the colonies. It was then half-past one o'clock on Tuesday morning, and there were several resolutions to be considered, and it would be impossible to settle the duties before Thursday, the 5th instant.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that, as he found it would be impossible to pass his resolutions in time to give them effect by the 5th instant, he would not press them further then, but would propose that the Chairman report progress, and obtain leave to sit again on Friday.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of RICHMOND presented a petition from the city of London, and four from the town of Reading, complaining of the great increase of juvenile offences. His Grace urged the necessity of taking some measures on this important subject. Earl Carey said that boys from the prison of Parkhurst had been sent out as apprentices to Western Australia, but argued against putting these juvenile delinquents on a footing with the children of honest parents.

After some other business had been transacted, the Game Certificates for Killing Hares Bill was read a third time and passed, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

There was an early sitting from noon to four o'clock.

INCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.—On the order of the day for going into Committee on the Incumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill, Sir LUCIUS O'BRIEN moved that it be an instruction to the committee to extend the provisions of the bill to England and Ireland. After a discussion in which the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, Mr. NAPIER, Mr. [illegible], Mr. [illegible], and Mr. [illegible] took part, it was agreed to adjourn the debate, which was ultimately agreed to without a division.

The House then adjourned till five o'clock, when it again met, and Mr. HUME gave notice of his intention to ask Sir Mr. CAY's Ministers whether any instructions had been sent from the West Indies by the last mail.

THE RAILWAY BOARD.—Mr. BANKES moved for leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the Railway Board; and a debate having taken place, the members succeeded in defeating the motion by a majority of 11.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS. Mr. URQUHART having risen to move "That, in the opinion of this House, interference in the internal government of other countries is detrimental to the interests, and derogatory to the honour of this country, as well as to the interests and honour of the countries in behalf of which such interference is assumed to be exercised; that the practice of intervention has [illegible] thereby of the public expenditure, to the great oppression of her Majesty's subjects, and particularly of the industrious classes, and to daily labour for daily food," was proceeding to develop the question, when it was ascertained that only thirty members were present, and an adjournment therefore took place at a quarter past eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

The Parliamentary Proceedings Adjournment Bill was, after a short discussion, read a second time.

The Sites for Churches (Scotland) Bill was passed through Committee, and the report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

The motion for the adjournment of the debate upon the repeal of the Union led to some discussion between Sir B. Hall, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Keogh, of a personal character. The motion was agreed to.

HORSHAM BOROUGH.—The adjournment of the debate upon the repeal of the Union led to some discussion between Sir B. Hall, Mr. Reynolds, and Mr. Keogh, of a personal character. The motion was agreed to.

HORSHAM BOROUGH.—In the absence of the second reading of the Horsham Borough Bill, which he said had been introduced by Lord J. Russell, and ought to be proceeded with, or the order relating to it quashed. Sir G. GREY thought it would be better to postpone the second reading of the bill, until the fill of the hon. member for the Fast Boroughs should have been disposed of.—After some conversation, in which Mr. W. Miles, Mr. Hume, Mr. Forbes, Mr. D'Eyncourt, Mr. Ingestrie, and Sir De Lacy Evans, took part, the debate was adjourned, without a division, until that day week.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Administration of Justice Bills (Nos. 1 and 2), and the Protection of Justices from Vexatious Actions Bill passed through committee.

The Ecclesiastical Unions and Divisions of Parishes (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.—THE DEBATE.

The adjourned debate on Mr. Hume's motion was resumed by Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE, who supported the motion.—Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD strongly opposed the motion.

In the debate that ensued, Mr. COBDEN ably advocated the extension of the suffrage.

On a division, the motion was lost by a majority of 351 to 84.—Adjourned.

AT a full Court of the Fellows of the Royal College of Surgeons, held on Thursday, the vacancies in the Council were filled up by the election of Mr. Bransby Cooper, Mr. Skey, and Mr. Stanley.

THE FRENCH LEGATION.—The staff of the French Legation is still transacting business at the establishment in Manchester-square. The staff is entirely a new one, all the appointments under the monarchy having ceased. M. de Lenny, who was, previously to the Revolution, a Marquis in the Peerage of France, is Charge d'Affaires. He was for many years French Minister at Hamburg. There are, as before, two secretaries, one of them, M. de Lutherot, who was formerly Count Charles Medurot, being son of a late Peer of France by a sister of Lamartine, to whom he is consequently nephew. There is also a chancellor and attaches, making six in all. In other respects, the establishment of the establishments presents a striking contrast to the size of the residence of the Republican Legation.

A THOUGHT AMID REVOLUTIONS.

Lend me thine eyes, Posterity! A cloud
Gathers between my vision and the men
Whose voices echo o'er thus breathing world.
Lend me thy sight! lend me thy placid heart,
Free of this mean contemporaneous scorn,
That I may love the true men of to-day,
That I may reverence the good and wise,
That I may know what mighty spirits walk
Daily and hourly in my company,
Or jostle shoulders in the common crowd—
The thinkers and the workers of the time.
Thine eyes, Posterity, Apathy, and Scorn,
And all the blinding dust which Envy stirs,
To shroud the living lustre from my sight.
Lend me thine eyes, grateful Posterity!
Upon the hill-tops let me stand alone,
Companion of the vastness, and keep watch
Upon the stars, and sun, and moon, and fro—
Small to the dwellers in the vale beneath,
But great to me. O just Posterity!
I strive to penetrate thy thought—to soar
Above the narrow precincts of to-day,
And judge what men, now wanting crusts of bread,
Shall in thy book stand foremost honour-crown'd;
What scorn'd and persecuted wretchedness
Shall shine the jewel on a nation's brow;
And what unfriended genius, heed'd, impugn'd,
Shall fill the largest niche of Pantheons.
I would behold, daily, for my delight,
The clear side of the greatness; the full size,
Shape, glory, majesty of living men.
Why should our meanness dim these orbs of heaven?
Why should our malice dwarf the giant's height?
Our scorn make black the white robes of the sage?
Our dull indifference with deadly fames
Make dreary the blue eyes of living crowds?
Lend me thy sight! I will see marvels yet—
Gold 'mid the dust, and jewels in the mire.

CHARLES MACKAY.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Towards the conclusion of last week's financial article, it was stated that the speculation was all for the "rise." The truth of this assertion has been abundantly verified by the rapid and continuous advance in the general descriptions of British securities since Saturday last. Consols, which closed at 85 on that day, have risen nearly 3 per cent., with every prospect of further improvement. The great cause of this sudden movement is the abundance of money, increased by the payment of the dividends, and the announcement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the deficiency in the revenue would only be about half a million, instead of two millions, as formerly predicted. Rather than from the actual position of any financial operations, with a market glutted with money, added to the comparatively firm attitude of the Government in France, and the absence of any exciting news from the other states of Europe, there is little to excite surprise at speculation tending upward. Political causes have alone tended to repress prices hitherto, the state of money for months past having been in favour of an advance, and although there are yet remaining disturbing elements adverse to quiet business, the chances are tolerably in favour of a further rise. The present crisis, however, cannot be considered as one of Europe indefinitely insecure, yet, compared with the past, present events are remarkably tame. As is usual with a reaction, business becomes suddenly extended, and operators were so enormously on the advance, that the parties for a "fall" windrew. Consols on Monday opened at 85¾, and closed at 86¼; on Tuesday, 86¾; on Wednesday, 86⅝; and on Thursday advanced to 87¼. The weekly committee of the Bank separately, however, without making any reduction in the rate of interest, as had been anticipated, caused a slight reduction for the first time during the week, Consols receding to 87¼ to ⅜. New Three-per-cent. Reduced were also very dull, and have fully shared in the improvement, as well as Reduced. Exchequer Bills have not advanced in value as much as the Funds, but Long Bonds. Prices at the close of the week were steady with a downward tendency. Railways have been very slow:—Bank Stock, 191; Reduced Annuities, 87¼; 3 per Cent. Consols Annuities, 85¾ ex div.; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 88; Long Annuities (to expire Jan., 1860), 8 13-16ths; India Bonds (1000), 21 per 1; ditto (under £1000), 19 prem.; Consols for Opening, 87¼; Exchequer Bills: £1000, June, 34 prem. A £500, March, 40 prem.; £500, June, 30 prem.; £500, March, 37 pr.; Small, June, 34 prem.

The Foreign Market, as the week advanced, became more animated, and prices gradually crept up. The extreme range has been in Mexican, which on Monday closed at 17 for Money, and is now at 17¾ to 18 ex div.

The Share Marke ; is firmer, but at present there is little indications of any speculative movements. Prices at closing are: Brazilian Bonds, 68; Danish Bonds, 1825, 3 per Cent., 67; Birmingham, 21 prem.; Eastern Counties, 23¾; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 14¾; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 4 x. int.; Bristol and Exeter, Turds, 14¾; Caledonian, 31¾; Chester and Holyhead, 19¾; Ditto, Preferences, 14¾; Eastern Counties, 15; East Lancashire, New Quarters, 4¾; Ditto, 5 per Cent. Guaranteed, 27; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 21¼; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 32¾; Ditto, Original New, and Berwick, 31¾; Ditto, Extension, No. 1, 17¼; Ditto, No. 2, 11¼; Ditto, Preference, 5½; York and North Midland, 70; Boulogne and Ans ens, 7¾; Dutch Rhenish, ¾; Namur and Liege, 2¾; Northern of France, 5¼; Orleans and Bordeaux, 2¼; Paris and Lyons, 9¾; Paris and Orleans, 29; Rouen and Havre, 9.

RAILWAY LOSSES.—The following railways were the most depressed yesterday. Consols quoted 86¾ to 87¼ for the Opening. The Foreign Market was steady, and in shares there was a very limited amount of business.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.—On Tuesday the works on this line, between the proposed terminus at King's-cross and the Copenhagen-fields, and between Barnet and Finchley, were resumed, having been discontinued during the moneypanic of 1847. A considerable portion of the works between Peterborough and London is executed, the heavy parts, both cuttings and embankments, would have materially retarded the opening of the through line, having been carried on. SUDDEN DEATH FROM THE INHALATION OF CHLOROFORM.—We have the painful duty to record the sudden death, in London, of Mr. Walter Samuel Badger, of Rotherham, solicitor, from the fatal effects of the above new and most powerful agent. On Saturday last, an inquest was held in the parish of St. Pancras, before Thomas Wakley, Esq., M.P., Coroner for the county of Middlesex, to inquire into the circumstances attending this painful event. From the evidence, it appeared that in the afternoon of Friday, the 30th ult., the deceased left the chambers of his brother, in Lincoln's-inn, Temple, to fix a appointment with Mr. Robinson, the eminent dentist, residing at 7, Gower-street, Bed ord square. Mr. Robinson was about to extract one of the teeth of the deceased, when he requested that chloroform should be administered to him. This request being complied with, the deceased inhaled the chloroform in the usual manner, for a few inspirations only. He then told Mr. Robinson that it was very pleasant, but not strong enough. Mr. Robinson was about to obtain a fresh supply of the chloroform, when the head and arm of the deceased fell, and he died instantaneously without uttering a word, and without a struggle. THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat coastwise has been decidedly an [illegible] but the supply by land carriage has been small. Though the show of samples of both red and white was very moderate, yet the demand, arising from the absence of the principal buyers, was in a very sluggish state, at Monday's quotations. In foreign wheat exceedingly little business was doing, yet the importers as the weather is foreign wheat exceedingly little business was doing, yet the importers as the weather is somewhat unsettled—would not submit to lower prices. Barley 13,300 quarters of foreign barley have come to hand. The large supply and a depressing influence on malts the trade and to effect large sales. In per quarter one inquiry must have been stated:

In small way nothing was doing, with a full average supply on offer:

oats exceeded 20,000 quarters. Hence the oat trade was heavy, at 6d per quarter decline. Beans, peas, [illegible] corn, and flour were a very slow inquiry. In prices, however, we have no alteration to notice.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 4580; barley, 720; oats, 3,370. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 660 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 4230; barley, 14,500; oats, 39,450 quarters. Flour, 30,; [illegible] and —: Irregular mail, 9000 quarters.

English.—Wheat, finest and [illegible] 70s to 72s; ditto, white, 70s to 72s; Norfolk and Suffolk, [illegible] ditto, white 67s to 69s; rye, 42s to 43s; grinding barley, [illegible] malting ditto, 36s to 38s; distilling ditto, 32s to 34s; Lincoln and Yorkshire, 32s to 34s; brown ditto, 28s to 30s; Kingston and Ware, 38s to 40s; Chevalier, 40s to 42s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 19s to 22s; potato ditto 22s to 25s; Youghal and Cork, black, 18s to 20s; ditto, white, 21s to 24s; tick beans, new, 32s to 35s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s; grey peas, 30s to 32s; maple, 32s to 36s; white, 34s to 38s; Harlers, 37s to 40s per quarter. Town-made flour, 41s to 44s; Suffolk, 38s to 39s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 34s to 36s per 280 lbs.—

Foreign.—Duty on wheat, [illegible] to 4s 8d; barley, 2s; oats, 1s 2d; beans, 4s 8d; peas, 4s 8d; rye, 4s 8d; flour, 4s 8d per barrel.

The Seed Market.—So little business is doing in this market, that prices are almost nominal.

Linseed, English, scowling, 56s to 60s; Baltic, crushing, 44s to 46s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 46s; Hull, 40s to 42s per quarter; cakes, 12s to 13s per cwt.; rapeseed, 32s per cwt.; mustard seed, 8s to 10s; white ditto, 6s to 9s; tares, 8s to 9s; canary, 6s to 6s 6d per bushel. English rapeseed £30 to £32 per last; foreign ditto, £32 to £34 per last; linseed cakes, £12 10s to £13 0s; ditto foreign, £8 to £9 10s per 1000, repeated cakes, £5 to £5 10s per ton; canary, 50s to 56s per quarter. Turnip clover seed, [illegible] to 6; cotton, [illegible] to 6; white, 7s to 8; extra, up to 9; Dantzig, [illegible] to 5; [illegible] white, [illegible] to [illegible].

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 2d; barley, 30s 8d; oats, 20s 10d; rye, 33s 2d; beans, 35s 6d; peas, 36s 2d.

The Six Weeks Average.—Wheat, 47s 7d; barley, 31s 5d; oats, 22s 0d; rye, 36s 9d; beans, 37s 4d; peas, 37s 8d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 10s; barley, 2s 6d; oats, 2s 6d; rye, 2s 6d; beans, 2s 6d; peas, 2s 6d.

Tea.—Small public sales have taken place this week. Fine parcels sold steadily, at full prices; but all other kinds were a slow sale. Privately, the demand is far from satisfactory.

Sugar.—On the whole, this market has ruled somewhat inactive since our last report. In prices, however, we have no material alteration to notice.

Coffee.—For all kinds of coffee the demand has been in a sluggish state. The quotations have undergone no material alteration.

Rice.—This article has ruled firm, and, in some instances, the quotations have had an upward tendency.

Provisions.—For Dutch butter the demand is steady, at an improvement in value of 2s per cwt. Fine marks are selling at 84s to 86s; good, 78s to 82s; and inferior and surplus, 72s to 76s per cwt. The value of Irish butter being low, viz. 12,000 tykins more than at the corresponding period in 1847, the trade is dull, at a reduction of from 2s to 3s per cwt. Carlow, Clonmel, and Kilkenny, landed firkin, 82s to 84s; Cork, 80s to 82s; and Limerick and Waterford, 80s to 82s per cwt. English butter is firm, and prices have an upward tendency. Fine Dorset, 92s to 96s; good, 80s to 88s; fine Devon, 84s to 90s per cwt. Fresh, 12s to 13s per ounce lbs. The best parcels of bacon have sold at full currencies, but all other kinds are neglected. Prime mild Wiltshire, 54s to 56s; fine, 52s to 53s; Hollins, 48s to 50s; inferior, 44s to 46s per cwt. Hams are in moderate request,

PARIS AFTER THE INSURRECTION.

BY ALBERT SMITH.

(Illustrated from Sketches made on the spot, by the Author.)

AS the public prints have already given the most copious details of the late Insurrection, and your artists have reproduced the scenes most exciting in the actual contest, our present task will be to furnish the reader with some notion of the present aspect of Paris, still in a state of siege, and every way in a condition the most deplorably fearful.

We found Boulogne tranquil enough. The town had sent its quantum of National Guards, and that was all. Beyond the paucity of visitors, which is remarkably apparent, and a few placards of the progress of events in Paris, and orders of the sous-prefect upon the walls, there was nothing to indicate any state of things different from the ordinary course. The shopkeepers complain bitterly of the aspect of things, and anticipate a sorry season—not only from lack of autumnal visitors, but the departure of several English families long resident there and at Capécure. They take no share in the politics of the day, and evidently wish that France was just as it used to be—at least, such was the opinion of one or two of the leading tradesmen with whom we conversed. The anxiety, also, of the hotel touters, who wait for the arrivals, to capture the few passengers that the boats bring over, shows that every one is more an object than ever to their employers.

The journey from Boulogne to Paris, by the Amiens Railway, is now made in seven hours and a half, including an hour for refreshment at the latter city, the first-class fare being six or seven and twenty francs. Just as we left there was great excitement in the Rue de l'Ecu, owing to the return of the National Guard from Paris. They had bouquets of flowers stuck in the muzzles of their guns, and the women were decorating them with tricoloured favours, whilst a large crowd of friends and idlers surrounded them, singing "Mourir pour la Patrie" in grand chorus. We did not hear that they had sustained any loss.

The railway is not remarkable for scenery. From Boulogne to Abbeville, the right-hand side is entirely composed of large wastes of sand, and salt-water marshes, and the left is just as dreary in another way. Long straggling fields without hedges, interminable rows of poplars, and other skinny trees, and the horizon crowned by a windmill, may be taken as a fair picture of what you will see whenever you look out. This is fenced off from the rails in the most feeble manner; either by a slim railing that a sturdy flock of poultry could knock down by flying against, or what appears to be a few laths nailed by a single tack to the top of broomsticks driven a little way into the ground. You see few houses about, except in the little patches that form the villages, and wonder where the labourers live; they must evidently come a long way to their work. Another thing we observed was, that although we stopped at all the stations, nobody appeared to get in or out, albeit we waited a few minutes at each. Their signals for going on again appeared to be various—at one station they rang a sort of sheep-bell, blew a trumpet, and whistled all at once.

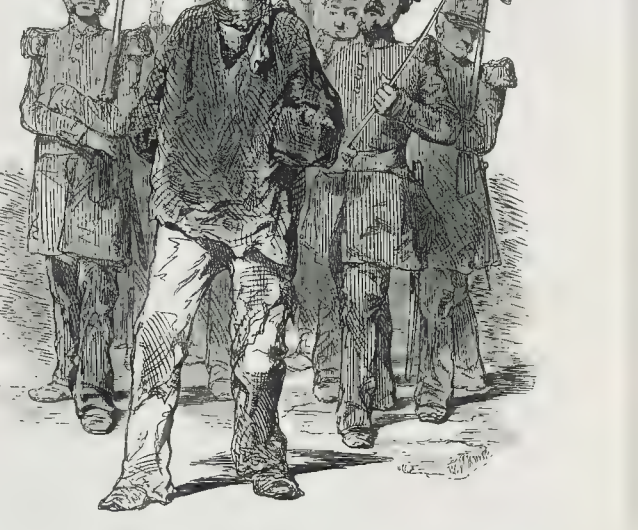
At Abbeville and at Amiens the same excitement prevailed as at Boulogne respecting the return of the Guard. All the population had evidently turned out to greet them; tricolour flags were flying and music playing; and the grand junction station at Amiens was filled with elegant women, all carrying bouquets to greet the return of their townsmen, who came up amidst loud cheers just as we started. The whole sight was as pretty a one as can well be conceived.

We arrived at Paris about eleven at night, and on the very first turning from the terminus found the city illuminated. Hitherto lights had been put outside the houses, as a precaution, but this night they had been turned to account as symbols of rejoicing. The effect was most beautiful. They do not illuminate with gas, or little glass lamps, as we do, but with pots of grease with a wick in the centre, with which they define the outlines of the principal buildings—hanging coloured lanterns—in this case mostly tricolour—from every available point. The whole city was sparkling with these lights. In the long streets they formed lines of coloured stars—fresh avenues opening every instant. Some of the windows were filled with candles; and in many of the thoroughfares the dirt was scooped out between the stones, and bits of candles set up in long rows against the pavement, or where it ought to be. And yet, after the first surprise at this dazzling scene, there was something ghastly in the very splendour; for Paris was at that moment one vast charnel-house. Dead and gory bodies choked up the hospitals, the churches, the ambulances, and the public buildings in every quarter. There was scarcely a family from whose dwelling the gay lights had been hung out, who had not lost a friend or relation.

Guards stopped you at the corner of every street to demand a counter-sign, or examine your packages; and even in the darkest thoroughfares the watch-fires of the street bivouacs gleamed on nothing but swords and bayonets. The National Guard and the Garde Mobile were on duty everywhere; generally they were grouped about on straw, in the open streets; but every sheltered spot, such as the portico of a church, or passage, or large porte-cochère, had been turned into a bivouac. Some of the Garde Mobile appeared mere boys. We noticed one little fellow fast asleep in the angle formed by one of the large stones set up against the walls of the houses, with his gun leaning above him (almost twice as tall as he was himself), and in the full light of two illumination pots. Others made rude beds of paving-stones and knapsacks, on which, thoroughly worn out, they appeared to be sleeping soundly; and many were grouped round their watch-fires, smoking and talking. Beyond these nothing living was about except the rats, who marched about, as they ordinarily do, late at night in Paris, coming up from the drains under the edge of the pavement. One, near the Palais Royal, was evidently not at all put out by the city being under military law. He had been attracted by the smell of the provisions stuck on the bayonets of a stand of muskets, and was sitting up on his hind legs and sniffing at the bread, almost within reach of its owner. If the French rats are as daring, individually, as this one was, we can conceive the atrocities they would commit, as stated, if the abattoirs were taken away from them. The entire city was as quiet as the grave. Paris is never noisy after midnight, but now the silence was most impressive, broken only by the challenges, from time to time, of the sentinels. It was noisy enough, however, as soon as daybreak came on. From the earliest moment drums continued to beat all sorts of signals—never, to all appearance, ceasing, until the ear became almost unconscious of their rattling. We were about early, and the first curious sight that struck us was the interior of the Restaurant Colbert, where we had breakfast. It was entirely filled with soldiers: with the exception of ourselves, we did not see one civilian in the large room. Their noise, and talking, and clattering of knives and glasses,—the letting fall of their accoutrements, and loud laughter,—oaths, salutes, and recognitions from one table to another,—were perfectly stunning—much more than the drums; and we were glad to escape.

A GARDE MOBILE ON DUTY

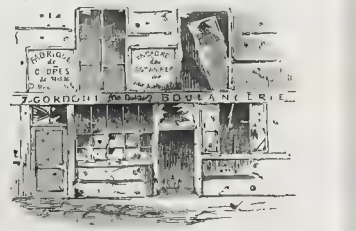
If the reader chances to be unacquainted with Paris, and will take the trouble to follow us on the map, he will see clearly the routes we took, so as to visit all the most prominent scenes of the late frightful carnage. In passing from the Rue Neuve des Petits Champs into the Palais Royal, we found the whole of the entry turned into a bivouac, and watched by the Garde Mobile. Straw was laid down in large quantities, on which the night sentinels were asleep. The large court between the large gallery and the Rue St. Honoré was occupied in the same manner; and the thoroughfares were scarcely passable for troops of the line, National and Marine Guards, and their eternal drums. Even several of the shops of the Palais Royal were emptied and turned into guard-rooms. Those that remained appeared to be doing but little business; indeed, the entire set of counters at one end of the Galerie d'Orleans were quite deserted. A shopkeeper in the Galerie de Valois complained sadly. After we had made a trifling purchase, he gave us a card, and said, "Sir, if you have any friends coming to Paris, tell them we will part with our goods for anything. We want money. Grand Dieu! how we want money!" We should be sorry to send our friends to Paris with the hopes of unequalled bargains, on the promise of a Palais Royal shopkeeper; but we believe the man spoke truth. Certainly, for our own part, it was always a mystery how the shops in this resort answered at all, for they all seemed to put forward wafer-stamps, eye-glasses, and bracelets as the staple articles of life; and now there is so little chance of visitors, who generally purchase their wares, coupled with their heavy rents, we think it must be a hard struggle with them. The entire stocks of most of them were displayed in their shallow windows, the shelves in the shops being almost bare. Rising from the straw of the bivouacs were the pulpits on which the amusements are generally announced; the last were those intended for Friday the 23rd ult., and on one of them—that of the Château des Fleurs—was advertised a buffo song, "Des Lampions!" to be given by a M. Mayer. There is a frightful association connected with the word. At one of the barricades the insurgents captured one of the guard, cut off his head, filled the mouth with pitch, and then putting a lighted match into it, held it up on a pike crying "Voici un joli lampion!"



INSURGENT PRISONER.—DRAWN BY GAVARNI.

From the Palais Royal we crossed to the Louvre. The court, usually a thoroughfare, was now shut up, and swarming with troops; others, in large numbers occupied the porch of St. Germain l'Auxerrois—the church from which the tocsin first sounded for the massacre of the Huguenots. All the pavement had been pulled up in front of this for a barricade; but the troops must have got good positions here. Whilst we were looking at the bivouac, a long line of National and Mobile Guards passed in marching order. Immediately behind the two drummers was the vivandière, a very comely young woman, carrying, however, a tub of a somewhat larger size than Jenny Lind or Cerito encumber themselves with. A Guard told us that she had been in the thick of the fighting at the Pont St. Michel, where the struggle was desperate, and never once flinched—aiding the wounded, giving "petites verres" to the combatants, and running here and there with cartridges, amongst a storm of bullets.

Crossing the quais and the Pont Neuf, which presented nothing out of the common way, except, as every where else, legions of military, we walked on to the Marché aux Fleurs, on the Quai Desaix. This may be said to have been the first point where the hard fighting of the Quartier Latin insurgents commenced: and it was on the adjoining bridge—the Pont au Change—that the cannon were planted to attack the establishment of La belle Jardinière, a great clothing mart. The houses bore fearful traces of the siege—blinds, windows, sign-boards, shutters, and doors all being blown to splinters. Under the trees of the flower-market another large body of guards had a bivouac; and they were making their toilet at the fountain, in which, also, a large dog was washing himself, who apparently belonged to the battalion. At a small shop a number of good-looking grisettes were hard at work making little tricolour rosettes and decorations, for which they found a ready sale. Everybody who went along the quai, if he carried the smallest parcel, was stopped and searched. A boy with a basket of cherries was amongst these; and the Garde Mobile would not be satisfied until he had turned them all out, and then put them carefully back again. This was because such cunning methods had been used to convey cartridges to the insurgents. Milk-cans with false bottoms, bottles, hollowed-out loaves, even women's back-hair, had been made available for this purpose during the insurrection. The children were also employed to carry the gold to the insurgents. Of this there appears to have been no lack, although where it came from remains, at present, the deepest mystery of all. In the hospital of La Petié alone they found the sum of 159,000 francs upon the persons of the wounded insurgents; at the Mairie of the 5th Arrondissement 35,000 francs; and so on, chiefly in gold; the pieces being, according to report, Napoleons, sovereigns, and Russian eagles.



BAKER'S SHOP, BATTERED BY CANNON.

Next to soldiers, one meets more funerals than anything else in the street. So many have perished that the services for the dead are going on all day long; and when we arrived at Notre Dame, the place was choked up with National Guards, who had attended the obsequies of a comrade. In addition, the crowds of people waiting at the gates of the Hotel Dieu, to see their wounded friends who were lying there, formed so dense a mass that it was difficult to fight one's way through them. Those merely accustomed to the routine of casualties in the accident ward of an hospital cannot form the slightest idea of the extraordinary wounds of some of the patients here—several hurt, dying, and dead. In one case a bullet, evidently fired from the top of a house, had passed through the top of the skull, and came out below and behind the lower jaw; in another, the ball had entered at the temple, and carried away the eye in its course. In many instances a small blue spot alone betrayed the fatal wound—on the chest, the side, or the neck; and the number of strange cuts and slashes—the manner in which some of the bodies had been riddled by bullets and bayonets, and literally hacked to pieces by swords and knives—is beyond conception.

The passage of the Petit Pont to the Quartier Ladin—that part of Paris, which, by analogy, we might designate as the Borough—was closed, so we went round by the Pont St. Michel (the bridge upon which the cannonade took place represented in your last Number) to the quay of the same name. Some of the sharpest fighting had taken place here, and traces were visible everywhere of bullets and artillery. The barricade at the end of the Rue St. Jacques had not been removed, and some of the stones marked off the bivouac of the guard. As in the Palais Royal and elsewhere, they were grouped about, some asleep, others furbishing up their appointments, and making a rough toilet. At evening, when we passed this place, they were preparing for their night's rest—if they could enjoy anything approaching to repose in the middle of such a ceaseless charivari as the drums and men kept up.

NATIONAL GUARDS MAKING UP FOR THE NIGHT.

The scene was extremely picturesque: the lights of the watch-fires fitfully reddening the old architecture of this part of the city, above which the towers of Notre Dame were looming; the noise of the Seine always rushing through the narrow arches of the bridges; the men lying on the barricade itself even, and the constant challenges of the sentinels, altogether formed a picture seldom to be witnessed—never perhaps in Paris since the Middle Ages.

BEGINNING OF THE FAUBOURG ST. ANTOINE.

It was not difficult to find out how fierce the attack and how desperate the resistance had been in the Rue St. Jacques. From its commencement up to the Place du Panthéon there were barricades every twenty yards, as well as at the corner of every street that opened into it. The thoroughfares of this part of Paris are very narrow and tortuous, sloping towards the river, and bounded by high houses. Some of the lanes running down from Thames-street, without foot-pavement, may give a rude idea of them. Hence the artillery never got fair play. It could only take the different points at wide angles; but, in consequence, the balls flew from one side of the street to the other, doing extraordinary execution. When the troops fired they got into the passages of the houses opposite; and thus the dwellings on each side of the way became, in a measure, fortresses. The street was white with the plaster and cement which they spread over the buildings in France; and the cannons brought down masses at times as large as the entire breadth of the house, scooping the stuff away as the balls flew across them. At a wine-shop, a man got considerable custom by allowing everybody who took a glass to touch a bullet which had lodged in the wainscot of his bar, after going through the head of an insurgent!

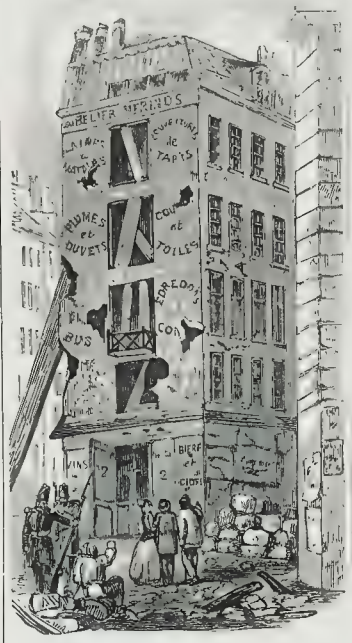
The journey along the Rue St. Jacques was rather scrambling than walking. The paving-stones of Paris are much larger than those used in London; they are perfect cubes, and about ten inches square; and when a length of twenty feet of these is torn up, they form formidable defences, not merely as foundations but to steady and keep down whatever may be upset, and added to the head. In some places, heaped against the shutters of the shops, their weight had broken through the entire windows. But, in spite of all this, wherever the marchands had a chance of displaying their wares, they had opened their establishments—some of them not boasting anything like even a simply broken pane of glass to the whole front. One of these was a cheap toy-shop, and there was nothing in the window but children's military toys: guns, swords, and spring pistols; military dolls and tin helmets; little cartridge-boxes, and small tricolour flags, labelled "Vive la République!" at one sous each, formed the wares. This was very characteristic, as also was the manner in which the children were playing at the corner of the Rue des Mathurins. They had, with great labour, heaped together a few paving-stones and some rubbish from some new houses, and were attacking and scrambling over this model barricade with the most intense energy. Close by, where the ground had been cleared, another company of these little gamins were marching, tout à abreast, screaming "Mourir pour la patrie," having stuck a branch of dead wood into the ground with one of the above-mentioned little flags tied to it, as, we imagined, a tree of liberty. Apropos of this, the "trees of liberty" so copiously planted about Paris are so sorry-looking a lot of timber as you could well see. They are miserably skinny poplars, decked out with apparently every tawdry scrap of red, or blue, or white rag that came to hand, and the impression they create is far more ridiculous than ennobling. As to "Liberty," according to the French notion, it appears to be sitting with your head at the muzzle of a cannon, smoke-dried gunpowder, in the centre of a circle of armed police. What their idea of "Fraternity" is, the present fearful struggle has shown; and their "Equality" was illustrated to us by the abuse of a starving beggar in the Palais Royal, who, because we replied "Va t'en!" somewhat sharply to his importunities, growled out, "You are a pretty fellow to say 'Va t'en' to a man like yourself, in that manner. We are all equal now. 'Va t'en,' indeed!

HOUSE DESTROYED BY CANNON, PLACE DE LA BASTILE.

And he was proceeding to insult us, when the waiter at the Café de la Rotonde, who did not enter into all the glories of the Republic, ordered him off.

E. Returning by the Rue de la Harpe from the Pantheon, which is sadly knocked about and battered, we were glad to see that the venerable Hôtel de Cluny stood unhurt amidst the thickest of the contest. Troops were, however, passing in and out, forming a strange contrast to its usual venerable quietude. All the narrow streets, between this and the river—wretched lanes of tall houses, no broader than the thoroughfares in the "Rookery," where New Oxford-street now stands—were guarded at each end by the Mobile Guard. Only the residents were allowed to pass; and all these were examined on their way.

We then kept along the quais on the left bank of the river, and crossed the Pont des Arts, from which the toll has been removed to the Place du Carrousel. The Carrousel was full of troops, and the place was constantly crossed by small parties of guards conducting prisoners to their confinement. We are indebted to the pencil of M. Gavarni for an illustration of this scene. It was curious to see the large gateways of the former palace bearing the inscription "Hôtel des Invalides Civiles." There was no thoroughfare through the centre as usual, nor is any one allowed to enter the gardens. The long vault under the terrace that runs parallel to the river had been turned into a dungeon; and here the living were incarcerated with the dead, in every stage of decomposition, and fired at immediately if they approached the grating. At last the emanations became so powerful, that this dreadful place was cleared out, as the authorities feared that typhus fever would attack the patients in the Tuileries.



THE CORNER HOUSE, FAUBOURG ST. ANTOINE.

Between the Tuileries and the Boulevards there is little to show that anything unusual has taken place, the English quarters of the Rue de la Paix, Rue de Rivoli, and Boulevard des Capucins wearing their usual character. But keeping along the line, as the Porte St. Martin was approached, the traces of the insurrection increased. The rough manner in which the paving-stones of some of the barricades had been replaced, the shattered walls and windows, and splintered blinds, were fearful evidences of the struggle. At the Château d'Eu a regular camp was formed. All the length of the open space before the Théâtre Historique, nearly from the Ambigu, on past the crowd of theatres to the site of the house from which Fieschi fired the infernal machine, looked like a battle-field—covered with very tight, clean little tents, exactly of the shape of those in children's boxes of toys. In addition to these, the troops were bivouacked about, and the entire footpath for some distance was occupied by the horses of the cavalry, their heads tied together, as at fairs, and their accoutrements placed in heaps in the road behind them. The poor animals, who all looked sadly jaded and dirty, had completely barked the acacias on either side of the Boulevard—planted there to take the place, in time, of the fine trees cut down. These also will now die, so that it will be many years before this once peculiarly attractive part of Paris will appear as it did formerly. All the money and labour in the world cannot reproduce its foliage.

In the Passage de Panorama several smart-looking girls were selling small bouquets. One of these, we were told, might be seen in the middle of the day dressed in the most elegant promenade costume of the fashion; but, towards evening, she assumed her grisette's attire to sell flowers on the Boulevards. She does not ask you to buy, but sticks them into your button-hole with her own slender fingers, and you cannot do otherwise than keep the bouquet. She was fluttering among the Guards in great spirits, giving witty and good-tempered replies to their addresses right and left. But, as everywhere else, the Gardes Mobiles were the favourites. None could resist her "Prenez un bouquet, mon beau Mobile!" or "Permettez-moi, que je vous fleurise!" and, consequently, every one of the troop who came through the passage was similarly decorated.

NATIONAL GUARD AND FLOWER-GIRL.

Along the Boulevard du Temple, and so on to the Place de la Bastile, every burning and corner disclosed ruins and remains of barricades. The new houses in course of building were in some instances utterly destroyed, and all the blinds were more or less shattered by bullets. Cannon-balls had cut off angles and gone through walls, or carried away doors, windows, balconies, and chimnies, in a most extraordinary manner. There was a barricade at the end of every thoroughfare, however small, and the main road was in some places just passable.

But it was in the Place de la Bastile, at the openings of the terrible Faubourg St. Antoine and Rue de la Roquette, that the most complete ruin and extermination had been carried out. It was here that the tremendous barricade had been raised, an Engraving of which appeared in your Journal of last week: here the possession of every house had been fought for, hand to hand; and the bayonets and guns had been thrown aside for the mortars, rockets, and shells. It is scarcely possible, even with the aid of engravings, to picture the frightful appearance of this stronghold of the insurgents. On the left of the Rue de la Roquette, some houses have been entirely knocked down into heaps of white rubbish; others had been fired, and were now smoking, their ruins propped up with large beams; whilst all along the faubourg the most unlimited destruction had gone on. The French houses are not built with bricks, but appear to be made of "grouting," paving-stones, lumps of chalk, and gypsum, all mortared together, and plastered over with stucco. Hence a cannon-ball does extraordinary mischief, crashing through and breaking down an entire wall in its progress. The Place de la Bastile was filled with idlers, soldiers, workmen, and grisettes, commenting upon or relating the events of the four days, and pointing out the chief points of attack. Of these the corner house of the faubourg appears to have been the principal. Its lower part was occupied by a wine-merchant; and the upper floors by a dealer in wool fabrics, feathers, and bed furniture. Never did we see such entire destruction. The whole of the floors were propped up, to keep them all from crashing through to the ground. The cannon-balls had gone perfectly through the walls, and went into the house beyond, and all the spouts, iron railings, and pillars had been knocked about like straws. The whole mass threatened every moment to tumble down altogether into the streets. The Belle Fermière—a large silk and linen establishment opposite—had been entirely gutted by the artillery; and the house at the left of the Rue de la Roquette, which had been blown to dust, presented a curious sight. High up on one of the walls, the fire-place, or rather stove, alone was left hanging by its chimney, and on each side of it were two pictures, apparently untouched, as was a looking-glass!

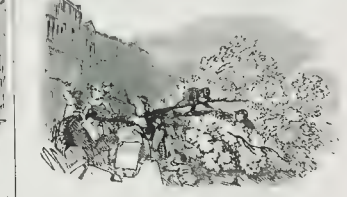
From this spot to the Barrière de Vincennes the road was a series of barricades. A few hack carriages were toiling along it, but the journey must have been indescribably painful both to horse and rider; for the pavement had been roughly put down, as elsewhere, and the vehicles had to be pulled over heaps of granite, and dragged through holes and sloughs of white mud; now driving along the footway, amongst the people, and then with one wheel deep in the gutter and the other on the trottoir, until it is really marvellous how they contrived to get on at all. Here and there one might be seen firmly locked in some fix, without any chance of delivery; but the greater part contrived to scuffle and scramble on to the barrier.



BARRICADE AFTER THE FIGHT—CHILDREN AT PLAY.

We returned by the outer boulevards to the gate facing the entrance to Père la Chaise. In these all the trees had been hacked down, and thrown across the road, the greater part of them being very fine ones, growing immediately under the walls of Paris. This part must have been the last bone of the St Antoine mob, in their retreat to the country. All was now perfectly tranquil. Some little children were playing at see-saw on the boughs, or climbing about them at the old game of "barricades," unnoticed by the sentinel, and at the wine-shops which bordered the route—every house being one—Gardes Mobiles, peasants, and workmen were discussing their "bottle at eight sous," and canvassing the events of the insurrection; whilst the pertinacious urchins who cry the newspapers had carried their enterprise even to this banlieue, and stunned you with their cries, with as much energy as if they had been bawling in the Palais Royal.

A ball was announced at the Chaumière; but the report of the state of the streets after nine, the people shot from windows, and by sentinels for forgetting the password, were not inducements to be out after the retraite had been beaten.

NEWS BOY.

The eye aches with the constant sight of soldiers, bayonets, and half-accoutred guard; and the unceasing riot of the drums, which go on from morning until night, is perfectly bewildering. Literature, the drama, and the arts are at a perfect stand-still: the large hotels are three parts empty; the shops make what display they can with their old articles; and signs of death and mourning are apparent in every direction. You mistrust the prawns in Chevet's window; and do not like to plunge into a restaurateur's, so thinly are they attended. Add to this the dark uncertainty and suspicion that hangs about the city, throwing a general gloom over everything, and you may conceive that, knowing this, whatever your determination may be to go abroad this autumn, your trip will certainly not be in the direction of the hapless city of Paris. Its miserable state will haunt the visitor by day and by night, we are convinced, long after he has quitted it.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

M. Lalanne, who had been appointed successor to M. Emile Thomas, as director of the ateliers nationaux, at Paris, has been arrested on a charge of having sent money to the men engaged in the insurrection in the Rue St. Antoine.

A National Guard, who was at the attack on the Clos St. Lazare, kept one of the cartridges which had been served out to the legions. It was found to contain sawdust instead of powder and the paper of which it was made was the same as used by the government in making out the cartridges.

At Orel, a town in Russia, destroyed by fire on the 7th of June, upwards of 1237 houses, and vast quantities of grain and peas, fell a prey to the flames. The loss is estimated at 5,455,000 silver rubbles. The Emperor has forwarded 30,000 roubles to be distributed amongst the poorer people, and the Ministers have also 10,000 roubles for the same purpose.

The cholera morbus is said to be raging furiously in Wallachia. At Galatz, with a population of 40,000 souls, 748 cases have occurred since January, of which 237 proved fatal

A land blockade of the city of Venice had been established.

Amongst the officers of rank who fought as militiamen with the National Guard, are mentioned Generals d'Astorg, le Castellane, de Bar, Corbin, and Firé.

The small town of Winsen, in Hanover, has been consumed within the last few days: 27 houses and 41 penthouses were destroyed. The unhabitants were celebrating an annual schutzenfest-fest at the time of the catastrophe.

The payment of the dividends on the Consolidated Funds of France, which became due on the 22nd ult., commenced on Tuesday (last week), and continued till the 5th inst.

The Hamburgh barque Therese, from Valparaiso, arrived at Cowes this week, has brought on freight 450,000 dollars in specie.

On the morning of one of the first days of the late Paris insurrection, when the roll of the liberated convicts en surveillance at Rouen was called over, it was found that 800 were absent. They had gone to fight at the Capital

Count Zichy, the late Commandant of the city and fortress of Venice, having been tried by court martial, has been convicted and sentenced to death. The Minister of War has urged the Emperor to confirm the sentence. Count Palfy, the late Governor of Venice, has been dismissed without a pension

An entire alteration has taken place in the time table on the North-Western Railway, in consequence of the directors having ordered an acceleration of express train.

The rallying sign of the insurgents at Paris was a small oaier wand that each of them kept concealed in his sleeve, those borne by the chiefs being forked at the end. Evidence has been obtained, that, besides their general plan of operation, the insurgents had a revolutionary government ready organised.

Among the chiefs of the insurrection who have been arrested, are Napoleon Lebon and Kersausie. The latter is said to be the person who drew up the insurgents' plan of operations.

The packet Hermann has, this week, brought from New York, on freight, 300,000 dollars.

Immediately on the suppression of the insurrection at Paris, an apothecary at the Barriere de Fontainebleau, charged with having manufactured gunpowder for the insurgents, stabbed himself to the heart when the National Guards came to arrest him.

The 8th, 9th, and 12th Legions of the National Guard, having taken part with the insurgents, have been disarmed and disbanded. The 8th comprised the Marais, the 9th the Faubourg St. Antoine, and the 12th the Faubourg St. Marceau (the Garden of Plants, the Gobelins, &c.) The 12th Legion had elected Barbès as its Colonel.

M. Vatrin, Lieutenant-Colonel of the 6th Legion, has been arrested, by order of General Lamoricière. After having been admitted to the conference on the plan of attack, he was taken in the ranks of the insurgents.

The number of muskets taken from the insurgents and the disarmed National Guards at Paris is 50,000.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured Her Majesty Theatre with their presence on Saturday evening last

The Earl of Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty, accompanied by the Junior Lords, Mr. Ward, Secretary to the Board, and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, were present on Saturday last at the launch of the Mars, line-of-battle ship, at Chatham.

The Gardeners' Chronicle announces the re-appearance of the potato disease in the open ground in the neighbourhood of Ashford, and in Sussex, and painted specimens, says the journal, "are now before us from Lord Cranmore's estate in Mayo, and from Yorkshire—the latter in as bad a state as any we saw in 1845 and 1846."

The number of insurgents who have been arrested at Paris amounts to 6,000. Amongst them is the tambour-major of the 12th Legion, called "Le Professeur de Barricades."

During the search made on Wednesday, last week, in the Faubourg St Antonie, the National Guards discovered thirty-seven armed men concealed in the cellar of the house No. 200. They had in their possession 187 loaded muskets and all the necessary utensils for manufacturing bullets. They surrendered without resistance.

The young hero, Martin (of whose triumph we gave an illustration last week), has recovered from the poison which was given to him in a cigar.

On Monday, the special constables of St. Paul's Covent-garden, "who acted on the 10th of April and subsequent days of apprehended tumult," celebrated their services by a commemorative festival at Highbury Tavern. Upwards of 300 of "the force" sat down to dinner.

The value of land in Wales may be ascertained from the fact that at sales last week on the estate of 6000 acres of the Sarcothy and Allygeog estate, the prices realised were equal to thirty, some forty, and some even fifty years' purchase on the present rentals.

Detachments of the workmen belonging to the ateliers nationaux of Paris are en route for Lorient, and other towns of the southern departments of France. Many of these men have expressed their intention to join the Piedmontese army.

A large quantity of linen and lint has been sent to Paris from Bourges for the use of the wounded in the hospitals, where a scarcity of those articles is felt. A similar act of kindness had been performed by the ladies of Rouen

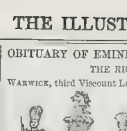
The Queen has conferred a pension on the Civil List of £100 per annum on the sisters of the late professor Moultrie, of Trinity College, Dublin, who were left destitute by his early and lamented decease.

In Paris, every member of the National Guard who did not turn out during the insurrection, and who cannot show legal ground for his absence, is dismissed.

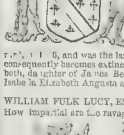
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE RIGHT HON. VISCOUNT LAKE.



WARWICK, third Viscount Lake, whose death occurred a few days since, was the last surviving son of the late, or General Lake, who was elevated to the peerage in 1804, in consideration of the high military talents and general valour he had displayed, as commander of the army during the Mahratta war. This distinguished soldier was grandson of Warwick Lake, Esq., the younger brother of Sir Thomas Lake, of Canons, whose only daughter and heiress Mary, married John Bridges, Duke of Chandos, conveyed to that nobleman her father's ancient seat of Canons. The peer, who seventh viscount, succeeded to the title at the decease of his cousin Edward Francis Gerard, in 1845, and was the last male representative of his family. The peerage consequently becomes extinct. Lord Lake married, 28th November, 1815, Elizabeth, daughter of James Beveridge Duncan, Esq., and has left two daughters, Isabella Elizabeth Augusta and Elizabeth Georgiana.

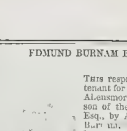
WILLIAM FULK LUCY, ESQ., OF CHARLECOTE-PARK, WARWICKSHIRE



How imperial are the ravages of death! how sudden is its approach, and how [illegible] its touch! Born to the inheritance of "the historic land" of Stratford, with its wide-spreading park and its princely estate; descended from a family of surpassing antiquity, and on just entering on the bright prospects of life, Mr. Lucy is a sad memorial of the instability of this world's happiness.

At the period of his decease, which occurred after a short illness on the 1st inst., he had not completed his 24th year. His father, the late George Lucy, Esq., of Charlecote, some time M.P. for Cowes, was son of the Rev. John Hammond, who assumed the surname and arms of Lucy, as representative of the house, on the decease of his kinsman, Thomas Lucy, in 1807. To the estate of Charlecote, so long the residence of the respected family, Shakespeare's early history has imparted an undying celebrity. "Essentially enchanted in its features" (we quote from Mr. Parke's "Historic Lands"), "this lovely spot is perhaps the most interesting connected with our immortal bard. The old Elizabeth in honour remains the same as in the days of good Queen Bess, and the gentle Avon flows as brightly as of old, beneath its sunny lawns; here are still the venerable oaks under whose shade the poet's fancies sat, and the richly-wooded park through which he loved to roam. Powerful is the magic of genius to be able to give to things and places a charm and character not their own, and to turn to fairy land the green fields and quiet homes of England."

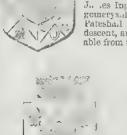
EDMUND BURNAM PATESHALL, ESQ., OF ALLENSMORE,



CO. HEREFORD.

This respected gentleman, a Magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for Herefordshire, died on the 11th inst., at his seat, Allensmore House, in that county, aged 69. He was eldest son of the late Edmund Lechmere, afterwards Pateshall, Esq., by Ann, his wife, daughter and heiress of William Burnam, [illegible] County, and assumed, by royal license, upon the decease of his uncle, in 1826, the additional surname and arms of Burnam. He married, 12th March, 1804, Milborough, eldest daughter and co-heir of the Rev. John Ingram, of Bristol, co. Salop, of an ancient Montgomeryshire family, but has left no issue. The families of Pateshall and Lechmere, from which the deceased derived descent, are both of great antiquity, the former being traceable from the reign of Richard I.

G. E. CARRUTHERS, ESQ.



This gentleman, of high medical standing, a surgeon in the service of the Seven Oaks Light Infantry Militia, was for many years a union-respected inhabitant of Stepney. Mr. Carruthers died of consumption, on the 17th ult., at his residence, Stepney, aged 65. He was twice married, and he leaves by his first marriage four daughters, his co-heirs. His second wife, who survives him, is the youngest daughter and co-heir of that late distinguished baronet, Sir David William Smith, of Ashcombe, in Northumberland. Mr. Carruthers was related to the French Marshal, James Bernard Law, Marquis of Lauriston.

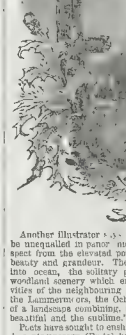
THE COUNTESS DE GREY.

HENRIETTA FRANCES, COUNTESS DE GREY, whose death is just announced, was fifth daughter of William Wilbraham Bootle, first Earl of Enniskillen, and niece, maternally, of Armar Lowry, Earl of Belmore. Her ladyship was born 22nd June, 1784, and married 20th July, 1803, Thomas Philip, Lord Grantham, who eventually succeeded to the Earldom of De Grey, at the decease of his aunt. The surviving issue of this marriage consists of two daughters, viz. Anne Frances, Countess Cowper, and Mary Louisa, wife of Henry Vyner, Esq.

Lady De Grey presided at the Vice-Regal Court in Dublin during the time the Earl was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and gained universal esteem.

EDINBURGH, FROM THE CALTON HILL.

SITE.



Another illustrator [illegible] of Edinburgh is generally admitted to be unequalled in panoramic splendour by any city in Europe; and the prospect from the elevated points of our northernmost capital is of singular beauty and grandeur. The noble estuary of the Forth, expanding from river into ocean, the solitary grandeur of Arthur's Seat, the varied park and woodland scenery which enrich the southward prospect, the pastoral acclivities of the neighbouring Pentland Hills,—and the more showy splendours of the Lammermoirs, the Ochil, and the Grampians, form some of the features of a landscape combining, in one vast expanse, the rich elements of the beautiful and the sublime." (Black's Picturesque Tourist of Scotland.)

Poets have sought to enshrine this splendour of site in the amber of their verse. A contemporary (Delta) has, in a topographic stanza, thus sung its undying glory:

> "Traced like a map the landscape lies,
> In cultured beauty stretching wide.
> There Pentland's green acclivities,
> There Ocean, with his azure tide
> There Arthur's Seat; and, gleaming through > Thy southern wing, Dunedin blue!
> While in the orient, Lammer's daughters,
> A distant giant ranks are seen,
> North Berwick-Law, with cone of green,
> And Bass amid the waters."

This peculiar beauty, it must be acknowledged, pre-eminently fits Edinburgh for panoramic representation, such as we this day submit to the Subscribers to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. In quoting the above witnesses, we may, however, have presumed too far upon the acquaintance of the reader with the locality; hence, its topographic outline is to be accepted—

Edinburgh City is the chief town of Edinburghshire, or Mid-Lothian, and the capital of Scotland. It is situated within two miles of the Frith of Forth, and [illegible] from the borders of England; and by Loch Lomond 71 above the sea; its longitude, west, 3° 10 30′; it is about 392 miles north from London; [illegible] from Carlisle; 47 from Glasgow, 46 miles by railway; and from John o' Groat's House, on the northern point of Scotland, 314 miles.

The city stands upon a group of hills, and a proper knowledge of the configuration of the ground on which it has been built will considerably lessen the difficulty of comprehending a variety of details regarding its picturesque and prospective condition. "From the shore of the Frith of Forth (says Chambers), the ground rises gently towards the south, till, at the distance of a mile, it reaches a level of from 80 to 120 feet above the surface of the sea. Here a congeries of hills and swelling grounds suddenly raffle the smooth surface of the country, having been, to all appearance, cast up by the influence of some tremendous explosion or convulsion, such as it would now be [illegible] to imagine in regard to its causes, its process, or its results! A range of four or five miles would embrace this series of hills, which even in their natural state must have had a very romantic and striking appearance. The general individual in the chain, which can be compared to nothing so aptly as a wedge lying flat upon the ground, is terminated at its highest part by a mass of rock seven acres in superficies at the top, and about 250 feet above the surrounding country; on this stands Edinburgh Castle, the nucleus of the city. Along the [illegible] of the wedge, so to speak, a principal town was built in the shape of one long main street, of a mile in length, [illegible] and close, crowding on both sides towards the neighbouring alley. On the plain at the bottom, the palace of Holyrood House, which was the chief residence of Scottish Royalty in its latter days, took its rise from an ancient monastery. For a thousand years Edinburgh continued perched, like one vast fortress, upon this hill—prevented from expanding partly by the advantage of easy fortification on its original site,

* "Scotland Delineated," in a series of views, by Stansfield, Cattermole, Leitch, Creswick, Roberts, Harding, Nash, and MacCulloch. Drawn in Lithography by J. D. Harding. With Historical, Antiquarian, and Descriptive Letterpress, by [illegible]. London: [illegible]. Vol. VI. London: Hogarth—We have [illegible] this work with its progressive publication. The letterpress of these volumes is executed with a style at once minute and popular. Another work of high character, illustrative of the Baronial and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Scotland (from drawings by Mr. R. W. Billings), is in course of publication by the Messrs. Blackwood.

† Mr. Robert Chambers, F.R.S.E., in a volume just issued, entitled "Ancient Sea-Margins, as Memorials of Changes in the Relative Level of Sea and Land," adduces many of his examples from the hill on which the Old Town of Edinburgh is situated; he adduces traces of flats, or, as it were, landing-places, which correspond with the level of ancient sea-beaches, well marked in the neighbourhood of the city; showing it to be tolerably certain that the data in question were indentations made by the sea, in the course of its subsidence to the present level.

and partly by the difficulty of crossing the neighbouring hollows, one of which was filled by a lake. At length, when the advancing prosperity of the country would no longer tolerate the confined accommodations of the ancient city, bridges were thrown over those hollows, and new districts of town erected upon the adjacent heights. Thus, Edinburgh, like Rome, is a town scattered over and among a range of eminences, some of which ascending in craggy magnificence from amidst the beaten thoroughfares, are capped by tower and temple; while others are hardly approachable by the step of man, and might even yet give shelter to the eagle, which no doubt united them in primeval times. Two of these hills, called Arthur's Seat (726 feet), and Salisbury Crags (550 feet), form, with their precincts, a park adjacent to the palace; and being still kept perfectly free from the intrusion of the town, present peaks and valleys as lonely and wild as if they were in the heart of the Highlands, instead of the immediate vicinity of a populous city. The town of Leith, or the sea-port of Edinburgh, occupies a low situation on the sea-shore, in a north-easterly direction from the city."

NATURAL HISTORY

The climate of Edinburgh partakes of the nature of that of the eastern coast generally. The mean annual fall of rain is about 24 inches, being nearly one-third less than that of the western coast of Scotland

The city, from its peculiar situation, is very much exposed to winds; and this, joined to its altitude above the sea level, renders its atmosphere less mild than that of the surrounding valleys; yet these circumstances, on the other hand, by promoting a free circulation of air, contribute to its general salubrity. Snow seldom lies for any length of time, from the proximity of the sea; and the mean temperature, like that of most parts of Scotland, is truly milder than that of England, while its summer heat is somewhat less. The mean annual temperature of Edinburgh is 2° less than that of London.

The site forms part of the group connected with the coal measures of Mid-Lothian, bounded also by the coal fields of Fifeshire on the north, and all inclosed under the geological denomination of carboniferous sandstone. This deposit is ascertained, in the centre of the coal field, to be 30.0 feet in depth. It seems to have originally formed a hollow trough or basin, and to have been subsequently upheaved by the eruptions of igneous or trap-rocks; and thus to have been formed the irregular surface, and the hills and crags, which impart such a picturesque appearance to the northern metropolis. The Castle Rock and most elevated mass of fine-grained basaltic greenstone; the centre and summit of Arthur's Seat is composed of basalt; and the open, porous structure of the rock, near St. Anthony's Chapel, with glassy, fused-looking matter in the interstices, forcibly suggests the idea of their having undergone intense heat, and their similarity to volcanic products. About a mile and a half north-west of the city of Craigleith Quarry, of fine-grained yellowish sandstone, in which, within the last fifteen years, three human trees, of the pine species, have been discovered. Other plants of the coal beds are abundant here; and above all is a diluvial covering of several feet in depth, consisting of clay with large boulders, and clay and sand containing marine and other animal remains.

The locality is rich in botanical productions, there being not fewer than 400 species of plants found on Arthur's Seat.

"The zoological specimens are no less abundant. Although so near the hum of the great city, the hare is not unfrequently seen limping across the hollows of Arthur's Seat. The fox is an occasional visitor; while the note of the cuckoo never fails to enliven the long and still summer evening. The Pepida Arianarcea, a butterfly not common in the other parts of Scotland, is found in the Queen's Park. The Lacerta agilis and Anguis fragilis, two reptiles, are also not infrequent among the debris of Salisbury Crags. Wilde in the same localities a great variety of shell mollusca—Helix, Bulimus, Succinia, Pupa, Clausula, and many others—are found in great plenty. The blue backed shrike (Lanius excubitor) is an inhabitant of Arthur's Seat. The kestrel hawk breeds on the Castle rock, and the kingfisher is not uncommon on the banks of the Water of Leith."—(New Statistical Account of Scotland.)

CIVIL HISTORY.

Edinburgh is a place of no very high antiquity. Thirteen hundred years ago, no part of its ground now covered by the city was occupied by human habitations; although the rock of Edinburgh may, from remote ages, have been the site of a fort. The surrounding country, at the Norman Conquest, formed the province of Valentia. The district was subsequently occupied by the Saxon invaders from the north of England; and by them received its name in the year 1020, when the Lothians were ceded to the Scottish Monarch, Malcolm II

The oldest name that can now be discovered as applicable to the Castle is Mon-dyn, or Mon-don in Britain, or Maydyn-burgh in Gaelic or Scottish, a fort in the plain, or the good fort; but when the English language came into use, some busy monkish fancies conceived that Maydun was the same as Maydun; hence the fabulous tale of Castrum Puellarum (Maiden Castle), and so on; that it had been a residence of the daughters of the British kings. Chalmers, who has examined a mass of evidence on the etymology, considers the name to be of Celtic origin. Edwin-burgh, from the castle having been assigned, upon the ruins of the year 449, or the era of Anglo-Saxon domination in Lothian, the occasional residence of the chiefs of the Northumbrian dynasty, and from Edwin, the [illegible] king of Deira, who died in 633; though others suppose the fortress to have been originally built by him.

Simeon of Durham mentions the town of Edwines-burgh as existing in the middle of the 8th century; and in the charter of his benefactions of the Abbey of Holyrood, in 1128, King David calls it his burgh of Edwin-esseburgh, whence we may infer it was then a Royal burgh.

From the period of the accession of Lothian to the Scots (920), the Castle continued a very frequent residence of their Monarchs. In the reign of David I. it was a splendid abode; while the town in its vicinity was as populous and important as Berwick upon-Tweed, and a place of great commercial prosperity. This King empowered the canons of the Abbey of Holyrood to build a suburb westward from their church, along the ridge of the rising ground, to meet the burgh, which, by this time, had advanced about half-way towards the sloping surface of the hill from the Castle; and this new town received the name of Canonsburgh, or Canongate, which title has part of the city still retains.

In 1174, in order to regain his liberty, William the Lion surrendered Edinburgh Castle to Henry II., of England, and it was only restored to the Scottish nation in 1186, by the marriage of William to Ermengarde, a cousin of Henry, who [illegible] it as a dower.

Alexander II., son of William the Lion, held a Parliament in Edinburgh in 1215, for the first time. But it was not till long after this period that the city began to assume the lead as the capital of the empire. In 1456, Parliaments began to be regularly held here.

During the warlike incursions of Edward I. into Scotland, the Castle was besieged and taken, in 1296; and remained in possession of the English for seventeen years, until it was again re-captured by Randolph, Earl of Moray. After this, the Castle was demolished by Robert, that it might not again harbour the English forces; but Edward III. rebuilt and fortified it. It did not long remain, however, in the hands of the English, having been strategically recovered by William Douglas.

The city appears to have remained open and defenceless till about the middle of the fifteenth century, when King James II. granted the citizens licence to fortify. In 1461, the exiled Henry VI. of England fled to Edinburgh, and was kindly received by the burgesses. In 1482, James III. took refuge here from his turbulent nobles; and in gratitude for their services, he granted them a charter, making the Provost hereditary High Sheriff within the city; an office which he to this day enjoys: he also presented to the incorporated trades a standard, which still exists, and is called the blue blanket.

Many of the citizens of Edinburgh shared the disastrous fate of their King, James IV., at Flodden Field; and at this period a militia was embodied for the permanent security of the town, under the name of the Town Guard, which existed until the organization of a regular police, in the year 1817.

A French traveller in the year 1600, the Duke de Rohan, describes Edinburgh as the principal town in Scotland, and the chief residence of the King and nobility; but there was only one great street in the centre, and the houses were almost all built of wood; still the place was exceedingly populous. A century before this, the whole of the Borough Moore, or myre, to the south of the city, was covered with wood. During the minority of James V., an affray took place (in 1515) in the High-street of Edinburgh, near the Nether Bow, in which upwards of 250 persons were slain

Henry VIII. of England, defeated by Cardinal Beaton in his project of annexing Scotland to England, by the marriage of his son Edward to the young Queen of Scots. Invaded the country: 200 sail of ships entered the Frith of Forth, and the forces having landed, they burnt the town of Leith and Edinburgh, and plundered and laid waste the adjacent country: this was in 1544, and in 1548 Edinburgh was garrie ned by French troops, who fortified Leith against the English.

In 1555 John Knox arrived in Edinburgh, where the spread of his doctrines led to many eventful scenes: it was the chief position of the Reformers, as Leith was of the Catholics; and the beautiful tract of ground lying between Leith and the eastern base of the Calton Hill became the site of a variety of severe skirmishes. At length, the first Assembly of the Reformed Kirk, as now established, met at Edinburgh, on the 15th of January, 1560.

On August 5, 1561, Mary Queen of Scots arrived at Leith, from France, to take possession of the throne of her fathers, and was well received; but her religion soon made her unpopular. On July 28, 1565, Darnley was proclaimed King at the market-cross, and on the morrow was married in the chapel of Holyrood House. Next year, on March 9, the murder of David Rizzio took place; and on June 19 following, the Queen was delivered of a son, in whose person the crowns of the two kingdoms were destined to be united. Feb. 10, 1567, Darnley, whilst lodged in a solitary house, in a place named the Kirk-of-Field, near the site of the present University, was blown up with gunpowder; and Bothwell, who was not without cause suspected of the murder, having divorced his wife, was married to the Scottish Queen, in the Palace of Holyrood House, on May 15. From the 14th to the 19th of the previous April, the Parliament sat at Edinburgh; and in this week was passed the first British act of toleration upon the principles of indulgence of conscience, and regard to freedom. The infamous marriage of the Queen and Bothwell led to great disturbances in Edinburgh; voices were heard in the streets at midnight, calling aloud for vengeance, and at last, a confederate body of the nobles, entering Edinburgh, compelled the Queen to surrender, when she was carried to Lochleven Castle, as a prisoner.

During the regency which occurred after this, the city was much distracted by the partisans of the imprisoned Queen and the infant King. Kirkaldy, of Grange, the leader of the Queen's party, obtained possession of the Castle, and held it for two years: he also repaired and fortified the city walls: and although the citizens were hostile to his cause, it was not till the Regent obtained succours from Queen Elizabeth, that he was forced to surrender, and with his brother was executed at the cross of Edinburgh.

On James VI coming of age to assume the monarchy, he was received with great state at Edinburgh. His subsequent religious disputes with the people we need not detail. After James's departure to ascend the throne of England (on the death of Elizabeth, in 1603), for a period of 35 years, the city enjoyed tranquility.

In 1529 Charles I. visited Edinburgh, and was received with great pomp: but his forcing on the nation a system and forms of religion to which they were repugnant, soon put an end to this good understanding. At length, in 1639, the Covenanting party now in arms, and took possession of Edinburgh Castle and Dalkeith. A pacific treaty was soon concluded; and in 1641 Charles revisited Scotland, and was sumptuously entertained

During the Protectorate, Cromwell marched with an army into Scotland. In 1650, he took possession of Edinburgh and Leith, and repaired and extended the fortifications at the latter place. The authorities fled to Stirling; but in 1653, on the arrival of the English Council there, the magistrates were reinstated, and the former constitution of the city was restored.

On the Restoration of Charles II., the city of Edinburgh sent his Majesty a present of £1000, as a testimony of its loyalty: how he repaid them by overthrowing their religion, repealing all acts passed since 1633, and enforcing Episcopacy under grievous penalties, how he deposed half the clergy of Scotland for nonconformity, and prohibited conventicles, or all meetings for religious purposes, —the bloodstained annals of the kingdom will tell.

In 1680, the Duke of York, with his Duchess and the nobility of Scotland, were entertained in the Parliament House by the Judiciary. On the 6th of accession, an address, and a more substantial token of loyalty, was presented to him. But this Monarch was equally ungrateful as his predecessor, and soon lost the confidence of the people, by his open adoption of Popery, and his arbitrary acts.

At the glorious Revolution, on the withdrawal of the troops, the Presbyterians flocked to Edinburgh from all quarters; the adherents of the late Monarch fled, the Papists and Episcopalians became objects of public vengeance, and the Palace of Holyrood was demolished. At length, in 1689, the Presbyterian form of church government was re-established

In 1707, took place the Union of the two kingdoms; the discontent at which, and the appointment of English officials to public offices in Scotland, had no small share in fomenting the Rebellion of 1715. Edinburgh, however, remained staunch to the Protestant party. The fortifications of the city were put in proper order. An unsuccessful attempt was made by the rebels to gain possession of the Castle; but they succeeded better with the citadel of Leith.

The Council at this time resumed a project which they had previously formed for the improvement of Leith harbour, by extending the pier, and securing wet and dry docks, at the national expense. The Government would not, however, incur the expense, but encouraged the Council in their plan of improvement, by prolonging for nineteen years the duty of two pennies, Scots, on the pint of ale and bear, sold within the city liberties. The improvements were, accordingly, in part executed; and the city debts, which were then about £25,000, were nearly doubled in the course of five years.

In 1725, an extensive and destructive fire happened in the Lawn Market, which caused considerable loss of property.

In 1736, occurred the famous Porteous mob, which transaction well illustrates the spirit and temper of the Edinburgh public at that time.

At the Rebellion of 1745 the city walls were repaired, and a trench was dug from the north side of the Castle to the north Loch. The events of this period need hardly be recapitulated.

In 1779, the citizens of Edinburgh and Leith were alarmed by the threatened incursion of the noted pirate Paul Jones, who sailed up the Forth, but did not land. This alarm gave occasion to the erection of the Fort to the westward of Leith

From the time of Charles II, till 1822, no Royal visit was made to Edinburgh. On August 15 of that year George IV. landed at Leith, where he was received by the magistrates of the burgh, the judges of the supreme court, a number of the nobility, and an immense assemblage of people. At Holyrood Palace he held a levee: on the 22nd, a grand procession, under the direction of Sir Walter Scott, took place from the Palace to the Castle; and, on the 24th, a splendid banquet was given to his Majesty in the Hall of the Parliament House. On the 26th, the King embarked at Port Edgar.

In 1825, two extensive and destructive fires took place in Edinburgh. By these, many large lands or tenements from the Parliament-square down towards the Tron Church, forming a considerable part of the south side of the High-street, were reduced to a mass of ruins.

In the autumn of 1834, the British Association for the Advancement of Science held its annual meeting in Edinburgh, which was attended by numerous savans from various parts of Europe.

In September, 1842, Edinburgh was again honoured by a visit of Royalty; when Queen Victoria and Prince Albert landed at Granton, and immediately proceeded to D-keith Palace. As this visit was intended for the Duke of Buccleuch and the Marquis of Breadalbane, no public display in the city was at first contemplated. But the public wish being unanimous for the sight of the Sovereign, her Majesty went in procession along the principal streets of the city, to the Castle. A levee, most numerously attended, was also held at Dalkeith Palace. (The subscribers to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS will recollect this to be the first of the Royal Visits engraved in our Journal.)

PROGRESSIVE IMPROVEMENTS.

We have already described the Castle as the nucleus around which the houses of the ancient city were first reared; the extent of the town being, for a considerable period, limited to a street or two. The building of the Canongate, and its junction with Edinburgh, was the first extension of importance To detail the gradual accretion of the city, would occupy more space than we can spare. We may, however, briefly state that such had been the spread of the city in the first quarter of the present century, that in 1827 it was found the building of houses had gone on faster than the increase of population warranted; and little extension of the city or suburbs has since taken place.

THE CITY

Edinburgh is divided into the Old and New Towns. All that portion which lies to the south of the hollow, formerly occupied by the North Loch, and now constituting the Prince's-street Gardens, belongs to the former; while the latter comprehends all the streets to the north of the same.

The Old Town is situated on a high ridge of ground, with one principal line of street, the High-street, extending from the Castle to Holyrood Palace, being the distance of 5970 feet. Parallel to this runs the Cowgate, while numerous closes and wynds extend on each side of the High-street, standing along the declivities of the ridge. The elevated situation, and the irregular height and antiquity of the houses on this ridge, form a very picturesque appearance, and contrast finely with the more modern and regular structures in the New Town. The oldest portion of the New Town forms a regular parallelogram, built upon a nearly level surface, and extending 2000 feet in length by 1000 feet in breadth. Prince's-street, George-street, and Queen-street run parallel to each other; and are intersected at right angles by Hanover-street, Frederick-street, and others. The northern and more recently built portion still retains the general parallelism of the streets, but more variety is introduced by crescent, circle, and octagon.

Again, each town has its own peculiar feature and characters. Thus the Old Town has its wynds and closes, and the Cowgate, one of the earliest additions to the town after the erection of the city wall in the middle of the fifteenth century. Over this street, the South Bridge, and more lately King George the Fourth's Bridge, are thrown, to connect the Old Town with the south side, or southern districts. These di-tricts are mostly upon a rising ground, which is here closely adjacent to the Old Town Ridge, neither so elevated, so limited in extent, nor so romantic in its scenery, as that hill. From its western side, however, there runs a hill of a different character, and thence called the High Riggs. It is separated from the Castle Hill by aspacious street, called the Grass Market; and on it are but i ttlerly seen, and the neighbouring suburbs of Portsburgh. On aline with the South Bridge is the North Bridge, thrown from the summit of the Old Town Ridge, at the middle of the High-street, to the rising ground which forms the site of the New Town, and which, although not quite similar in the character of the Old Town Ridge, and, like it, terminates in a bold rock, named the Calton Hill; but the aspect is wholly different: for having been erected according to regular plans, conceived in a spirit of improvement, the greatest uniformity and beauty characterise its buildings, streets, and squares. From the earth and rubbish thrown from the foundation of the New Town buildings, the earthen mound, was formed as a communication across the morass which lay between the Old and New Town.

The extent of the city actually built upon is about two miles from west to east, and about the same from north to south.

The approaches to Edinburgh are very striking: they do not lie between mean and squalid suburbs, but are lined with well-built streets; the abodes of poverty being, for the most part, confined to those gigantic piles of building in the older parts of the city, where they so essentially contribute to its picture-queness.

"The general architecture of the city," say, "Black's Picturesque Tourist," "is very striking, whether we regard the picturesque disorder of the buildings in the Old Town, or the symmetrical proportions of the streets and squares in the New. Of public edifices, it may be observed that, while the greater number are distinguished by chaste design and elegant masonry, there are none of those sumptuous structures which, like St. Paul's, or Westminster Abbey, York Minster, and some other of the English provincial cathedrals, astonish the beholder alike by their magnitude and their architectural splendour. But in no city of the kingdom is the general standard of excellence so well maintained. If there is no edifice to overwhelm the imagination by its magnificence, there are comparatively few to offend taste by their deformity or meanness of design. Above all, Edinburgh is wholly exempt from such examples of ostentatious deformity as, in London, may be observed, that, while the greater number are distinguished by chaste design and elegant masonry, there are none of those sumptuous structures which, like St. Paul's, or Westminster Abbey, York Minster, and some other of the English provincial cathedrals, astonish the beholder alike by their magnitude and their architectural splendour. THE RIGHT OF WAY.—THE GLEN TILT OBSTRUCTION.

The tourist season is about to commence. The grouse and the red deer will shortly call our legislators to the moors and the mountains. London will go out of town. The pursuit of health and recreation amid the beauties and sublimities of nature, will drive its swarms to the mountains of Wales, the lakes of Westmoreland, and the magnificent Highlands of Scotland. The unsettled state of the Continent will in all probability very greatly increase the number of home tourists. Of late years, Scotland, owing to the facilities of steam travelling both by sea and land, has been visited by annually increasing multitudes; and it is but reasonable to suppose that the political circumstances of the present period will very greatly augment the number of pilgrims to her lochs and mountains. For this reason, the travelling public—and who in these days is not a traveller?—is very greatly interested in a question now pending before the Courts of Law in Scotland. When first mooted last year it excited considerable surprise, if not indignation, not only among tourists, but among the public of all classes—especially in England, where the right of way is jealously guarded by the people, and seldom interfered with by the proprietors of land. We allude to the shutting-up of "Glen Tilt" by the Duke of Athol, and the forcible expulsion of a Professor of Geology and his pupils, by the Duke's orders, if not by his personal assistance. The Professor, it will be remembered, was using a road which had been used from time immemorial by shepherds and drovers; and which was, moreover, the shortest cut between Blair Athol and Braemar, through an uncultivated country, which the proprietor had suffered to lie in a state of nature.

Before alluding more particularly to this individual case, we should remark that more than usual interest is felt in its decision, because it is but one of a thousand almost equally oppressive. Scottish proprietors have not imitated the good feeling of English landlords in this respect. Though English land is so much more valuable than Scottish land, proprietors in Scotland have been more jealous of intrusion into their barren solitudes than Englishmen have been into their rich pastures and plantations. Various reasons have been given for this churlishness and infraction of a popular right, which the people of this country—whatever their condition in life may be—are accustomed to regard with so much reverence and affection. The chief of these reasons has been the alleged necessity for preserving game, especially deer, which is an animal so timid, that a deer forest, where the sport of deer-stalking can be properly exercised, must be in the midst of a solitude larger than many English counties. Upon this pretence the Duke of Leeds shut up a road leading to Glen Lui Beg, and the stupendous altitudes of Ben Mac Dhui, a mountain recently proved to be higher than Ben Nevis, and consequently the highest yet ascertained in Great Britain. Other proprietors have shut up roads without alleging any pretence whatever. "Habbie's How," near Edinburgh, a spot immortalized by Allan Ramsay, was in this way rendered inaccessible to visitors; a knoll on the Blackford Hills, where a magnificent view of the same capital was to be obtained, and which is celebrated in a well-known passage in Scott's "Marmion," was also barred against the foot of the lover of nature; and even on the sea-shore of the Frith of Clyde, a proprietor took it into his head to prevent the intrusion of the foot of his fellow-man on the barren pebbles of the beach. Nay, one proprietor, not now in existence, actually carried this spirit of intolerance so far, as to place a barrier across the entrance of the famous Cave of Fingal, in the island of Staffa, a spot visited by strangers from every civilised country of the world. But the very sea revolted against this churlishness, and washed away his gates so frequently, that he gave up the obstruction in despair, as somewhat more troublesome to keep in order than the sightseers themselves.

In May last, process was served upon the Duke of Athol, with the view of bringing these questions once for all to the decision of the law; and within the last few days, the case of "Torrie and others v. the Duke of Athol" has been under the consideration of the Court of Session in Edinburgh. The plaintiffs, or as they are styled in Scotland, the pursuers, are three in number—one an inhabitant of Edinburgh, a second of Perth, and the third of Aberdeen. The question—which they have raised on behalf not only of the locality which may be supposed to be more immediately interested, but of the whole public, including of course all the swarms of visitors, tourists, and sightseers from England, America, and the Continent of Europe—is, whether there is an ancient right of way through Glen Tilt; and whether the right is solely a right for shepherds, and people dwelling in the neighbourhood, dependent upon their good conduct, or on the proprietor's pleasure, or whether it is a right belonging to the whole people. It is a feature in this case, which has been dwelt upon by the counsel retained for the Duke, that none of the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood have ventured to complain of the shutting up of the road; but every one who is acquainted, even slightly, with the peculiarity of the relationship subsisting between a great landed proprietor in Scotland and the people upon his estate, will not attribute this fact to any absence of ground for complaint, but to the true reason—fear of offending so mighty a potentate as the absolute owner of a district larger than the county of Middlesex, who has it in his power to ruin any one of them. The case, in other respects, was well put by his Grace's counsel,

"A person resident at Land's-End, might say to himself, 'This road through Glen Tilt is a great line of communication between Aberdeen and Blair A[thol] and joins with the great line of communication through Edinburgh, [Blair Athol and Land's-End. I may have occasion to travel alon[g] ...ol, the road, is a public road—I am a member of the public—and, [if] ...etween ... the road—raise a summons of declarator against the Duke of Athol; [" ...erefore, I shall ...and thus, according to the argument of the pursuers (plaintiffs), a single individual, residing at Land's End, was entitled to insist on opening this road. It would be observed that this was a new and very difficult question. His learned friend made the observation that, of the cases quoted by Mr. Patton, there were none bearing directly on the point. He admitted that, in all of them, the parties had set forth an immediate interest in respect to locality of pressing use and possession; but he said that that did not prove their case. Now he quite admitted that the precedents did not prove his case, but they went to show that in all similar cases no one yet has challenged a road, except one who, by a circumstantial locality, could set forth a pressing and immediate interest. To that extent, at least, there could be no doubt. When he came to look at it, his Lordship would find that, by deciding for the pursuers, he would introduce a new element into the practice of the law of Scotland, with which they had not hitherto been accustomed to deal, because there were many other public rights, such as the right of way, of ferries, free harbours, streams, and shores, in all of which the public had an interest. The question—the broad general question which his Lordship had now to determine for the first time was, whether a single individual living at a distance, because he was a member of the public, although he could not show any direct interest whatever, harmful or perhaps more than a particular spot, whether such an individual had a good right and interest to challenge obstructions, or whatever regards the public interest."

We have no wish to prejudge the case in the matter of fact. Either this road, through one of the grandest scenes in the world, is a public road, or it is not; either the Duke has a right to shut it up, or he has not—but we, and all admirers of the beauties and sublimities of natural scenery, have an interest in the decision of the question, so that landed proprietors may be taught to respect the rights of the public, and that the public may be taught to respect those of landed proprietors. There is, it is said, an ancient right in Scotland, known as the right of "Free foot in the wilderness," by which no man who allows his land to lie barren can prevent people from walking over it. The law or right would apply to large districts in Scotland—to moors, and glens, and mountain tops, as well as to the sea-shore; and it is to be desired that the patriotic individuals who have raised, on public grounds, this action against the Duke of Athol, to try the simple question of the right to a long-recognised path, would raise hereafter the equally interesting question of "Free foot in the wilderness." Every year will make the question more important, and its speedy decision will prevent much ill-will between classes. Landed proprietors will lose nothing by its decision in favour of the public. Their property will not be injured, and they will be spared the reproaches, not alone of the ignorant, but of educated and thoughtful men. No one who thoroughly admires the beauties of natural scenery is of so insignificant and worthless a class as to be outraged in a matter of this kind with perfect impunity. His ill-will finds many vents, and all such vents are injurious to him who stands in the position of an aggressor. Law has given a right to the land, but it is Nature herself, the mother and source of law, which has given a right to the landscape. At the same time, we do not shut our eyes to the fact that many proprietors who have generously opened up paths for the public, where paths did not exist before, have met but an ungrateful return for their kindly forethought. To injure plantations, to deface ruins and monuments, to molest animals, to mutilate works of art, are, unhappily, not rare occurrences amongst the herd of snobs who sometimes find their way into the country in search of the picturesque. We would fain believe, however, that such travelling "gents" are in a minority, and that their number is continually on the decrease. The man who shuts up a path to the public is not less a snob who abuses a right to the injury of his neighbour; or who casts dirt in the face of him who, in the public interest, and not his own, has accorded an unsought privilege to the people. The reprobation we cast upon the one, we bestow upon the other; and sincerely trust not only that the landed proprietor will be both just and generous, but that tourists of all classes will not abuse either rights on the one side, or privileges on the other.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The disposition which existed in Paris to bury in oblivion, as far as possible, the atrocious conduct of the insurgents in the late lamentable outbreak, has been, we learn, greatly checked by a discovery which has come to light in the closing up and commencement of the present week. Among these is the death of General Duvivier, who was esteemed one of the bravest Generals of the army of Africa. He was wounded on the 26th ult. in the engagement at the Faubourg St. Antoine, and died on last Saturday morning at the Military Hospital of the Val de Grace. He had unfortunately disregarded his wound at the commencement of the inflammation and fever set in, and ultimately took law, which term-nated his brilliant career in the 54th year of his age. But that which has excited the deepest horror and indignation in Paris, is the nightly assassination of sundry of the Gardes Mobile. The most harrassing spies of insurrection are all the well-disposed individuals of the French capital, convicts and the liberated fiendish ruffians of every part of it, who imagine themselves nearly 15,000 in a merit, mingled with whom are vast numbers of liberated convicts of the cat-o'-nine-tails order, all the dregs of the population of Paris is surrounded. Leaders distributed through the different quarters, and agents lying in ambuscade, were especially in the detached forts with which communicate with these prisons of these detached forts about with insurrection taken in this way. Six Natives opportunity of firing upon all parties who Romainville. Even the streets of Paris by day or night passes that lives are cannot walk through without feeling hands have been thus assassinated at assassin. Meanwhile even the arbitrary power cannot be said to be safe, one vested is insufficient to repress the audacious deeds which the executive is intand the Red Republic. The recent open sneers of journals of Socialism and on the Assembly itself, the result of universal suffrage—capable of conferring faced epal ges for the atrocities of the late insurrection, appear daily—barcolumns of those journals.

On Friday (last week) an attempt was made to shoot with an air-gun a young lad, a Garde Mobile, in the Rue St. Martin, even in open day, at noon. The consequence of such a fearful state of things was a general acquiescence in the maintenance of the state of siege, which has been somewhat relaxed in Paris, but continued to be strictly maintained in the banlieue, more particularly at Belleville and its neighbourhood, where the National Guard was disarmed; 4000 muskets were, however, at first unlawfully detained by some of the inhabitants, who took an active part in the insurrection.

The Mayor of Paris assembled the mayors of the different arrondissements of the capital on Friday last week, to inform them of the measures he had adopted for the disarmament and reorganisation of the National Guard, and the distribution of relief to distressed families. The disarmament of the National Guards of the 8th, 9th, and 12th arrondissements, whose dissolution had been decreed, was proceeding satisfactorily. It was complete in the 12th, 4000 more muskets had been surrendered, in the 8th considerable dépôts of arms had been discovered; but several portions of the arrondissement had not been completely searched, and required a re-examination. In the 12th district a considerable quantity of arms that had been originally distributed were seized. In the nine other legions the disarmament was partial, 27 companies only having been dissolved. Many muskets were found in the wells, sewers, cellars, and in the Canal of St. Martin. The operation once terminated, the Government was to proceed to reorganise the National Guard, so that the civic militia, devoted, by its very institution, to the maintenance of order, the defence of the laws, and the rest the laws, shall not be divided into two hostile camps, as it was in June last, and provoke another insurrection. All citizens living in furnished lodgings, or receiving temporary in the arrondissements, hereafter will not be admitted to serve in the ranks of the National Guard. Relief continued to be distributed to the unemployed workmen, through the medium of agents, who day, until the resumption of labour. M. Marrast, in conclusion announced the intimate adoption of measures for encouraging industry and relieving the capital from the presence of its superabundant labouring population.

It was the prevailing conviction in Paris that the partizans of the République Rouge were still hampering with the "ouvriers." The terrors of the prison and the court-martial were, however, potent in preventing any overt or general demonstration. They were sure to try for success upon the certainty that distress and misery from want of employment would continue to augment until winter set in, and render the lower classes desperate, when recourse to other revolt would inevitably take place. The only effect of this belief was to stimulate the Government to continue its efforts for the total and entire disarmament of the disaffected. It was calculated that 120,000 men were and would be desirous of employment in Paris, and that consequently they would be an easy prey to the Communists and Socialists.

The Committee of the Assembly on labour adopted on Saturday an important resolution. On the motion of Messrs. Level and Rondeau, the Committee admitted in principle that individuals who, by ill-treatment, menace, or acts of [illegible] should attempt to prevent labourers from working, or interfere in [illegible] labourers, shall be liable to an [illegible] of imprisonment for a period not exceeding [illegible] months.

In the Assembly continual, in its bureaux, the examination of the project of Constitution. The great question of "Two Chambers" was the object of important deliberations on Friday and Saturday. The principle was admitted in several, particularly in the 14th, when it was carried by 26 against 10.

The National Assembly would, it was believed, undertake to frame all the laws of the Constitution, in which case it would sit twelve or fifteen months longer. The 10th bureau, to which two members of the former Provisional Government (Messrs Garnier-Pagès and Crémieux) belong, and the President of the Council of Ministers, had proposed that a fixed and permanent committee of 78 members be appointed to represent the Assembly during its adjournments.

The 10th bureau adopted, on the motion of M. Garnier-Pagès, after a long and warm discussion, an additional article, providing that no search-warrant should be carried into execution against a representative of the people, without the authorisation of the National Assembly.

In virtue of a decision of the Executive Power, and on the proposition of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Baron de Freddain, Chargé d'Affaires of Sicily, and M. Parant, First Secretary of Legation, had been authorised to maintain official relations with the Government of the Republic

Troops continued to arrive daily in Paris, where the Government had wisely resolved to concentrate a considerable force. A portion of those troops, belonging to the army of the Alps, lately crossed the department of the Yonne; 000 men were ordered to remain in that department.

Major Constantin, one of the officers charged with the investigation of the facts connected with the conspiracy of June, had been arrested. He was interrogating one of the insurgents, and treating him somewhat harshly, when the latter asked him if he was not M. Constantin, who was to be appointed Minister of War had the insurrection succeeded, and who repeatedly came to encourage them at the barricades, dressed in a blouse and a casquette. M. Constantin admitted the fact, and other insurgents having recognised him, and confirmed the statement of their comrade, the Colonel presiding over the Council of War ordered him to be arrested. M. Constantin inhabited the Faubourg St. Antoine, and was chief of the Cabinet of the Ministry of War under General Subervie

The investigation of the facts connected with the conspiracy of June is far from being terminated, as the several journals. It is, however, prosecuted with the utmost activity. The Judges of Instruction of the Civil Tribunal of Paris, and three lawyers acting as assistants to the military commission, are in permanence at the Fort of Ivry, where that commission has arrested upwards of eight hundred prisoners. It is in that fort the chiefs of the barricades, the principal insurgents, and the supposed murderers of General Bréa and of Captain Mangin, who were allured behind a barricade and then assassinated, are confined. One of the prisoners, the chief of the barricade of Fontainbleau, has asserted, with shameless effrontery, that when General Bréa perceived that he had been led into a snare, he came to him, taking him by the hand, said, "Friend, save me! I will ever consider you as a father—you can easily save me!" A quarter of an hour afterwards the General was brought into the guard house, where he fell pierced with thirty balls. It was that same chief of the barricade who gave the signal, by firing the first shot at the General. When General Bréa presented himself to the insurgents to parley, he was accompanied by his aide-de-camp, Captain Mangin, and by Captain Desmarets, of the 24th Regiment of the line. The latter escaped the fury of the insurgents by concealing himself under the camp bed. He was thus present at the dreadful scene which terminated in the murder of the General and his aide-de-camp; and he has recognised their assassins in the prisoners named Dain, Nourrit, and Maillard. Several insurgents have made important revelations, and, on their depositions, two hundred and fifty arrest warrants were issued on Saturday against lodgers, wine retailers, and other persons, some of whom hold a high station in society.

It is understood to be the intention of Government to transport to Senegal, or other distant points, the most dangerous of those implicated in the late insurrection, but that all the comparatively minor offenders will be sent to the least agreeable part of Algeria.

The Minister of Finance has fixed the interest payable on Treasury Bonds, having from three to five months to run from the 11th inst., at 5½ per cent. per annum, and at 6 per cent. on those bonds having from six to twelve months to run.

The National Assembly formed itself into a Secret Committee on Monday afternoon to regulate its expenditure. It fixed its budget for eight months at 5,324,217f. (£213,000), of which 3,400,000f. (£216,000) is reserved to pay the members 25f. a day (£1) for their attendance. It may be observed here that the expenses of the late Chamber of Deputies for the year 1847 was only 786,286f. (£31,500). The Committee then resolved that, in case the representatives should be detained by illness from attendance to their duty, or should be absent on leave, their allowance should be still to continue to them. It was likewise resolved that the pay of the representatives should not be subject to attachment for debt.

General Cavaignac has removed to the Hotel in the Rue de Varennes, which was the property of the late Princess Adelaide of Orleans.

The accounts from the provinces continue to be favorable. Operations have been resumed within the last few days at the iron-works of St. Dizier, in the department of the Upper Maine, where a number of hands are employed.

At Mulhouse tranquillity prevails, although the operatives are suffering extreme distress. The manufacturers of that town had resumed work

At Rouen commerce was recovering slowly. Fresh attempts to create disturbances had occurred at Lillebonne, which were, however, suppressed by the troops, without a collision

The Echo du Nord announces that 2000 of the insurgents, who fled from Paris after their defeat, have been arrested in the neighbourhood of St. Quentin.

General Cavaignac (President of the Council) has issued the following decree:—

"Article I. Four military commissions shall be constituted, each composed of seven military men, of which the president shall be a superior officer.

"Art. 2. These commissions shall be charged, commencing all the warrants, and other evidence, submitted to them, shall give judgment.

"1. As to the discharge of the accused, subject, however, to the approbation of Colonel Duvivier.

"2. On the individuals liable to transportation.

"3. On those to be sent before the permanent courts-martial of the 1st division.

"All in conformity with the decree of the 27th June.

"Article III. The courts-martial shall assemble at the seat of the Central Committee at the Palais de Justice, upon an order to be given to them by Colonel Bertrand."

The remaining articles merely contain the names of the members of the Commissions.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

MONDAY.—The President apprised the Assembly of the result of a visit he had paid to the civil and military hospitals, accompanied by the Mayor of Paris, the Bishop of Orleans, Military hospitals, and by General Bedeau. There were still 1600 wounded, and lying in the hospitals. He had witnessed great sufferings, great miseries, but also great consolations, and administered to the unhappy victims all the consolations that religion could afford them. The prayers of the National Assembly were requested by the wounded, who expressed their profound respect and gratitude, and rounded with every care by the medical order and liberty. They were surrounded with every care by the medical order and liberty. They were surrounded with every care by the medical order and liberty. They were surr of the "hon. members" are mere peasants, understanding no language but their own provincial Italian, German, or Bohemian. About forty of them, elected in the province of Gallicia, engaged two rooms at an hotel on their arrival at Vienna, and intimated in the host that they required no beds, but intended to sleep on straw. They can neither read nor write. They have since been quartered in the barracks of the Polish regiment. The members for Vienna had not yet been chosen.

The general character of the Assembly may, from these facts, be generally understood. Indeed, three-quarters of its members are men of the greatest ignorance and incapability. Two of them are Jews, who have been Austrian spies, if not leaders, in the massacre of Tarnow, in Gallicia. To crown all, there is one-fourth of them who cannot speak German, and there is more than one of such among them. The following is a detail of the state of parties:—The Camarilla, led by Jesuits and women, form the extreme right, and are in the proportion of one-fifteenth; the Germanic aristocracy and Sclavonic peasantry, six-fifteenths; the Conservative or Ministerial party, who wish for Austria's independence of Germany, is represented by three-fifteenths, and rallies round the black and yellow flag; the party of the left, with Archduke John, have, as their symbol, the red, black, and gold flag, which represents the interests of Germany as a confederacy, in the proportion of three-fifteenths; and the extreme left, or Radical party, of two fifteenths. It is probable that this Assembly will be forcibly dissolved, the dissatisfaction and apprehension respecting it being general.

The deputation from the National Assembly of Frankfort waited on the Archduke John on the 5th inst., to announce to his Royal Highness his election to the office of Reichsverweser (Vicar of the Empire). His acceptance of the appointment was announced by a salute of 101 guns. On his appearing on a balcony of the Palace, he made a short address to the surrounding multitude to the following effect—"Austrians, you see me in the midst of the Deputies of Germany, and my earnest desire is that this day may be a great benefit to our Fatherland."

His Royal Highness was received with immense cheering, bands playing and chorus singing the "Deutscher Vaterland." Since his arrival in Vienna as the Emperor's representative, he has received guests at his table daily, instead of living retired like the other members of his family; some two or three of the National Guard on duty at the palace always being of the number

On the 7th, his Royal Highness the Archduke John issued a proclamation in which he stated that he had resolved to accede to the wishes of the deputies of the German National Parliament, and to quit Vienna on the 8th, for the purpose of entering upon the honourable post to which he has been called by the voice of a great people. His Imperial Highness will, however, remain at Frankfort only for such time as is indispensable for the first acts of his new dignity. He will open the Diet at Vienna on the 18th, with great solemnities, if the internal constitution of the Assembly shall be completed by that time.

HUNGARY.

Intelligence, dated Pesth, the 1st, states that the King has appointed the Archduke Stephen his lieutenant, with powers unlimited over Hungary and the adjacent provinces. Thus the Archduke will be able to sanction the projects of law, and exercise all the rights which the Hungarian Constitution grants to the King. His Majesty has promised to visit both in the course of this month. The Lieutenancy of the Archduke Stephen will last till his arrival. The Council of Ministers have reserved not to enter into negotiations with Baron Gellachich, but they have decided that after the victory the Croats should keep their rights.

BOHEMIA.

Letters from Prague of the 4th announce the perfect re-establishment of tranquillity in that city. A rigid search, however, is still being carried on by the authorities.

Martial law was to be removed on the 5th, and the theatres were to re-open on the 6th.

Reinforcements were daily being despatched to Italy.

The Sclavonic Congress will, it is said, re-assemble to finish their labour, and their decisions will be made public. Deputies to the Imperial Parliament at Vienna are also being chosen.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

The news of the probable renewal of hostilities, which was published, has been contradicted this week by more agreeable intelligence—that of an armistice between the belligerent parties. Count Pourtalès having been sent from the Court of Prussia to the King of Sweden, for the purpose of facilitating the conclusion of an armistice between Germany and Denmark, conferences were held at Malmo between that diplomatist and the Swedish and Danish Ministers for Foreign Affairs. The result was, that an armistice for three months was agreed upon. The principal conditions are the following:—

The German troops to evacuate the Du hies, and the Danish troops Alsen

The Provisional Government is to continue to carry on the administration in the Duchies until a new Administration shall have been formed out of natives of the Duchies, two members to be named by the King of Denmark and two by the King of Prussia, the President to be named by those four, by mutual agreement; but if they cannot agree, by England.

All blockades are to cease immediately; all prisoners, military and political, are to be set at liberty without delay; the captured vessels and their cargoes to be released, and the military requisitions made in Jutland to be set off by Germany against such cargoes of German ships as may have been sold already.

If within three months the preliminaries of peace be not agreed upon, one month's notice to be given for both parties to resume the military positions they now hold.

POLAND.

From Warsaw, under date of the 4th inst., we have intelligence of a painful nature, exhibiting the usual military punishment of Russia, in its most odious aspect, as being applied to political offend rs

The numerous arrests in different parts of the kingdom have rendered it necessary that the prisons should be cleared by the removal of the persons who were confined there for the insurrection in Cracow in 1846. Forty of them have been condemned to go to Siberia, and were carried off during the night to Modlin, where four of them were condemned to the gauntlet. Mazarski, who was arrested in Magdeburg, and given to the Russian authorities, received 1000 strokes: Acord, 800; Wenda, 500; Karasinski, 800. Mazarski, after having received 600 strokes, could not proceed further, and, indeed, could scarcely stand; he therefore was placed in a cart and dragged through the lines to receive the remainder of the prescribed strokes The poor fellow stands very little chance of recovery, for he is literally flayed in pieces.

Several young Poles belonging to Prussia, who had fled to Posen, and had returned home for the purpose of joining the Republican Polish Ministry, have been arrested, and compelled to enlist in the Prussian army.

PRINCIPALITIES OF THE DANUBE.

Advices received this week mention that the long-foreseen revolution had at length broken out at Bucharest. Prince Bibesco, in attempting to escape, was fired at unanimously by three buyers, but without effect. Although one of the bullets grazed his epaulette. The details of the insurrection are as yet unknown. This much seems certain, that on receiving information thereof, the Russian and Turkish troops stationed on the frontiers immediately invaded the country.

The occupation of Moldavia by Russian troops is positively affirmed by several credible authorities. The Russian Consul General, M. Duhamel, had hastened from Jassy to Bucharest, and thence to Servia. In addition to this formidable foe there was present another almost equally dangerous the cholera-morbus. According to official data, 101 cases out of 440 in the city of Bucharest proved fatal between the 9th and the 13th June, in Galatz, 1 608 patients attacked in the month of May, 218 succumbed; and the last lists (published the first week in June) show that the mortality was daily increasing, the average number of fresh cases being about 30 per diem. The situation was attributed to the intense heat of the weather.

TURKEY.

Letters from Constantinople of the 27th ult. state that Sir S. Canning arrived in that capital on the 24th, in the Antelope steam-ship. The cholera was still raging in that city, and making ravages at Odessa and Chesmé.

GREECE

By the Levant mail, we have received the Athens journals and correspondence to the 29th ultimo. The insurrection still prevailed on the Turkish frontiers. Sir Stratford Canning had left the Piræus on the evening of the 27th. In the steamer Amalopos, intending to touch at Patras and Cape Skrifinaki, before going to Constantinople. During his stay at Athens, he had frequent interviews with the King, which had given hopes that, by his counsels and persuasion, a change might have been effected in the deplorable policy of the Government. Much disappointment was, however, felt at the absence of all result. The same system which has prevailed hitherto was still continued.

The Greek Government had positively refused to give up the assassin of the Turkish Minister, M Musso..us.

UNITED STATES

Advices to the 28th and 30th ult. have been received this week. In Congress the Oregon Bill had been under discussion The excitement consequent upon the forthcoming election for the Presidency continued to increase. A convention of Barnburners, assembled at Utica, had nominated Martin Van Buren for President, and Henry Dodge, of Wisconsin, for Vice-President. In answer to an address from the Barnburners, Van Buren had published a lengthy reply, in which he announced his determination, previously expressed in 1844, to retire from political life, to be unchanged. He declined a nomination.

It was said that Mr. Clay was about to give in his adhesion to the nomination of Gen. Taylor, and call upon his friends to enlist under the Taylor banner. The ratified treaty had not reached Washington.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The accounts from Venezuela, which is the theatre of civil war at present, are conflicting. Advices, dated Porto Cabello, June 16, say that, according to the statements of the Government party, Maracaibo, the last foothold of the friends of the constitution, was taken possession of on the 30th ult., by a division of General Monagas's army. The caste, it was understood, yet remained in the hands of the opposition, but could not hold out long. If the information communicated by the so-called Government party can be relied on, the civil war may be considered at an end. Another account, of the same date, states positively that General Paez, with a strong force, was in full possession of Maracaibo, and that the public opinion even of the Government officers was that they would succeed in their patriotic endeavours to maintain the Constitution. Trade, owing to the unsettled state of affairs, was extremely flat.

MEXICO.

From Queretaro we learn that Herrera had been elected President, and that the usual addresses had been exchanged between the Government and the United States Commissioners.

The United States troops were moving homewards. General Patterson's division left the city of Mexico on the 30th May; General Marshall's was to follow on the 1st of June; and, on the 8th, General Butler was to start in company with Mr. Sevier. General Butler has issued an order declaring that no soldier will be discharged from service until his arrival in New Orleans, or at or port of destination This effectually settles the project of organising in Vera Cruz a force for invading Yucatan.

Accounts from Yucatan represent it to be still in the most deplorable condition.

WEST INDIES

HAYTI.—Advices from Hayti inform us that in consequence of the disturbed state of affairs, all the connect population were emigrating, and the business of Port-au-Prince, at least, was expected to fall into the hands of foreigners. President Faustin Soulouque arrived at Jeremie on the 9th of May with an army of 2000 men. Since his arrival the severest measures have been adopted by his Administration towards those accused of hostility towards the Government. All was quiet at Gonaives on the 4th, and the Mulattoes were acting as soldiers in defence of their property. The Negroes, it was reported, had built a bloody fight near Acomel, in which about 200 men and children were killed. Their blood was drunk by the maddened wretches who slew them.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

EMILIA GEORGIANA, COUNTESS OF WINCHELSEA.

HER Ladyship, the second wife of George William, Earl of Winchelsea, was born the 1st July, 1805, the youngest daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Bart., by the Lady Mary, the fifth daughter of William, the last Duke of Manchester. Lady Winchelsea was the cousin-german of the present Lord Acland, and grand niece of the Duke of Wellington. Her marriage took place on the 17th February, 1837, but there was no issue from it. She died at Haverholme Priory, Lincolnshire, on the 10th instant.

RICHARD BENSON WARREN, ESQ., H.M. SECOND SERGEANT-AT-LAW IN IRELAND.

By the death of this distinguished lawyer the Irish bar has lost its most learned and its ablest member. For many years past, his position in the Equity Courts of Dublin was second to none; and since the elevation of the late Chief Justice Pennefather to the Bench, Mr. Warren was deemed the leader of the Chancery bar. His call bears date Michaelmas Term, 1806. In 1824 he obtained the honour of a silk gown, and in 1841 was promoted by Sir Robert Peel to the rank of Serjeant-at-law. From the earliest period of his forensic career, Mr. Warren gave promise of all those acquirements which years of professional labour matured to the highest excellence As a lawyer he was profound and accurate, closely imbued with the principles of his profession, and thoroughly skilled in practice, details

"They who contemplate the late Mr. Warren" (we quote from a contemporary Journal), "merely as a lawyer, can form by no means an adequate estimate of his character and qualities. To learning and ability he united the highest tone of mind and morals, the kindest and the gentlest deportment. Throughout his long and successful career, Serjeant Warren was never known to swerve from the most scrupulous adherence to his principles; he sought no favours, he compromised no opinions which his judgment sanctioned. He made no enemies, though he gained innumerable friends. Of his domestic life, and his discharge of those sacred relations, we speak not. His mourning relatives can best attest the worth of him whom, for a season, they have lost."

The learned gentleman died at his residence in Leeson-street, Dublin. As a testimony of respect to his memory, and her the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, or the Master in Chancery, sat in their courts the day of the Serjeant's decease. A portrait of Mr. Warren, sketched in the Court of Queen's Bench at Dublin during the late trials, appeared in this Journal for May 20, 1848.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS

On Saturday last, Francis Looney, aged thirty-four, described as a cabinet maker, was placed in the dock charged with misdemeanour. The Attorney-General, in stating the case to the jury, said that the prisoner was indicted on two separate charges for attending and speaking at two meetings on the 6th of June, the one held in Blackfriars-road, and the other at Stepney, and which were held to express sympathy with John Mitchel. The prisoner, after a lengthened trial, was found "Guilty."

On Monday morning, at ten o'clock, Lord Chief Justice Wilde took his seat on the bench, and Ernest Charles Jones, twenty-nine, barrister-at-law, was called upon to surrender. Having answered, he was placed at the end of the counsel's table, and was arraigned upon an indictment charging him with sedition, attempting an unlawful assembly, and a riot, at Bishop Bonner's Fields, on the 4th of June last.

The Attorney-General then rose, and proceeded to open the case for the prosecution. It would be with considerable pain that he should have to lay the circumstances of this case before the jury, for the defendant belonged to the same profession as himself, and therefore was a person who knew well what he would be at effect of his language, not only upon the minds of those to whom it was addressed, but also its bearing in a legal sense. He was a person of education and reading, and therefore the jury would find that, in the sedition he had spoken, there was not that grossness that had been exhibited in the speeches of the others; and they would find that it had been delivered in more measured terms, and with greater correctness. He should not ask the jury to find him guilty on parts of the defendant's speech he should not direct their attention to particular words, but he should put it before them as a whole, and they would see that its object and meaning were, "Organize, arm, and prepare to resist the authorities" The learned Attorney-General having submitted the prisoner's sedi tious language at length to the jury, the latter, after a trial which lasted to six o'clock in the evening, found the prisoner guilty.

THE SENTENCE

The whole of the defendants who had been convicted, viz. Fussell, Wilhams, Vernon, Sharpe, Looney, and Jones, were then placed at the bar to receive sentence.

The Chief Justice, having addressed them on the nature of their offences, first passed sentence upon Fussell, whom he ordered to be imprisoned upon the charge of sedition for two years, and for the unlawful assembly for three months; and he was, in addition, ordered to enter into his own recognizances in £100, with two sureties in £50 each to keep the peace for six months.

Williams was the next sentenced to two years' imprisonment on the first count, one week on the second, and that he also should find sureties in the same amount as Fussell, to keep the peace for three years

Sharpe likewise to two years for sedition, three months for the unlawful assembly, and find the same amount of sureties as the others to keep the peace for three years

Vernon was also sentenced to be imprisoned for two years, and find the same sureties as the others to keep the peace for three years

Looney was sentenced to two years, imprisonment on the count for sedition, two months for the unlawful assembly, and to find the same amount of sureties as the last defendant to keep the peace for two years

And, lastly, Jones was sentenced to be imprisoned for two years, to find two sureties in £100 each, and to enter in his own recognizance in £200 to keep the peace for five years.

This closed the business of the session, and the Court then adjourned to Monday, August 21.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL has received from J. H. H. the half of a £5 note, on account of an omission in a return for Income tax.

HALL'S GEMS TO WATCH AT POOLE AND CAPE SKIRMISH.—This very beautiful and ingenious specimen of German wood work is now exhibiting at the artist's, in New Oxford-street. It is nine feet in length; and the scene is a smiling summer landscape, in which we have a cottage, gardens, farms, grassy mounds, rocks, cliffs, and umbrageous trees grouped into a picturesque scene of artistic skill, as well as natural taste.

THE "ARMY OF PARIS."—"The garrison of Paris and the banlieue," says the Courrier Français, "is thus composed; viz. Infantry, ten regiments of the line, 4th, 12th, 18th, 29th, 20th, 53d, 59th, 71st, and 72d; 1 of Light Infantry, 1st, 7th, 11th, 14th, 15th, and 23d; four companies of veterans; twenty-six battalions of the Garde Mobile; the Garde Républicaine, and the Gendarmerie; Cavalry, 1st; Carabiniers, 1st, 2d; and 6th Cuirassiers at Versailles; 3d and 5th Dragoons; and 5th Lancers; Artillery, two regiments at Vincennes, Sappers and Miners of the Engineers, one battalion.—The whole, without the National Guards, forms an army of from 60,000 to 80,000 men."

SIERRA LEONE. The want of a safe and commodious landing-place for boats at Sierra Leone, and also of a wharf with a good depth of water alongside, is well understood, about to be supplied. Commodore S.r Charles Hotham has taken great interest in the matter, and has employed the master of his ship to make a survey, which has been very ably done, and a drawing forwarded, we understand, to the Admiralty. When this is completed, a steam-ship as large as the Penelope will be able to go alongside to coal.

FIRE AT NOTTINGHAM.—On Monday one of the most serious conflagrations that has occurred in Nottingham since the destruction of the Exchange broke out in an extensive factory, situated in a dense range of buildings, between the Market place and Parliament-street. The mill was fitted up with machinery (worked by a cam) for preparing wool, cotton, and silk for manufactures, and was in the occupation of Messrs Hollins and Son, who only purchased it a few months ago from John Mills, Esq. The fire originated in the "cleaning-room." A youth named Steele was engaged in carding and mixing cotton, when a quantity of the yarn became entangled round a portion of the machinery, the rapid revolutions of which caused the materials to ignite, and before assistance could be rendered the whole estate was in a blaze. The flames speedily spread to other parts of the machinery, and at length reached the roof, which fell in piecemeal, greatly to the danger of those rendering assistance The flames were ultimately subdued. The amount of damage is estimated at upwards of a thousand pounds. It is understood that the premises were insured.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Earl of Auckland, and most of the members and officers of the Admiralty, are expected at Portsmouth to-day (Saturday), to inspect the squadron and the vessels of Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., and to witness his departure from Spithead, for the rendezvous, 10 degrees S W of Cape Clear

Rear Admiral Sir G. F Seymour, C B, G.C H, the late Commander in-Chief on the Pacific station, has arrived in town, and had interviews with the Lords of the Admiralty on Tuesday last.

The Council of the Royal Naval School having selected Annesley Turner Denison (second son of Captain H. Maxwell Denison, R N., F.R.S.) for the Yarborough Scholarship (founded by the Earl of Yarborough), Lord Auckland has been pleased to recognise the same by conferring on him a cadetship in the Royal Navy.

REAPPLARANCE OF THE POTATO DISEASE.

(To the Editor.)

SIR,—I regret to state that during the last few days the potato haulm has been visited by the Aphis vastator, and the consequent botrytis. At present I have seen none on my own plantations of late, although the circumstance is one requiring continual watchfulness. If the insects speedily leave the plant, but little damage will be effected; if they long remain, the crop will be seriously injured. I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

FUNERAL OF "THE VICTIMS OF JUNE."

THURSDAY, the 6th instant, was consecrated to the funeral, at Paris, of the victims of the last insurrection —"the victims of June," as they are distinctively termed.

The ceremony was performed according to the programme, with the exception of the procession to the Place de la Bastile. It was announced in the National Assembly, on Wednesday, that this part of the ceremony would be postponed, as the vaults under the Column of July were not ready for the reception of the bodies; and that they would, therefore, be deposited for the present in the vaults of the Church of the Madeleine. The motive officially declared did not inspire general belief; and Delolgonne stated that a rumour ran that rumours were current that the postponement was the result of information of some assassins having prepared an infernal machine, à la Fieschi, in a house on the Boulevards, and that it would be let off at the moment when the President of the Council of Ministers and his colleagues should be passing.

The spectacle, even without the procession along the Boulevards, was very imposing. The Hall of the National Assembly, and that part of the Church of the Madeleine which faces it, were hung with black, relieved with silver. The great scene of the ceremonial was, however, on the Place de la Concorde, whereon was erected a lofty structure, remarkable at once for simplicity and grandeur. It consisted of a large altar, placed beneath a canopy, upon a vast platform, the ascent to which was by a broad staircase of wide hilly steps. The design of the canopy somewhat resembled that of an eastern temple, or mosque; it was surmounted by a large, silvered dome, upon which were placed a ball and cross. At each angle was a smaller ball and cross, to which were attached long crape streamers, studded with silver stars, whose funereal splendour paled in the rays of the morning sun. The sides of the canopy were decorated with church relics, as a figure of the Saviour, praying angels, &c., and beneath, around the altar, hung silver lamps, lending their almost ineffectual fire to the sad splendour.

The troops who took part in the ceremony consisted of detachments from different corps, and the total formed an imposing mass. Most of the National Guards were in uniform. The crowd was very dense, and consisted, for the greater part, of the bourgeoisie. At half-past ten, the officiating Bishop ascended the steps of the altar, and the religious service commenced, the cannon of the Invalides firing at intervals. Notwithstanding the intense heat of the day, the crowd stood with their heads uncovered during the greater part of the religious service. When the Host was elevated, nearly all the persons present fell on their knees.

The scene was very impressive: the vast masses of troops, all bare-headed—the funebral pomp of the colossal altar, backed by the trees of the Champs Elysées, had a most striking scenic effect.

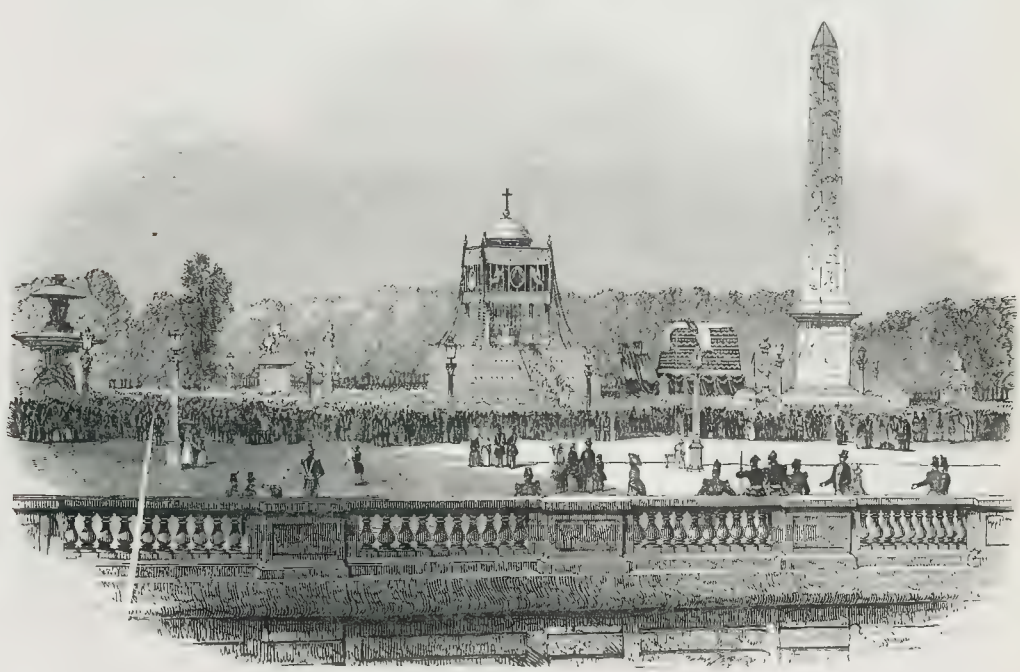
At twelve o'clock, the procession formed, the Members of the National Assembly and the public bodies ranging in the order fixed by the preceding. The long cortège advanced towards the Madeleine, headed by the Horse National Guards, the Lancashire guard, and a great crowd of troops. Four car was accompanied by many thousands. Four battalions, other detachments of troops, and a corps at the Madeleine, the bodies were brought out of the church, and, after prayers had been read by the Bishop of Langres, they were deposited in the vaults. The public and troops then separated in good order.

The funeral car was, of course, the grand feature of the procession. It was drawn by 16 horses, caparisoned in black cloth, studded with silver stars; and led by men in three-cornered hats and riding boots. Upon the pall lay a huge crown of immortelles; at each angle was a large incense-burner; beside the car, holding by black and white ropes, walked "the wounded;" and it was followed by, as it were, a vast moving grove of palm-trees.

Our Artist computes there to have been, at least, a thousand priests assisting at this solemnity—the greatest ecclesiastical display that has taken place in France for these 50 years. Never, under the Restoration, was such a mass of priests seen. With the Republic this impressive feature was not only unobjected to, but [illegible] a deep reverence throughout the ceremony, which was truly astounding.

The car was left for some time before the church, in order that it might be seen by persons who, from the denseness of the crowd, could not get a sight of it during the procession. It was of the usual form, hung with black draperies, and richly ornamented with silver.

The corps diplomatique, amongst whom was Lord Normanby, witnessed the ceremony from the balcony of the Hôtel de la Marine, and several of those who were wounded in the late riots were ranged on the balcony of the Garde Mobile.



THE PROCESSION AND GREAT ALTAR, AT THE PLACE DE LA CONCORDE.—(FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.)

CONSECRATION OF THE NEW ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, LAMBETH-ROAD.—THE SANCTUARY.

CONSECRATION OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH OF ST. GEORGE.

STRAND, indeed, are the mutations of localities in this vast metropolis; and not the least remarkable of them is, that the locus of the "No Popery" Riots of 1780, should, within a fortnight, become the site of a Roman Catholic Church the largest erected in England since the Reformation! Such is the new edifice which was opened with great pomp and ceremony on Tuesday, the 4th instant.

We shall first describe, from an authorised source,

THE CHURCH.

The new Church, with an extensive range of monastic buildings, intended as residences for clergy, schools, &c., occupies a plot of ground in the Lambeth-road, nearly facing the eastern wing of Bethlehem Hospital. The building was commenced in 1840; and we gave an engraving of the exterior of the Church, as we had of its interior, in No. 33 of our Journal (December 24, 1842). The whole pile is, we believe, completed externally, except the great tower and spire, as yet only carried up to the height of 60 feet; their entire completion is destined for the year 1849.

The Church is dedicated in honour of St. George, the patron of England, and is in the later Decorated style. It is cruciform in plan, and consists of a nave and aisles, the tower, a chancel, and two chapels; one is dedicated in honour of the Holy Sacrament, and the other in honour of the Virgin; and between them is the Rood Altar.

The body of the Church is allotted to the laity, and is calculated to seat about 3000 persons, upon low oak benches, with tracery ends, and quatrefoil backs.

There is no clerestory, but each of the aisles is gabled, an arrangement of which there are good examples in the fine churches of Grantham and Great Yarmouth.

Every bay of the nave is divided by buttresses terminating in rich pinnacles. In each alternate bay is a confessional, projecting as far as the buttresses, and divided into three compartments for the priests and penitents.

The principal entrance is in the great tower through a deeply moulded doorway, over which is a great window of six lights, filled with painted glass, representing St. George, St. Michael, and other saints. The organ is placed on a loft erected within this tower, which opens to the nave by an arch 40 feet high. To the right, on entering, is the font, the lower portion of which only is completed.

The pulpit is placed against the third pillar from the chancel end, and is of early Italian design; the form is hexagonal, and the face bearing a bas-relief; it is entirely of Caen stone, and the supporting shafts are worked in Britis[illegible]

The nave is divided from the chancel by a double stone screen, beneath a rood-loft. The front is composed of three arches, the centre one forming the chancel arch, with richly carved foliated caps, surmounted by a string-course, with carved bosses and angels supporting an open tracery.et. The back is likewise composed of three arches, the centre serving for the entrance to the chancel, and the others filled with light open tracery; and oak ribbed ceiling is fixed between the two screens, and immediately over it is the loft on which is fixed the great Rood. This cross, an original work of the fifteenth century, was purchased in Belgium, and restored to its present beauty; it is one of the finest examples existing, quite equal to that of Louvain, and probably executed by the same artist. The image of Our Lord is by the chisel of the celebrated M. Geefs, of Brussels, and is placed on the stalls in the cathedral of that city. The images of the Blessed Virgin and St. John were carried in England.

The Chancel is panelled oak, of which material, also, are the seats and richly-carved desks for the clergy. Crocheted arches springing from shafts resting on a stone seat are built round the Sanctuary. The floor is laid with encaustic tiles. The ceiling is divided into three compartments by carved principals resting on angel corbels; each compartment is subdivided by moulded ribs into square panels, to be enriched by painting on a gold ground.

The great window, the gift of the Earl of Shrewsbury, represents the root of Jesse, or genealogy of our Lord.

The three side windows contain images of St. George, St. Stephen, and St. Lawrence, under canopies, with angels bearing crowns and laurels.

The High Altar has on its front bas-reliefs of the Transfiguration, Resurrection, and Ascension of our Lord.

In the centre of the Altar is placed the tabernacle, worked in Caen stone; it consists of four clusters of pinnacles, supporting a richly crocheted canopy, surmounted by another, containing a pelican, as an emblem of our Lord shedding his blood for man. The whole is richly gilt and painted, and the doors of the tabernacle are of metal chased and gilt, and enriched by large crystals. Immediately behind the altar is an elaborately carved stone reredos, composed of two wide and two large niches filled with images of angels bearing emblems, and the[illegible]nts Peter and Paul.

The[illegible]ar[illegible]ar[illegible]ar

France has not done so. The Assembly, returned by universal suffrage, manifested from the very first that its tendencies were reactionary and Monarchical; and thence arose the conflict, the present issue of which is the establishment of a military Dictatorship, supported by an army within Paris, and another army on the outside of it. The Assembly has just voted, by an immense majority, the establishment of a permanent camp of 50,000 men to keep the rebellious capital in subjection; and the sincere Republicans already proclaim that virtually there is an end of the Republic. In this juncture all eyes are turned upon General Cavaignac. He is said, by those who know him best, to have been a Republican all his life; but none are bold enough to assert positively that he is a Republican now, or to predict that if he is, he will long remain so. While the army of France—and, unfortunately for France and Europe, her whole people are too much imbued with the military spirit—would probably look with no disfavour upon any Algerine general, whether Cavaignac or Lamoricière, who should play once more the game of Napoleon; the adherents of the two families of the two Bourbons, the Legitimists and the Orleanists, are well inclined to see Cavaignac take part of a General Monk. Much curiosity and interest, too, are excited as to the course to be taken by M. Thiers. He is at present in the confidence of the Dictator; but there are not wanting parties who put his name forward as the first President of the Republic. We must confess that the state of France fills us with alarm, and that we can indulge no hope of the immediate re-establishment of order and tranquility in that country. The two monarchical parties cannot agree with one another for the re-establishment of a Monarchy; and the success of either of them would lead to a long and sanguinary civil war, and to repeated attempts upon the part of the Republicans. The great fear is, that, as the sole means of cutting the Gordian knot of these domestic difficulties, the military party that is now in the ascendant will flatter the popular love of "glory," and employ in foreign wars the unemployable population, which, when not so employed, is ever ready to burst out into insurrection. From M. de Lamartine we might have expected a peaceable policy. From Generals Cavaignac and Lamoricière, aided by such an adviser as M. Thiers, there is, we fear, but small chance of any other policy than aggressive warfare.

The Ministry of Lord John Russell bids fair to be celebrated for its successful overthrow of sedition both in Ireland and England. While the Chartists have been tried and convicted at the Old Bailey in the ordinary form and course of law without excitement, or even interest in their fate, the disciples of Mr. Mitchel in Ireland are failing, one after the other, into the meshes of the law, and being disposed of in a manner which is highly satisfactory to the friends of order. It was to be expected, after all the bravado of the physical force Repealers, and the known excitability of the Celtic character, that the arrest of those who have imitated the preachings of Mr. Mitchel, would not have been effected without some danger and great excitement in Dublin and in Ireland generally; but such has not been the case. The writers and proprietors of the Irish Felon have been quietly proceeded against, and even Mr. Meagher "of the sword" has been arrested for sedition at Waterford, and conveyed to Dublin under an escort of mounted police, without any disturbance of the tranquility either in the one city or the other. The shopkeepers of Dublin seem to be weary of the Repeal agitation.

It was announced some weeks ago, as if on authority, that during the autumn her Majesty would visit Ireland; but this intention, if it were ever formed, has been abandoned, much to the annoyance of all engaged in trade in the Irish capital. They throw the blame on the physical force Repealers, and, in consequence, look upon their arrests, not only without the indignation which seemed to animate them against England two months ago, but with a feeling somewhat akin to satisfaction. Altogether the firmness of the Irish Government seems to have produced the best results, and to have brought the "pike-mongers" and "vitriol-men" into the odium which will for the future prevent them from being dangerous.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Royal children take their usual open air exercise daily.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

On Monday morning the Queen and Prince Albert visited the Zoological Gardens in the Regent's-park. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were accompanied by the Princes of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice; and were attended by Major-General Wemyss and Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert went in the course of the day, attended by Colonel Bouverie, to Messrs. Dickinson's, in New Bond-street, to view Mr. Foley's "Ino and the Infant Bacchus." The Queen went in state, in the evening, to Drury-lane Theatre, to honour the performance of Mr. Macready with her presence. The Royal cortège left Buckingham Palace at five minutes before seven o'clock. A party of Life Guards formed the escort from the Palace to the Theatre.

On Tuesday, the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred, took an airing in an open barouche and four. The Equerries in Waiting, Major-General Wemyss, and Colonel Bouverie, were in attendance on horseback. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting, went in the morning, to the review of "Prince Albert's Own Hussars" at Wimbledon-common. His Royal Highness Prince George and his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar were also present at the review. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Countess of Charlemont, Hon. Miss Kerr, Lord Camoys, and the Equerries in Waiting, honoured the performances at Her Majesty's Theatre, in the evening, with their presence.

On Wednesday afternoon the Queen took a drive to Kew in her open barouche and four. Her Majesty was accompanied by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal. Prince Albert, attended by the Marquis of Abercorn, Col. the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Lieut.-Col. Seymour, left Buckingham Palace, at twenty-five minutes before nine o'clock in the morning, for the Euston-square terminus of the London and North-Western Railway, and proceeded to York, to attend the agricultural meeting. The following had the honour of dining with her Majesty in the evening at Buckingham Palace:—Prince George, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Cottenham, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Abercorn, Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley, and Mr. George Edward Anson.

THE REGISTRATION.—Persons who claim to vote for cities and boroughs in respect of the occupation of premises of the yearly value of £10, must pay, on or before Thursday next, the 20th inst., all poor-rates and assessed taxes that may have become due in respect of such premises for the year ending the 6th of April last, or they will not be placed upon the register. To vote for the county, payment of the said property tax on calendar months previous to the 31st day of July is required. A change of residence in the City of London does not disqualify, provided the occupation has been continuous for a year. The 20th of August is the last day for serving notices of claims or objections.

MEDICAL REFORM.—A meeting of the members of the College of Surgeons residing in Manchester was held on Tuesday, in the Town-hall, Mr. W. Bowerbank in the chair, "for the purpose of carefully considering the amendment of medical reform having for its object the perpetuation of the present system of the college, or the organisation of a separate college of medical practitioners." Mr D. Noble proposed the following resolution: "That this meeting records its decided opposition to any measure of legislation affecting the constitution of the medical profession which may ratify the retrospective act of injustice involved in the provisions of the charter recently granted to the College of Surgeons in the instance of the council." Dr. Rayner seconded the motion, and it was carried unanimously. Mr. J. B. Harrison moved, "That the invidious proceedings with regard to fellowship have deprived it of that value and consideration which, under other circumstances, it would have possessed; and that, in the opinion of this meeting, it would be derogatory on the part of those who were members of the Royal College anterior to the date of the charter of 1843 to procure admission to fellowship by re-examination and further pecuniary payment, as at present proposed."—Mr. Bowman seconded the motion, and it was carried. Mr. Derrington then moved, "That this meeting conceives the colleges of physicians and surgeons, once placed in an harmonious relation with their respective members, to be amply sufficient for all the requirements of medical science, and that the institution of a third and subordinate class of practitioners would, under such circumstances, introduce needless complications, and be prejudicial to the best interests of the profession." This motion was also seconded and carried, and the meeting then terminated.

THE NEW SHERIFFS ELECT.—Mr. Bousfield and Mr. Mills, who were on Midsummer-day elected Sheriffs, have declined to serve the office. Mr. Bousfield has paid the fine, upwards of £600. Mr. Mills, it is said, disputes the validity of the fine, and will be prosecuted against by the City Solicitor for the amount. A Common Hall will be held in a few days for the election of two other persons to serve in the office. The fines in such cases are appropriated to the improvement of the City.

PARISH OF ST. PANCRAS.—On Thursday a numerous meeting of the vestry took place at the vestry-rooms, Camden-town, to consider the increased rate for the maintenance of the metropolitan police. Mr. Churchwarden Healey in the chair. The vestry-clerk stated that the rate had been made upon the faith of the Government bill introduced by Sir G. Grey; and the increased demand on St. Pancras for the present half year was £2731 14s. 4d. He had to present a resolution which the Board of Directors had come to on the preceding day. It was—"That this Board feel much surprised at the breach of faith on the part of [illegible] in the case of the increase of the police force in the Parish of St. Pancras, which it is understood that the prosecution of Mr. Duffy was deliberated and decided upon. Simultaneously with the arrest of Mr. Duffy, a body of police entered the office in D'Olier-street, and seized the whole of the copies of the Nation thereon contained, together with all the manuscripts, account-books, and every document which would illustrate the policy of the journal, or indicate those of its supporters, which the office contained. Against this course Mr. Duffy protested when examined before Mr. Tyndall, the magistrate, who informed him that he had nothing whatever to do with it, but proceed on. He [illegible] for granted that the Government acted upon a full and correct view of the case in that proceeding. Mr. Duffy offered no further objection to the course taken than a general protest against its lawlessness and illegality, and was forthwith removed to Newgate, whither he was followed by a considerable number of friends. It is understood, though the information was not read at length, that it was grounded upon an article in last Saturday's Nation, offering instructions on military tactics, and especially the portion thereof pointing out the method of destroying bridges."

THE "FELONS."—On Sunday, at two o'clock, the registered proprietors of the Tribune were placed under arrest on a charge of felony. When Mr. [illegible] another magistrate took their places on the bench at Colle[illegible] O'Dogherty and Williams, registered as proprietors of the Tribune newspaper, were placed at the bar, and they were eventually committed for trial. The whole proceeding took place without exciting interest, or collecting any crowd, those of four friends of the parties and a few reporters of the press only being present.

There are some penny publications, such as the Irish National Guard and the Penny United Irishman, which inculcate in a less pretentious form the doctrines of Young Ireland, and these also the police have seized wherever they have been brought under their notice.

THE IRISH LEAGUE.

A meeting of the United Repealers of Dublin, consisting of the members of the Irish Confederation, and such of the Old Ireland Repealers as are opposed to the "peace" policy of Mr. John O'Connell, and are anxious for the formation of the "Irish League," was held on Tuesday evening at the Mansion-house, for the purpose of taking into consideration the results of the late stupid conferences, and adopting the necessary arrangements of the organisation of the League, despite the resuscitation of Mr. John O'Connell, and some few more, who yet remain true to the "moral force" doctrines of his late father. The meeting was numerously and respectably attended, the hall being densely filled in front of the platform. The Hon. Mr. Barrett was in the chair.

The Chairman having thanked the meeting for the honour which was conferred upon him, by calling on him to preside at the first meeting of the Irish League,

Mr. R. O'Gorman, Sen., moved the following resolution:—"Resolved That it is expedient at this hour of peril to the lives, liberties, and properties of the Irish, that all Irishmen should at once give in their adhesion to the Irish League, and thus create a national power that will raise this island from the tyranny which day by day presses heavily upon us."

Mr. M. Leyne, formerly a member of Conciliation-hall, seconded the motion. He had lamented the dissension that has hitherto existed amongst Repealers, and said a few words in vindication of his secession from Conciliation-hall, he observed that he was still true to the doctrines of O'Connell; and the principal doctrine held by that great man was that, when the constitution was abrogated, resistance became the duty of the subject. (Cheers.) However, it would be now the resolution having been carried, another resolution, embodying the ten rules already published as the basis of the League, was moved, seconded, put from the chair, and carried with acclamation.

The following resolution was also agreed to:—"That it be an instruction to the committee to despatch deputations to the country for the purpose of explaining to the people the principles and objects of the League, and endeavour to secure their co-operation to achieve the legislative independence of Ireland."

THE CLUBS. The following is the reply of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the address of seventy-one noblemen and members of the House of Commons on the present state of Ireland:—"Whitehall, July 11, 1848.—My Lord,—In compliance with the wish expressed by the deputation of noblemen and gentlemen whom I had the honour to receive on the 7th instant, that I should give a written answer to the memorial which on that occasion your Lordship placed in my hands, I beg to inform you that I have brought the memorial under the consideration of my colleagues, and that I have retained a copy of it, and of the signatures attached to it, to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are fully aware of the dangerous character of the clubs which have been lately organised in Ireland. They trust that by a firm exercise of the powers which the law affords, aided by the support and co-operation of all loyal subjects of her Majesty in Ireland, the authority of law and order will be vindicated, and the peace and security of that portion of the United Kingdom be preserved. The important subject, however, to which the memorial relates, constantly occupies the earnest attention of her Majesty's Government. I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's obedient servant.—(Signed) G. GREY."

MORE ARRESTS.—Mr. Meagher, "of the sword," who was about to go on a Repeal mission to the United States, was arrested at Waterford on Tuesday, and sent to Dublin under an escort of mounted police. On Wednesday he was brought before the College-street police office, and admitted to bail, himself in £300, and two sureties of £350 each. The magistrate informed Mr. Meagher that the charges against him was for a misdemeanour only, and not under the felony act.—Mr. Michael Doheny, the barrister, was arrested on Tuesday morning in his own house, near Cashel, upon a charge of sedition, and, after a short examination before the magistrate, a committal was made out. An attempt at a rescue was made as Mr Doheny was being removed to the Bridewell, but after a short delay the prisoner was lodged in gaol.

On Monday night the Dublin Clubs assembled in their respective rooms, to give the last note of the members as to the course to be pursued.

With respect to the seizure of the Felon, the police commissioners have issued the following notice:—"The commissioners of police having been informed that the printing-press of the Felon newspaper was seized in the hands of a gentleman who was reading [illegible] caution the police against such interference with individuals. The orders given respecting this newspaper were, to seize it in the places where it was sold, or in the hands of hawkers, as a seditious print, but not otherwise." This order is [illegible] to have arisen in consequence of a police officer seizing a copy of the Felon in the hands of a gentleman while reading it at a coffee-house.

The publication of a third edition of the Irish Felon, on Tuesday, led to a re-enactment of the scenes of the preceding day. The newsvendors would purchase the public would buy, and, in consequence, the newspaper was seized in the [illegible] between the police and the purchasers.

[illegible] of Public Works have issued a notice, that all piers and harbours in Ireland, built or repaired at the public charge within the last 45 years, should henceforth be vested in the Commissioners, unless "cause shown." Parties claiming a full or modified ownership are invited to come in and establish their rights. The number of piers and harbours named by the Board of Works, under the Act for improving the Irish Fisheries, and the Piers and Harbours Act, amounts to 52.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION. The Association, which was to have met on Monday last, has postponed its meeting to Monday next, to allow of sufficient time to adjust on a proper and well-understood basis the union of the Confederation and [illegible]

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS

THE ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—The half-yearly general court of the Royal Humane Society was held on Tuesday afternoon at its offices, No. 3, Trafalgar-square; B. Bond Cabbell, Esq., M.P., in the chair. Mr. Charlier, the secretary, read the report, from which it appeared that since December last the number of persons who had been successfully treated after having been for more than a beyond recovery 3, attempted suicide 18. In Hyde-park, since December last, 19 cases had come under the attention of the society, out of which 17 persons were successfully treated, and 2 were beyond recovery. There had also been 64 attempted suicides during the same period. The society's honorary rewards were voted to Lieut. W. R. Smith, R.N., for saving the life of Mr. West, the second master of her Majesty's ship Endymion; to Mr. F. Hutchinson, surgeon, of Farringdon-street, for restoring, by skilful and unremitting exertion, George Thorp ton, also for his valuable and prompt assistance rendered on frequent occasions; and to Mr. H. A. F. Lisgenar, for saving the life of Edward Bennett. The Archbishop of Canterbury having been elected one of the Vice-Presidents in the room of the late Archbishop, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, when the proceedings terminated.

ASYLUM FOR AGED AND DECAYED FREEMASONS.—On Wednesday evening the thirteenth annual meeting of the friends and supporters of the Asylum for Worthy Aged and Decayed Freemasons, which is established to provide such aged and support to the members in adversity, was held at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars, for the purpose of receiving the report of the past year. Dr. Crucifix, the treasurer, in the chair. Mr. T. Whitmore, the secretary, read the report, which showed the total receipts of the year to have been £838 13s. 8d., including £446 11s. 8d. cash received, and £393 1s. 0d., which was in the treasurer's and bankers' hands. The annuitants had received £1049 4s. 6d., and £100 had been deposited for the purchase of land, at, Croydon, on which it is intended to erect the asylum. Allowing for the expenditure, there remained £971 16s. 11d. The funds of the institution amounted to £4305 7s. 10d., having been last year, £4063 0s. 9d. The report was received and adopted, when Dr Crucifix was re-elected treasurer. The chairman, in acknowledging the vote, said, that in the course of the last year the Institution had gone on most prosperously, and he trusted that the progress they had made would be the harbinger of the accomplishment of the great object they all had in view. The other officers were re-elected with the two trustees, who were the Earl of Aboyne, Lord Southampton (the president), Hon. G. Anson, M.P., Mr. B. B. Cabbell, M.P., and Dr. Crucifix. Thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

BATHS AND WASH HOUSES FOR THE LABOURING CLASSES.—On Wednesday a meeting of the supporters of this institution, founded for the benefit of the labouring classes in the north-west districts of the metropolis, was held in the Institution, in George-street, Euston-square. The general report congratulated the subscribers on the favourable results which had attended the operations of the Society since its formation in August, 1846, until the month ending May last. The bathers were 218,771; poor women who have washed, dryed, ironed, and mangled the clothes of themselves and families, 73,307: representing 290,944 individuals—showing the great benefit experienced by the poor in more than 800,000 cases. The present building being totally inadequate for its purposes, from 500 to 600, varying according to circumstances of the weather, are daily being turned away from the establishment. The institution is self-supporting, but the number of applicants require the present building to be greatly extended. Amongst the means for this purpose are her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c.

THE LAW INSTITUTION.—The Incorporated Law Society are about to add a new wing to their premises in Chancery-lane, and for that purpose have purchased the sites of several houses extending towards Carey-street, which are forthwith to be demolished. The institution will, on the formation of the projected new street from the north of Bell yard through the liberty of the Rolls into Fetter-lane, have a north frontage to Carey-street.

THE SPITALFIELDS BALL.—On Tuesday the committee appointed to superintend the arrangements of the Spitalfields ball, which was held on Friday (last week) for the purpose of raising a fund to promote the objects for which the Spitalfields School of Design was established, made up their accounts, from which it appeared that the receipts amounted to £2950, and the expenditure to about £1600, leaving a balance of £1300 for the school, which will be paid into the hands of the treasurer of the school.

THE ART-UNION OF LONDON.—On Wednesday a deputation, including Sir William Ross, Mr. Warren, Mr. Ward, Mr. Lodge, and Mr. Lushington, M.P., had an interview with the right Hon. H. Labouchere, at the Board of Trade, to present a memorial from a general meeting of artists, held at the Institute of Fine Arts, praying that the Lords Committee of the Privy Council for Trade will not persist in interfering with the right of selection by the prize-holders themselves of the prizes allotted to them by the Art-Union of London. The memorial was signed by 36 members of the Academy and 280 other artists.

HEALTH, DEATH, &c., FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 8TH.—The Registrar-General's return of the births, deaths, &c. registered in the metropolis and suburbs during the above week, states the number of births to have been [illegible] 676 males and 645 females. The number of deaths under the year was 970 (492 males and 478 females). This number exceeds by 27 the weekly average of deaths for the last five summers. Deaths from the greater number of the following heads:—Scarlatina, 100 (average 84), typhus 63 (average 40), consumption 152 (average 137), bronchitis 35 (average 37). Under the head of cholera the deaths recorded are seven, being precisely the weekly average of the last five summers. They were returned to the Registrar-General as follows:—In Charing-cross, F., 63 years, "cholera." (Duration 3 days.) In All Souls' (St. Mary-le-bone), [illegible] mon., "cholera infantum" (3 days); "laryngitis" (3 days). In Pentonville, 7 years, "English cholera" (4 days). In St. James's, Clerkenwell, F., 11 months, "cholera" (4 days). In St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, F., 4 months, "English cholera infantum" (2 days). In Ratcliff, M., 5 years, "cholera morbus" (26 hours). In Greenwich East, M., 68 years, "Asiatic cholera."

IRELAND.

COMMITTAL OF NEWSPAPER PROPRIETORS AND SEIZURE OF THEIR JOURNALS

THE "FELON."—On Saturday last, shortly before twelve o'clock, Mr. John Martin, proprietor of the Felon newspaper, for whose apprehension, under Dublin for the better security of the Crown and Government, a warrant had some days since been issued, entered the police-office. Advancing towards the bench and addressing Mr. Tyndall, the presiding magistrate, he stated that he came forward voluntarily to surrender himself, and that his sole reason for [illegible] out of the way of arrest was, that he felt he could not obtain a fair trial at Commissioner, whose labours ended yesterday. Mr. Martin having applied for the informations under which his apprehension had been sought, Mr. Williams, head clerk, read the following summary of the articles for which, as proprietor of the Felon, he is to be prosecuted. They formed part of the informations sworn by Superintendent Walsh and Inspector Campbell: "On Saturday, the 24th June, 1848, Mr. Lalor's letter to the editor of the Felon, commencing with the words 'Dear Sir,' and ending with the words 'brought to a speedy close,' and signed 'James F. Lalor,' and in the Irish Felon of Saturday, the 1st of July inst., an article entitled 'The First Blow in Ulster Cloth,' commencing with the words 'The [illegible] Lalor,' and ending with the words 'thing in the dust,' [illegible] James F. Lalor;' also an article in said last-mentioned newspaper, 'To the Confederate and Repeal Clubs of Ireland,' commencing 'The paper that follows,' and ending with the words 'have lost my labour,' and also a [illegible] 'James F. Lalor;' also a letter in said last-mentioned newspaper—'To the Members of the Clubs,' commencing with the words 'My friends,' and ending with the words 'prepared to reap it,' and signed 'Joseph Brennan;' and also in said last-mentioned newspaper—'A Song for the Future,' commencing with the words 'This land of ours,' and ending with the words 'a free Ireland.'"

Mr. Martin fully acknowledged that he was legally and virtually responsible, as proprietor, for these publications; and has committal having been made out, he was removed to Newgate, where, his offence not being bailable, he will remain till the next commission. The police in the course of the day seized all the numbers of the Felon found in the office, and proceeded thence to the establishment of Mr. Shaw, the printer of that journal, where they seized all the copies struck off. They likewise forcibly dispossessed the newsvenders of every number they possessed. All the copies forwarded through the Post Office on Friday night and Saturday were likewise detained. The paper was attempted to be published on Monday, but was seized.

MR. DUFFY AND THE "NATION."—On Saturday night, at nine o'clock, Mr. Duffy, proprietor of the Nation newspaper was arrested at his house at Lucan Manor, upon a warrant charging him with felony, under the recent statute, for certain articles of a treasonable character published in his paper on that morning. Mr. Duffy, on the arrival of the police at his residence, where the informations were sworn, and whence, after a short examination, the unfortunate gentleman was conveyed in a covered car to Newgate, under magisterial committal. A Privy Council had been held at the Castle in the course of the afternoon, at which it is understood that the prosecution of Mr. Duffy was deliberated and decided upon. Simultaneously with the arrest of Mr. Duffy, a body of police entered the office in D'Olier-street, and seized the whole of the copies of the Nation thereon contained, together with all the manuscripts, account-books, and every document which would illustrate the policy of the journal, or indicate those of its supporters, which the office contained. Against this course Mr. Duffy protested when examined before Mr. Tyndall, the magistrate, who informed him that he had nothing whatever to do with it, but proceed on. It was for granted that the Government acted upon a full and correct view of the case in that proceeding. Mr. Duffy offered no further objection to the course taken than a general protest against its lawlessness and illegality, and was forthwith removed to Newgate, whither he was followed by a considerable number of friends. It is understood, though the information was not read at length, that it was grounded upon an article in last Saturday's Nation, offering instructions on military tactics, and especially the portion thereof pointing out the method of destroying bridges.

THE "TRIBUNE."—On Sunday, at two o'clock, the registered proprietors of the Tribune were placed under arrest on a charge of felony. When Mr. [illegible] another magistrate took their places on the bench at Colle[illegible] O'Dogherty and Williams, registered as proprietors of the Tribune newspaper, were placed at the bar, and they were eventually committed for trial. The whole proceeding took place without exciting interest, or collecting any crowd, those of four friends of the parties and a few reporters of the press only being present.

There are some penny publications, such as the Irish National Guard and the Penny United Irishman, which inculcate in a less pretentious form the doctrines of Young Ireland, and these also the police have seized wherever they have been brought under their notice.

THE IRISH LEAGUE.

A meeting of the United Repealers of Dublin, consisting of the members of the Irish Confederation, and such of the Old Ireland Repealers as are opposed to the "peace" policy of Mr. John O'Connell, and are anxious for the formation of the "Irish League," was held on Tuesday evening at the Mansion-house, for the purpose of taking into consideration the results of the late stupid conferences, and adopting the necessary arrangements of the organisation of the League, despite the resuscitation of Mr. John O'Connell, and some few more, who yet remain true to the "moral force" doctrines of his late father. The meeting was numerously and respectably attended, the hall being densely filled in front of the platform. The Hon. Mr. Barrett was in the chair.

The Chairman having thanked the meeting for the honour which was conferred upon him, by calling on him to preside at the first meeting of the Irish League,

Mr. R. O'Gorman, Sen., moved the following resolution:—"Resolved That it is expedient at this hour of peril to the lives, liberties, and properties of the Irish, that all Irishmen should at once give in their adhesion to the Irish League, and thus create a national power that will raise this island from the tyranny which day by day presses heavily upon us."

Mr. M. Leyne, formerly a member of Conciliation-hall, seconded the motion. He had lamented the dissension that has hitherto existed amongst Repealers, and said a few words in vindication of his secession from Conciliation-hall, he observed that he was still true to the doctrines of O'Connell; and the principal doctrine held by that great man was that, when the constitution was abrogated, resistance became the duty of the subject. (Cheers.) However, it would be now the resolution having been carried, another resolution, embodying the ten rules already published as the basis of the League, was moved, seconded, put from the chair, and carried with acclamation.

The following resolution was also agreed to:—"That it be an instruction to the committee to despatch deputations to the country for the purpose of explaining to the people the principles and objects of the League, and endeavour to secure their co-operation to achieve the legislative independence of Ireland."

THE CLUBS. The following is the reply of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the address of seventy-one noblemen and members of the House of Commons on the present state of Ireland:—"Whitehall, July 11, 1848.—My Lord,—In compliance with the wish expressed by the deputation of noblemen and gentlemen whom I had the honour to receive on the 7th instant, that I should give a written answer to the memorial which on that occasion your Lordship placed in my hands, I beg to inform you that I have brought the memorial under the consideration of my colleagues, and that I have retained a copy of it, and of the signatures attached to it, to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Her Majesty's Government are fully aware of the dangerous character of the clubs which have been lately organised in Ireland. They trust that by a firm exercise of the powers which the law affords, aided by the support and co-operation of all loyal subjects of her Majesty in Ireland, the authority of law and order will be vindicated, and the peace and security of that portion of the United Kingdom be preserved. The important subject, however, to which the memorial relates, constantly occupies the earnest attention of her Majesty's Government. I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's obedient servant.—(Signed) G. GREY."

MORE ARRESTS.—Mr. Meagher, "of the sword," who was about to go on a Repeal mission to the United States, was arrested at Waterford on Tuesday, and sent to Dublin under an escort of mounted police. On Wednesday he was brought before the College-street police office, and admitted to bail, himself in £300, and two sureties of £350 each. The magistrate informed Mr. Meagher that the charges against him was for a misdemeanour only, and not under the felony act.—Mr. Michael Doheny, the barrister, was arrested on Tuesday morning in his own house, near Cashel, upon a charge of sedition, and, after a short examination before the magistrate, a committal was made out. An attempt at a rescue was made as Mr Doheny was being removed to the Bridewell, but after a short delay the prisoner was lodged in gaol.

On Monday night the Dublin Clubs assembled in their respective rooms, to give the last note of the members as to the course to be pursued.

With respect to the seizure of the Felon, the police commissioners have issued the following notice:—"The commissioners of police having been informed that the printing-press of the Felon newspaper was seized in the hands of a gentleman who was reading [illegible] caution the police against such interference with individuals. The orders given respecting this newspaper were, to seize it in the places where it was sold, or in the hands of hawkers, as a seditious print, but not otherwise." This order is [illegible] to have arisen in consequence of a police officer seizing a copy of the Felon in the hands of a gentleman while reading it at a coffee-house.

The publication of a third edition of the Irish Felon, on Tuesday, led to a re-enactment of the scenes of the preceding day. The newsvendors would purchase the public would buy, and, in consequence, the newspaper was seized in the [illegible] between the police and the purchasers.

[illegible] of Public Works have issued a notice, that all piers and harbours in Ireland, built or repaired at the public charge within the last 45 years, should henceforth be vested in the Commissioners, unless "cause shown." Parties claiming a full or modified ownership are invited to come in and establish their rights. The number of piers and harbours named by the Board of Works, under the Act for improving the Irish Fisheries, and the Piers and Harbours Act, amounts to 52.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION. The Association, which was to have met on Monday last, has postponed its meeting to Monday next, to allow of sufficient time to adjust on a proper and well-understood basis the union of the Confederation and [illegible]

LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN EXTENSION TO WATERFORD.—The Mayor and Sheriffs of Waterford, Messrs. Simmons having given the necessary certificate for opening this branch line, the first train commenced running from the Waterford station on Tuesday last.

THE SPITALFIELDS BALL.

COSTUME PORTRAITS, FROM DAGUERREOTYPES, BY BEARD.

LADY ADELIZA FITZALAN HOWARD, QUEEN ADELIZA OF LOUVAINE. THE HON. MISS CAMPBELL, QUEEN ELIZABETH. MR. GRAHAM VIVIAN, EARL OF SURREY.

YESTERDAY evening week (the 7th), this superb fête was given for the benefit of the Spitalfields School of Design; and a more appropriate tribute to the funds of the Institution could scarcely have been devised, combining as it did in its display of costume, extreme artistic beauty of decoration, combined with costly splendour of material.

The theatre was fitted up for this occasion, generally, as for M. Jullien's bals costumés. The pit was laid with flooring, level with the stage, above which was built the orchestra for Jullien's band; and in front of the dress circle were constructed raised seats for the Ladies Patronesses. The decorations were mostly new; their principal features being white drapery, dight with gold, and ornamented with festoons and garlands of flowers. For this tasteful display, great credit is due to Mr. Gye, from whose design the fittings were executed.

The company began to arrive at ten o'clock; and at a quarter before eleven, the Ladies Patronesses entered the vast saloon from an ante-room fitted up for their reception at the back of the stage; they were preceded by the Committee of Management, who conducted them to their seats in front of the dress circle.

After a short delay, the ladies and gentlemen engaged in the Marchioness of Londonderry's Quadrille entered the theatre. As this was the grand feature of the Ball, we give a list of the characters, and their representatives:—

The quadrille went off admirably. It was succeeded by the Duchess of Beaufort's quadrille of the Houses of York and Lancaster; the ladies in which were attired in white. Those representing the House of Lancaster had a wreath of white roses in the hair, their dresses being trimmed with the same. The red rose distinguished the House of York.

This quadrille, like the last, went off capitally: and was in turn succeeded by Lady Charlotte Egerton's Rose Quadrille, the distinguishing feature in which was that the ladies were dresses of Nottingham lace.

At the conclusion of this quadrille, the general company began to dance, though not without some difficulty, from the crowded state of the vast area. The private boxes during the evening were occupied by a brilliant array of the aristocracy.

Her Serene Highness the Duchess Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar, with the Princesses Anne and Amelia, honoured the ball with their presence, occupying her Majesty's box. The Duchess of Richmond, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Duchess of Norfolk, the Duchess of Leinster, the Marchioness of Worcester, Lady Caroline Sanford, and many other noble ladies, had private boxes. Miss Burdett Coutts occupied one of the stage boxes, and had a large party of the aristocracy with her—among whom was Lord Brougham.

Among the distinguished company present were, his Serene Highness Prince Frederick William of Hesse, the Prince Leopold of Naples, the Prince Lowenstein, his Excellency the Prussian Minister and the Baroness Brunnow, his Excellency the Turkish Minister and the Princess Caliinachi, his Excellency the Austrian Ambassador, his Excellency the Dutch Minister, &c.

Lady HARRIET ANSON, as Isabella of Valois, Daughter of Charles VI., and Second Wife of Richard II

Dress, ermine body, open at the sides, with streamlets from the elbow, bordered with gold lace, jewels round the neck, and a wreath of jewels on the front a large and splendid jewel of the white hart ornament the well-known cognizance of Richard II. The kirtle of white satin, richly embroidered with the proper arms; viz. those of France and England quarterly between [illegible] Edward the Confessor, and the Dove and Rose, and Charles VI. on the [illegible] shoes of blue satin, the gloves white, embroidered with gold flour-de-lis. The crown of gold, set with jewels, and the chevalet of the period.

HON MISS HANBURY, as Katherine Howard, fifth Wife of Henry VIII.

A white satin petticoat brocaded in raised flowers of white satin, over which a magnificent emerald green velvet tunic, with a rich Adelius of pearl laced the [illegible] trimmed to correspond, and [illegible] jewels; the sleeves of white muslin spotted with gold. The [illegible] consisted of a veil of the same rich material, hanging down to the feet, and [illegible] by a tiara of gold studded with jewels

VI

HON. MISS CAMPBELL, as Mary Queen of Scots

A surcoat of red velvet, with cap to correspond, pantaloons trimmed with ermine, belt studded with costly stones, and splendid jewels.

We [illegible] that the several portraits have been drawn from Photographs obtained by Mr. R. Beard, [illegible] (son of the eminent painter), who has honoured with settings by the distinguished representatives of the various characters in the quadrille. The great improvements recently introduced in the Daguerreotype process by that gentleman proved to be admirably adapted for preserving the details of the magnificent costumes worn on this occasion. The white of light portions, the beautiful lace or brilliant jewels, do not now appear as one opaque chalky mass on the plate, but are pronounced with their light and shade perfect; the darker parts being at the same time equally defined, and well illuminated. Mr. Beard has already obtained a high reputation, and has had the honour of taking many others, and anticipates his Daguerreotypes will be worth quadrille. We have no hesitation in pronouncing these specimens superior to any before produced.

We are happy to add that the receipts for the ball amounted to £ 900, and the expenditure to about £ 6.0, leaving a balance of £1300 for the Spitalfields School of Design.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign-Office yesterday, at which all the ministers were present. Previous to the Council, Sir G. Grey and some other of the Colonial Ministers had interviews with Lord J. Russell, at his Lordship's official residence in Downing-street.

REPORTING IN THE FRENCH NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.—The establishment of short-hand writers for the National Assembly, is to consist of fifteen persons. Five revisers at 8000 francs. Two note-takers and revisers at 5000 francs. Eight note-takers at 4800 francs. The note-takers are placed at the table of the tribune, and take notes by turns, the turn of each lasting twenty minutes. The revisers are placed at the right, and also take notes, changing each quarter of an hour. The note-takers are, immediately after taking their notes, to make a transcript. The revisers, by aid of the notes they themselves have taken, revise the transcripts made by the note-takers.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Donizetti's lively opera of "Don Pasquale" was repeated on Saturday night, Lablache's drolleries keeping the audience in perpetual amusement. His rich and racy humour has always some novel vein, and he seizes upon any accidental circumstance with infinite tact, turning it to a most comical account.

On Tuesday night there was the repetition of Mdlle. Lind's beautiful impersonation of Lucia. Her great scene is unquestionably that in which Lucia is fresh of reason, and florem she is listened to with breathless attention. Goletti's fine voice and excellent method in the music of the stern brother, Enrico, are well developed; and the Bidcbent of Bouch is a performance that also ought not to pass unnoticed

On Thursday, for the extra night, "La Nozze di Figaro" [illegible] revived. There is some change in the cast from last season: Mdlle Schwartz appearing in Cherubino, in place of Madame Solari; Mdlle. Cruvelli replacing Madame Castellan in the Countess; Bouche being the Antonio, instead of Schiaffi; and Ilderi assuming Figaro, nee Castelli. Mdle. Lind was the Susanna; Lablache, Bartolo; and Coletti the Count, as last year. The "Nozze di Figaro" ranks in lyric comedy what the "Don Giovanni" does in tragedy. Like a Monarch among his minstrels in the "Nozze" are clothed with the most captivating variety of harmonies the instrumentation is a perfect picture of the passing scene, it is written with consummate art; whilst the most pedantic professor is lost in admiration at the severest toys is fascinated with delight The score is replete with florid accompaniments, with delicate concerted results, with exquisite light and shade. Every player in the orchestra must feel deeply interested in his part: he must feel that he shares with the principals in the glory of an effective ensemble. The intriguing and animated dialogue of the piece is expressed vividly by orchestral aid. The "Nozze di Figaro" exacts altogether a grand combination of master's art—of vocal and instrumental. The action is never-ceasing—every moment is a fresh incident, and it is really wonderful how Mozart could have so followed the plot of Beaumarchais' comedy and have invested the dramatic interest with such [illegible] gems Mdlle. Lind received encores in the aria "Venite inginocchiatevi" in the quintett "Susanna non vien!" for her prolonged shake, trice: in the duos, "Crudel perche," with Coletti, in "Sull' aria," with Cruvelli; and in the duo "Deh vieni non tardar." Beiletti was compelled to repeat "Non piu andrai," twice. Lablache sung "Madamina" with amazing power, and in the finale of the first act his organ was heard towering above the enormous assemblage. Mdlle. Cruvelli sang rather unequally, but nicely at times. Mdlle. Schwartz was as overwhelmed as ever with the humour of her songs of her merits in Cherubino. Rossini's "Gazza Ladra" will be given, we understand, next Thursday, in which Mdlle. Lind will appear as Ninetta, and Lablache as the Podesta.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Rossini's sparkling opera, "Il Barbiere," was given on Saturday night, affording Madame Persiani, who was in beautiful voice, the occasion of indulging in the most exquisite roulades and cadenzas which her exuberant fancy could suggest. More perfect execution of intricate fioriture was never heard from mortal lips, and the house was in ecstacies complimenting the accomplished vocalist every kind of [illegible] Lablache's Figaro was [illegible] of amusing drollery, Bartolo an admirable display of irascibility; Tagliafico's Basilio artistical, but not so good as Marini's representation of that wily part; and Salvi's Count was better acted than sung. The opera went off with unflagging spirit, the finale of the first act being a rare vocal and instrumental treat.

On Tuesday night, Rossini's "Semiramide," with its gorgeous grandeur of Babylonian specacle, its military band, its powerful choruses, and luxuriant orchestration, and its fine cast of principals, attracted a large auditory. Grisi was magnificent, frequently electrifying the audience by her vocal and histrionic powers of excellence. Persiani's rich and voluptuous tones were heard to supreme advantage in Arsace. Tamburini's fine acting and singing of Assur, and the judicious declamations of Tagliafico and Lavia in the minor parts, completed this superb representation. There was no end to encores and ovations.

On Thursday, for the extra night, Mozart's incomparable lyric comedy, the "Nozze di Figaro" was represented, the cast comprising Madame Steffanoni, as the Countess Almaviva; Grisi, as the vivacious waiting-maid, Susanna; Madame Bellini, Marcellina; Tamburini, the gallant Count; Lavia, Don Basilio; Rovere, Bartolo; Polonini, Antonio; Persiani, as Figaro was [illegible] Mdlle. Corbetta, the Page. We have, on frequent occasions, noticed the admirable ensemble of the performance, and of Costa's classic and conscientious interpretance of the score. Its delicate observance, and the due light and shade to the different instrumentation, the judicious colouring of the composer's conceptions, and the praiseworthy zeal with which the singers and instrumentalists have been recognised on all hands. There were five encores, viz. the quartett in the finale of the morning," of Marini; the "Voi che sabete" of Mdlle. Grisi, the duo, "Crudel perche," between Grisi and Tamburini; the duetto, "Sull' aria," between Grisi and Steffanoni. The new comic divertissement, "Gerida," by Albert, will be produced on the admirable dancing of Mdle. Grahn to recommend it; it is intensely common place.

On Tuesday next Roger makes his re-appearance in [illegible] as "Lucia," Madame Persiani and Tamburini resuming the original parts of Lucia and Enrico.

On Thursday her Majesty will honour the theatre with a State visit. The Queen has commanded Meyerbeer's masterpiece, the opera of the "Huguenots," which will be given with the following cast:—Valentine, Madame Bellini, Signori Tamburini, Mei, Soldi, Lavia, Polonini, Rache, Tagliafico, Marini, Corbetta, and Mario, Madame Fanny Vlardot, and Mdle Alboni. It is the first time this work has been represented in Italian, and the cast is unprecedented in strength.

HAYMARKET.

On Monday night the season of this theatre closed, when Mr. Webster delivered the farewell address, which was well received by the audience; but we have not space to insert the document entire. In the course of it, the manager reviewed the progress of the season, and the increase of foreign amusements as one of the causes of his want of success, his losses having since 1847, being nearly £8000. Mr. Webster, after combating the idea of apply[illegible] the principles of the Patent Theatres to the Haymarket, suggested that, should [illegible]

"In my prayer to the Legislature to restrict the increase of foreign amusements, I beg it might be distinctly understood that I did not allude to the French Theatre, so ably conducted by Mr. Mitchell, nor to Drury Lane, immediately opposite, which the proprietors could inform you are more than sufficient for the [illegible] of music, excellent amusement; but to the establishment of a second Italian Theatre, which has caused such a overwhelming [illegible] of foreign [illegible] talent. I only fear that in the fashionable vortex of operas and concerts, the rounds of which continue day and night, the English drama will be absorbed, and your humble servant sent to the [illegible]

In conclusion, Mr. Webster expressed a fond hope that, from late events, and the [illegible] patronage of her Majesty, a reaction in his favour is taking place; and, to deserve a consummation so devoutly to be wished, the managers themselves must unite in putting their shoulders to the wheel of fortune. The manager then stated that, during the recess, the theatre would be redecorated; and, until September, he then took leave.

At the close of the address Mr. Webster was fervently cheered from all parts of the house

OLYMPIC

This theatre was reopened on Wednesday, under the direction of Mr. Stoqueler, for the representation of such light pieces as may be considered best adapted to the tastes of a summer audience, with a very good working company, and at a moderate scale of prices.

The first piece—"Provisional Government"—bears the stamp of a translation, and has been very well done indeed. The plot is exceedingly simple, but highly [illegible] dorous. A certain Grand Duke (Mr. Wigan) has deposed his Monarch, and is altogether without a Court, when he hears that a neighbouring Prince, with his daughter—with whom the aforesaid Grand Duke is in love—are about to pass through his duchy, and express a desire to be formally received. In the absence of Royal company of comedians arrives, and the Manager (Mr. Younge) dresses out his troop to personate the members of the Cabinet. They are passed off as such, and a variety of very laughable situations arise from this false state of affairs, through which, however, the Grand Duke is entirely extricated from his embarrassment. The acting of Mr. A. Younge was especially good; he will prove a valuable member of the little troop, and his performance of the part of Jacques, and was announced for repetition every evening amidst general applause.

The beautiful drama—for such it really is—of "Monsieur Jacques" followed, and allowed us the opportunity of enjoying in Mr. A. Wigan's assumption of the principal character one of the most perfectly artistic pieces of acting it has been for some time our good fortune to witness. From the performance of the gentleman in Mr. Taylor's piece, "To Parents and Guardians," a season or so ago, at the Lyceum, we anticipated a careful and finished representation, and we were not disappointed. None could be more faithful than his imitation of the broken English spoken by a Frenchman, nor more exquisite than his pathos in manner in which his voice failed and he broke down into tears, when si ging his ballad "To-morrow" and recounting the history of his love for Mariana and his flight from Palermo, with its subsequent misery. We experienced once more all the acute sensations that were called up when Mr. Morris Barnett first played the character at the St. James's Theatre, [illegible] years ago; and the effect on the audience was precisely the same—there was scarcely a dry eye in the theatre on Wednesday evening. We take Mr. Wigan to be the truest representative of the French character that has ever appeared on our boards. His accent and manner of speaking the language is most perfect, and his [illegible] equally true to nature. He does not make use of the phraseology of the [illegible] conventional French—the "Ah! parbleu!" "How was you de sare?" school of foreign speaking—but gives us a most graphic imitation of the real idiom and intonation, as we hear it. He was most enthusiastically cheered throughout, and had to [illegible] at the conclusion of the [illegible] Compton, Mrs. Broughan, and Mr. and Mrs. Leigh Murray will [illegible] opportunity

LYCEUM.

A farce, with the quaint title of "Poor Pillicody," which, somehow or another, almost succeeds Mr. Buckstone in difficulties, was brought out at the Lyceum on Wednesday evening. The name of the lively author of "Box and Cox" was sufficient to guarantee amusement, and the audience, to judge from their uproarious laughter, certainly found it so. Pillicody is a harum-scarum [illegible] in Hampshire, and personated by Mr. Buckstone. He has married Mrs O'Scuttle (Miss Howard), the young and pretty widow of Captain O'Scuttle, and he is in constant terror of the reappearance of the husband, who is, or was, a sailor, and whom he has been drowned [illegible] as is reported. In the midst of his fears, an Irishman of the dreaded name (Mr. H. Hall) arrives in search of his wife, who has eloped; and from this point all the fun begins, arising from poor Pillicody's agony that his bride should be taken away. Nobody can equal Mr. Buckstone in the expression of haggard fright and mistrust; and on this occasion he surpassed himself, playing with most [illegible] ability. At last he finds that his dreaded rival is another O'Scuttle, so that he is finally tranquillised.

The piece was entirely successful, going as well as everything else does at the fortunate house. Mr Hall's Irish was unexceptionable. Miss Howard looked very pretty as Mrs. Pillicody; and Miss Marshall promises to become the Queen of soubrettes. Her portness and vivacity are charming. The burlesque of "Mimo Bartel," as originally performed at the Olympic, is about to be revived under Mr. Planché's able direction.

FRENCH PLAYS.

A brilliant audience assembled at the St James's Theatre on Wednesday [illegible] Mr Mitchell's [illegible] attracted was [illegible] of that gentleman's untiring enterprise and liberality, in providing for those of the most refined entertainments that London can offer. On this occasion, Carlotta Royal troupe, as well as Alcide Tousez, who made his first appearance in "Les Jeune Hommes Presse," being ably supported by Ravel and Sainville. The other pieces were "Fire at Pardee," "L'Inventeur de la Poudre," and "Le Caporal et la Payse." All of these, with the exception of the second, are familiar, by translations, to our playgoers.

A long list of distinguished company present might be added to our report, did space permit. The benefit was a bumper, and the attendance must have been, in every sense, most gratifying to Mr Mitchell.

The Adelphi Company will commence their performances at the Haymarket Theatre on Monday next.

The sequel to George Cruikshank's pictorial story of "The Bottle," just published as the "Drunkard's Children," is being represented at nearly all the minors. The SURREY version is said to be the best, as well as the really authorised one. Most of the other arrangements have, however, contrived to turn the incidents pourtrayed, into an effective little drama, of a sickly kind.

The intended opening of DRURY-LANE by a Mr. Fox Cooper has fallen to the ground. Mr. Macready, the manager for conjunction with Mr. Stelfmont, as the [illegible] is to be revived, it must not be by unknown hands, aided by such stray members of the profession as may be wandering about without engagements. There is still a talk in the dramatic circles of the possibility of Mr. Macready remaining in England and taking the management of the ill-fated theatre, one of the finest houses in the world. It is lamentable to see it literally tumbling to decay from disuse.

Country theatricals appear to be taking a start. At Liverpool, a local burlesque, written by Mr. Brough a gentleman well known in the literary circles of that place, was brought out on Monday with great success. This is as it should be. To a provincial audience, the smartest London burlesques must have been utterly incomprehensible

MUSIC.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The fourth and last concert of the season was given on Saturday afternoon at the Hanover Rooms; the orchestra was led by M. Sainton, and conducted by Mr. Lucas. A new symphony in E flat, by Mr. H. C. Banister, King's Scholar of the Academy, was performed. It possesses merit, without originality. Mr. F. B. Jewson's overture, "The Pass of Killiecrankie," has an unfortunate title, suggestive of nothing, and produced of course a corresponding effect. There was marked [illegible] in the [illegible] by Mr. Hill's Mass—more plagiarism from beginning to end. Miss Rainford sang a nice song, "Love springs from gentleness," composed by Mr. H. Leslie. Mr Simmons, violin; Miss E. Childe and Mr. Howell, pianoforte; and Mr Hausch Chipp, violoncello, exhibited in solo pieces creditably: and the same may be stated of the Misses Holroyd, Miss E. Reeves, Miss E. P. Ward, &c, in their vocal selections. There was no doubt, however, that the great attraction of the concert was in assigning them difficult Italian music, exacting dramatic knowledge and experience to render effective. Th Committee are in the right path to allow competition to the students to be exercised in this manner, and the experiment has been very successful. Indeed, we scarcely recollect a larger amount of intelligence displayed than during the last four concerts. The Institution requires a thorough [illegible] reform, and we trust the changes in every department, to answer its original purposes, and to be in accordance with musical progress.

MUSICAL UNION.—On Tuesday afternoon was the eighth and last meeting of the season, when Haydn's quartet in D minor, No. 74; Mozart's beautiful quartet in G minor, played by M. Hallé, Beethoven's quartet, E, No. 7, and the old [illegible] Corelli's Opus 6 quintes in A minor, were executed. Sainton, Deloffre, Hill, Howell, and Piatti were the instrumentalists. Miss Elizabeth Stevenson, as director, have maintained the high character acquired in preceding seasons for the "Musical Union."

M. CHOPIN.—This distinguished pianiste matchée musicale, given at the residence of the Earl of Falmouth, St. James's-square, was fashionably attended. M. Chopin's compositions, andantes, scherzos, preludes, mazurkas, and waltzes, are highly characteristic, abounding with a composer's fancy, and are distinguished by power and striking style as an executant. Ingenious contrivance and contrapuntal skill, balanced by delicacy, spontaneity of melody, are exhibited in his inspirations, whilst the charm of his touch, with the harmony of his executive powers are indescribably attractive. The delight of the auditory was unbounded. Madame Viardot, and her cousin Mdle. Mendi, sang their Spanish airs, between the instrumental pieces, with marvellous effect

GRAND MORNING CONCERT, COVENT-GARDEN.—The last entertainment of the season, at the Royal Italian Opera, was particularly attractive in its vocal selections. The oratorio of the "House of Israel," Beschevowsky's grand new programme, and was splendidly performed. Costa's readings of the sublime work proved how carefully he had studied and how accurately he appreciated its right spirit. Instead of dragging the time at the [illegible] presentation, he gave vitality and rich colouring to the movements The choruses were rendered with unusual animation and precision, the "Hallelujah" commanding an encore. Madame Castellan, Salvi, and Tamburini sang the solos very effectively. The fair artiste had already signalised herself at the Ancient Concerts in this difficult music, which requires a rare compass of voice; but she gained additional glory on this occasion. The "Mount of Olives" next year is destined to be as popular as Rossini's "Stabat Mater" has been this season. The music of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" formed the third act of the scene. The overture was magnificently executed, and the scherzo we have never heard for the first time, for the inner parts stood out with a delicious piquancy: it was demanded a second time, and the [illegible] "Wedding March" mystery escaped a similar compliment. The "Notturno" was exquisitely done, but the want of two efficient ladies in the Chorus of Fairies was much felt. The miscellaneous selection, comprising the second act, opening with the "Preyaschutz" overture, eliciting a rapturous encore. Palestrina's chorus, "Alla Trinita," sung by Viardot and Alboni, Haris and Salvi, Tamburini and Marini what a galaxy of talent was demanded [illegible] and Madame Persiani's brilliant vocalisation in Donizetti's Polacca, "Oh luce di quest, anima," was similarly encored. Costa and Alboni sang their "Semiramide" duo, "Ebben a te;" Viardot and Tamburini their "Ah, guarda sorella;" Mario and Grisi their "Un tempo cor," from "Roberto Devereux;" Mario had heard Don Pasquale's serenade, "Com' e gentil," Alboni her cavatina "Prena alla patria," Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini the "Preyaschutz" quartet

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

CLUBS.—IRELAND.—Lord BROUGHAM called attention to the formation of clubs in Ireland, and to the dangerous consequences of allowing such associations to proceed unchecked!

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE assured the noble and learned Lord that the Government were alive to the matter, and would take their measures accordingly.

On the motion of the Duke of BEAUFORT, the Cruelty to Animals Prevention Bill passed through committee.

The Sale of Beer Regulation Bill, and some other bills on the table, were advanced a stage.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. PUSEY withdrew his Agricultural Tenant-Right (England) Bill, on account of the advanced period of the session.

Mr. HUME gave notice of a motion for a return of pensions on the Civil List.

To a question put by Sir R. INGLIS, Lord MORPETH stated that the Battersea Park plan had been suspended on account of the want of funds, but the plan was not abandoned.

Sir J. PAKINGTON gave notice that he would not introduce his promised bill on the subject of bribery at elections this session.

In reply to Sir JAMES GRAHAM, Lord J. RUSSELL promised to state, on Monday next, what measures the Government intended to proceed with in the present session, and what they would abandon.

Mr. HAWES, in answer to Lord LINCOLN, entered into a statement, which was not very intelligible, about what had been done during the past year in the promotion of emigration to the colonies.

BOROUGH ELECTIONS.—Lord J. RUSSELL moved that no new writs be issued for the county and borough of Leicester until after the 10th of August, and stated that he proposed on Thursday to move that the Horsham Borough Bill and Sir J. Hamner's Borough Elections Bill be discharged, and then to move for leave to bring in a new bill on the general subject of those boroughs. Should the House agree to the bill instituting an inquiry that would include the boroughs of Derby and Leicester, then he supposed they would also agree, in accordance with precedent, that no new writ should be issued for these boroughs till ten days after the opening of the next session of Parliament. The noble Lord's motion, after some remarks from Col Sibthorpe, was agreed to.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The House went into Committee on the Sugar Duties, and the discussion on Mr. Barkly's amendment was resumed by Lord GEORGE BENTINCK. The noble Lord, who spoke for half an hour and a half in the delivery, put forward the whole case of our sugar-producing colonies in the West Indies, the Mauritius, and the East Indies. He still approved of Mr. Barkly's scale of duties, but, as he thought it somewhat better that proposed by the Government, he felt bound to vote for it; but, in doing so, it was a duty he owed to all the sugar colonies of this country to repudiate this scale as a final settlement—it would be totally ruinous to the colonial interests, and it had not been recommended by any of those great interests. The noble Lord proceeded to demonstrate the ruin our Legislature had brought on our colonies, and he exhibited the effect of the recoil of that ruin upon the manufactures of the mother country. He entered into a minute examination of the exports of manufactured articles and raw materials to our colonies and to foreign countries, showing, from the contrast, that the great falling of in the export of our manufactures was to our colonies, and thus refuted the allegation that all our manufacturing distress and commercial difficulties had arisen from the disturbed state of Europe. The noble Lord especially dwelt upon the pernicious effects of our legislation with respect to sugar upon our East India possessions and the Mauritius. He replied in full to the arguments relied on by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, controverted his computations, and contended that his own proposal would have really increased the consumption of sugar, and given it to the poor man lightly taxed. Having described the stimulus given to slavery by the Act of 1846, he charged the Government with attempting, by their proposal, still further to encourage the abominable traffic, and add to the profits of slaveowners at the expense of the colonists and of the revenue. But he firmly believed the people of England would not, for a farthing a pound in the price of their sugar, refuse justice to their colonies or endure the continuance of the slave trade.

Lord J. RUSSELL insisted that the scale of duties proposed by the Government was the best yet propounded for increasing the consumption of sugar and making it cheap to the consumer. He denied that the question before the Committee involved the principles of slavery or of humanity.

Mr. GOULBURN was not satisfied either with the scale of duties proposed by the Government, or with that submitted by Mr. Barkly; but he gave the preference to the latter, because he thought the ministerial measure must be detrimental to the revenue, already in a tottering state, and because he considered Mr Barkly's as a scale which would assist the West India colonists in recovering from their present prostrate condition.

The committee divided—For the Ministerial scale, 150; for Mr. Barkly's amendment, 194. Majority for the Government, 56.

The other amendments on the paper were not pressed to a division, and the resolutions proposed by the Government were agreed to.

Mr. BOUVERIE moved a proviso, the effect of which was to give to shippers of sugars now on the seas, or which may be shipped in foreign ports within a certain limited time, the benefit of the reduced duty that came into operation on the 5th inst., under the act of 1846.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed the proposal, as one unprecedented.

Mr. GLADSTONE quoted the pledges given in Parliament by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, during the present session, that the Act of 1846 was not to be altered: and condemned the practice of giving such assurances, and afterwards punishing those who put faith in them. In his opinion, the claims of these importers of foreign sugar were peculiar, and founded in equity. He did not think it would be likely to form a precedent.

Mr. LABOUCHERE stated that the Government made the declarations quoted, they had not the slightest intention of altering the Act of 1846.

The committee divided—For Mr Bouverie's proviso, 34: Against it, 142: Majority, 108

The resolution was reported to the House.

The report of the Committee of Supply was received

Adjourned at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Payment of Debts out of Real Estate Bill passed through committee.

The Bishop of OXFORD moved the third reading of the Protection to Females Bill, which was opposed by Earl MINTO.

A division took place, when the measure was negatived by a majority of 28 to 21 A list of

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met at 12 o'clock.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND).—The adjourned debate on the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill was resumed by Mr. SADLEIR, who said that the bill was so altered since it came down from the House of Lords, by the amendment of the Solicitor-General, that he could not support it. Sir J. GRAHAM, in warmly supporting the bill, said that every encouragement should be given to the subdivision of land in Ireland, and to re-uniting with the soil the Catholic capital of Ireland. Mr D. BROWNE supported the bill; which was opposed by Sir J. WALSH, who contended that it would lead to a very serious invasion of the rights of individuals, and open a door to fraud.

After some further discussion—(in which Mr. B Osborne, Mr. Herbert, Mr F. O'Connor, Mr. S. Crawford, Mr. Callaghan, and Colonel Dunne took part)—Sir L. O'BRIEN withdrew his amendment. The bill was then committed pro formâ, after which the CHAIRMAN reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday.

THE LATE EX-RAJAH OF SATTARA AND COMPENSATION.—Mr. G. THOMPSON moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the conduct of Lieut.-Colonel Charles Ovans of the Bombay army, while British political resident at the Court of Sattara, and into the proceedings of the Bombay Government and the Court of Directors of the East India Company, in relation to certain charges preferred against that officer. He dwelt at considerable length on the importance of the Government complying with his motion, and pledged himself to prove that all the accusations which had been brought against the late Rajah of Sattara were false; and also to prove the truth of the charges he then made against Colonel Ovans.—Mr. ELLICE thought the request most extraordinary. The Committee asked for by the hon. member, if granted, could not finish its labours for six years; many witnesses would have to be brought from India, and most voluminous documents would have to be examined. But, before the hon. gentleman proceeded to put the question to a serious inquiry, he should build the new Houses of Parliament, he should prove to the House that he had no pecuniary interest, directly or indirectly, in the matter, and was not actuated by any vindictive feeling in the course he was adopting. He then quoted from documents to show that the hon. member was interested in a pecuniary way in the result.—Mr. HUME followed in support of the motion.—Sir J. HOGG opposed the motion at great length. Mr. ANSTEY followed in favour of the inquiry, as did also Mr URQUHART.—Sir H. WILLOUGHBY likewise supported the motion.—Mr. G. THOMPSON replied to the personal attack that had been made upon him in the early part of the debate, after which the House divided, when the motion was negatived by [illegible]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock.

SUNDAY TRADING.

Mr. HINDLEY moved that the House should resolve itself into Committee on the Sunday Trading Bill.

Mr. B. WALL moved, as an amendment, that the Bill be committed that day six months. He defied any Act of Parliament to put down all Sunday trading; and believed that, should the Bill be allowed to pass, it would be inoperative or unjust.

Mr SLANEY considered the Bill pernicious in its principles, and would, therefore, give it his most decided opposition.

After some discussion, in which Mr Alcock, Sir De Lacy Evans, Colonel Thompson, Sir B. Hall, Mr Hindley, and Mr. Hume took part,

Sir G. GREY said he believed the Sabbath was better observed now than it had been some years ago, though, of course, as the population of the metropolis increased, so would Sunday trading. Any law upon the subject, however, should be general to be effective—should, in fact, be extended to all parts of the country. As the Bill before the House was confined to the metropolis, he felt compelled, though reluctantly, to oppose its further progress.

Sir J. N. BOLTON supported the Bill.

Mr C. BERESFORD suggested that a statement of class legislation

The discussion was adjourned [illegible] which Mr. HINDLEY, Mr Spooner, Lord D. STUART, and Mr. Muntz took part.

The House divided, and the amendment of Mr B. Wall was negatived by a majority of 75 to 47.

The Bill was then committed pro formâ, after which the House resumed, and the CHAIRMAN obtained leave to sit again on Friday. Mr HINDLEY, in the interim, undertook to consult those who had placed the Bill in his hands as to whether he should proceed further with it during the present session.

QUALIFICATION OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. MOFFAT moved the second reading of the Qualification of Members Bill, the object of which was to give to any Judgment creditor of a member of the House the right of petitioning, and, upon evidence being produced of the debt, such member should cease to be a member of the House. Sir G. GREY was favourable to the object of the hon. member, but there were the greatest objections to his bill; and he hoped, therefore, he would withdraw it for the present session.—After a short conversation the motion was withdrawn, the hon. gentleman expressing his intention to bring it forward again next session.—Adjourned.

The motion was agreed to, and leave given to bring in the Bill

TRUSTEES OF ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.—The House, having gone into Committee on this bill, was engaged the whole of the evening in the discussion of the several clauses. The several clauses having been agreed to, the Bill was ordered to be reported on Monday next.—Adjourned.

A RIVER REVEL.

My beautiful,
My only Venice this is breath! Thy breeze—
How adorns it!—how it plays with thy locks!
Thy very winds feel native to my veins. The Two Foscari.

It is related of a rural divine, that he was wont to illustrate the admirable dispositions of the natives of Otaheite, by pointing out how constantly great rivers are found to flow adjacent to large cities. We can pardon his logic by reason of the fact. However they come there, next to the vital air are the living waters to those places where mankind most do congregate. Whether Watt or Cavendish was right as to their material elements, their moral properties are health and wealth, prosperity and pleasure. There is the dew for the flower, the rain for the field, the billow for enterprise and adventure. And there is the shining stream, that goes on its way rejoicing—

The wave all roughen'd by the swimmer's stroke; or whereon we man the light shallop, and

Race for pleasure in the pride of strength.

From the earliest times water pageants have been among the most brilliant passages of national pomp and ceremonial. The Cydnus and the Adriatic have left us records of the most notable shows to be found in history. The taste for such high ceremonials has altered with the age. It has not concentrated in my Lord Mayor's annual expedition to Westminster, but spread over those innumerable regattas which woo our amphibious instincts,

It is to one of these characteristic revels that these our premises stand in the relation of a preface.

On Tuesday, the 11th inst., the Royal Thames Yacht Club celebrated its close of match for the present season. In a business point of view, the promise was a bad one—for various reasons—one of which the reader would rate higher than au diable de vau. For this cause they may be omitted with little loss to our object. The day arose "fresh as the dawn of Eden," and at a very early hour the little Bay of Long Reach was astir. The morning flood bore towards the haven of the world a mighty fleet—commerce wafting her navy from every point of the compass. The ebb had run down some two hours—when the flag of the Commodore, and the signal gun, and the wind came the greeting of music. The steamer appropriated to the members of the Club had a goodly company aboard—serenaded by the noble band of the Blues: she was attended by several smaller vessels of her class; and when the gun to prepare was fired, the squadron was a gallant one. As the First Class did not sail, the match was confined to craft of two Second and Third Classes. For the Second Class there was a little trouble at the Eek. It was hard-put noon when the signal to cast off was given, and with a fine whole-sail breeze the quintæ was speedily under way. As the course was from Erith round the Nore, and back, considering it was a dead-beat, and, probably, the possibility of the current being against the wind, the time was a rather liberal one. The result was that the turn was made several miles short of the point named in the articles whether with evil or good effect on the issue, matters little now. The second match came off on the following day, and was a repetition of the first catastrophe occurred abreast of Tilbury Fort, where the Ino, with her usual ill-luck, carried away her topmast, a manœuvre presently followed by the Secret carrying away her bowsprit. The latter, however, the Secret carried away several jib-sticks, and something else, as will be seen in the sequel. Now the Ino, being without a topsail that is to say, without about a fourth of her motive power, was perforce straightway to seek her port. There was forward than ever she had previously done, actually weathering the Secret, and going clear ahead of her. All this time, with a spanking breeze, the Prima Donna was going very lazily through the water, being already beaten by one of the small-er boats, the Frolic. In Sea Reach the steamer let go her anchor, and was first rounded by the Ino, with a jury topmast new rigged, and a gaff topsail set—a good makeshift. The Secret came next, hard on her; then the Frolic, the Prima Donna, and last the Eek. In running the Secret retrieved her laurels. She presently took the foremost station; and a little after half-past six thus the match terminated. . .

Thus finished a pretty day's sailing, though without the interest which distinguished its predecessor—so far as regards the sport. In its holiday character it was wholly successful. A most agreeable party had met on board the Club steamer, and they turned their opportunity to the best account. There was feasting, and music, and gracious intercourse; these constituted its general characteristics; and, as ever where Albion's daughters are found, there were "the women"—some pretty faces among them, and of her girls [illegible] The days of chivalry are passed, but enough of its spirit remains to grace her memory with its fitting device—the Rose of Lancaster.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY'S FETE, AT CHISWICK.

THE BAND NEAR THE RHODODENDRON CIRCLE.—(FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY KILBURN.)

On Wednesday, the Horticultural Society held their third and last Exhibition for the season, at the Gardens at Chiswick. Several circumstances combined to render this, by many degrees, the most brilliant fête of the season. The weather on the two previous Exhibition days was unfavourable: they were "wet Saturdays," by no means rare in the Society's calendar; one would have thought them dedicated to Jupiter Pluvius. Wednesday was, however, a glorious day for any al fresco fete: the sun shone throughout the morning; in short, it was a day of undimmed splendour. Again, this third and last fête had a goodly balance of company from the two "wet Saturdays," who preferred reserving their tickets ("good" for either of the three meetings), to chancing it between the showers. Added to this, was the attraction of the grounds of Chiswick House being thrown open, as on the last day of exhibition in former years, by the Society's noble and liberal neighbour, the Duke of Devonshire.

We have heard it stated that nearly 14,000 tickets were disposed of; and it was computed that 12,000 persons were, at one period of the day, present in the Gardens.

The exhibition of fruit and flowers, although the specimens were not very numerous, was an excellent one. The orchids were numerous, and so, of course, were the heaths. There were brilliant groups of pelargoniums, roses, and geraniums; and among the cut flowers, carnations, pinks, and picotees attracted the largest groups of admiring spectators. Of the fruits the finest and most numerous were the pines, some of which were unusually large and well shaped; the collection of other fruits was neither so extensive nor varied as at former exhibitions.

The details of the fete were admirably managed. The tents were crowded during the greater part of the day, yet there was no confusion or inconvenience; and, although the demand for refreshments sometimes exceeded the power of immediate supply, the exercise of a little patience on the part of the applicants was all that was found requisite.

There were four military bands in attendance—the Coldstream, the Grenadiers, the Horse Guards, and the Life Guards, which were stationed in various parts of the grounds, and played, during the day, several favourite overtures and airs. At half-past three they all assembled in the Duke of Devonshire's splendid gardens and conservatories to the visitors: here they performed Vincent Wallace's new National Anthem, and the grand march in the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" and the effect of these exquisite and finely-contrasted pieces, as interpreted by nearly two hundred of our leading musicians, was extremely fine, and elicited general marks of approval from the auditory.

The scene here was extremely picturesque and animated. Groups of elegantly attired ladies were either seated, or promenaded in the shrubberies: while some of the juveniles were afforded the enjoyment of swinging in the hammock and other swings fixed on the lawn.

Altogether this was one of the most brilliant horticultural fetes that has been given for some years. The company included nearly all the rank and fashion of the metropolis, evidently glad to escape from the Babel of bricks and mortar.

We append a pair of pictures from this great Chiswick Meeting, from Daguerréotypes, ably executed by Mr. W. E. Kilburn, 224, Regent-street. In the first scene we have three of the bands performing in the Gardens, near the Rhododendron Circle; and in the second picture we have the Great Conservatory, and a small portion of the chief Tent.

ENCAMPMENT ON KERSALL MOOR, NEAR MANCHESTER.

THE location of troops is stated to be the first of a series of Encampments intended to be formed, by order of Government, in various parts of the kingdom.

As might be anticipated from its proximity to Manchester, the Moor has been frequented by great numbers of persons: in one day there are stated to have been no fewer than 20,000 visitors, and on a Sunday from 30,000 to 35,000. Sermons have been preached here, and religious tracts distributed; and some preachers have been anxious to go among the tents, to address the soldiers; but this has been forbidden, being contrary to orders.

The Encampment consists of the 9th Regiment of Infantry, recently returned from India; it is styled the East Norfolk Regiment, Colonel Sir J. A. Hope, K.C.B.; Lieutenant-Colonel Davis. The portion stationed here at present, commanded by Major Thomas, includes 450 rank and file, besides the band and the non-commissioned and commissioned officers. The companies stationed in the barracks at Manchester have also marched on the ground; and Kersall Moor has never presented such an interesting spectacle since 1819, when it gave quarters to some 3000 militia.

The elevated situation of the Moor will expose a camp to no small inconvenience in the rainy season, and the high winds of early autumn. The encampment is, however, only an experiment; and if, on inspection, it be reported healthy, it is probable that the Moor will become a permanent camp for the summer season.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

THE event of her Majesty going in state to this theatre on Monday evening, on the occasion of Mr. Macready's benefit, and last appearance in London previous to his departure for America, created great interest in the play-going world. Although the prices had been raised, the house was filled to overflowing immediately after the opening of the doors. Indeed, so crowded were the spectators, that the greatest confusion prevailed throughout the first act of "Henry the Eighth;" nor was order restored until Mr. Macready had obtained the Queen's permission to address the house. He then informed the malcontents that their money would be returned to them immediately if they left the theatre. Several availed themselves of this arrangement, and then all became quiet. It is, however, to be regretted that such a rut should have taken place in the presence of her Majesty. The exact number the theatre is capable of holding must be known, and no more should be admitted.

Whatever the politeness of the audience might have been, however, there could be no doubt about their patriotism; for when the curtain rose and discovered Mr. Braham, Miss Rainforth, and the Misses Williams, backed by a large concourse of visitors who had the entrée to the coulisses, and "God save the Queen" was struck up, every loyal and conservative allusion was so cheered and chorussed by the entire audience, that the Communists, if there were any present, must have determined at once upon abandoning their cause from its utter hopelessness. There was enough loyal enthusiasm to show that although we have borrowed omnibuses, plays, bals masqués, phrases, and cemeteries from the French, we have not yet copied their barricades, nor are we likely to do so.

The three first acts only of "Henry the Eighth," and Colman's "Jealous Wife," compressed into the same number, were the entertainments.

Criticism is not expected on an occasion of this kind; a record of the event is all that is looked for; at the same time the capabilities of the various performers are well known. Mr. Macready was assisted by Mrs. Warner, Mrs. Nisbett, Miss Cushman, and Miss Jane Mordaunt; Mr. Phelps, Mr. Compton, Mr. Leigh Murray, and other ladies and gentlemen of position in the dramatic world; and the whole of the entertainments passed off with great éclat. At the conclusion of the performance the National Anthem was again played, and, during this, her Majesty, with her suite, left the theatre. Mr. Macready had to re-appear in answer to the unanimous demand of the audience, and a call was also raised for Mrs. Warner and Mr. Phelps.

Two yeomen of the guard were on duty on the stage, and the Life Guards were in Russell-street throughout the evening, according to custom.

Our Artist has portrayed Mr Macready in his fine impersonation of Wolsey. The scene is the second in the third act, in which the King, after upbraiding the Cardinal, and sarcastically commending him for his loyalty and devotedness, as far at least, as lip-service goes, hands him some papers for the first time, withers him with his royal frown, and then retires followed by the assembled lords. Wolsey, aghast at this change, says,

> "What should this mean?
> What sudden anger 's this? How have I reap'd it?
> He parted frowning from me, as if ruin
> Leap'd from his eyes."

CHATEAUBRIAND.

M. LE VICOMTE DE CHATEAUBRIAND, whose recent death we announce, held for many years a conspicuous station among the celebrated men of France, being distinguished alike for the brilliancy, the scope, and the versatility of his talents. He is known to the world as minister, diplomatist, orator, poet, traveller, theologian, novelist, and pamphleteer. In each of these various capacities he has appeared before the public; and if he has not always commanded admiration and respect, he has at least secured the attention of both his hearers and readers. Though all the productions of his pen, and his complete works, fill twenty-eight volumes, we find but little change of tone and feeling, notwithstanding the great variety of style and subject. It is still Chateaubriand, the rash, the ardent, the eloquent, the imaginative.

According to the "Dictionnaire Véridique," M. de Chateaubriand is descended from the ancient sovereign house of Bretagne, from Briant, fourth son of Eudo, Comte de Penthièvre, second son of Geoffrey Duc de Bretagne, by Bavoise de Normandie. This house of Bretagne were also Dukes of Richmond in England.

Francois-Auguste Vicomte de Chateaubriand was born at Combourg, near Fougères, in Brittany, in 1769, the youngest of ten children. The subjects to which his early attention was directed were theology and naval affairs, studies which gave some colour to his after life, and the influence of which was perceptible in his writings.

Like most of the then young F each nobles, he entered the army at an early age, but quitted it at the commencement of the Revolution. tudes who lined the streets, and the fair ladies who filled the windows, testified by every means in their power the joy which the presence of the Prince Consort inspired. The carriage conveyed him at a slow pace through the city to the Judge's lodgings, which had been taken as a temporary abode for his Royal Highness. Here the Lord Mayor and Corporation presented to the Prince a loyal address, to which his Royal Highness's reply was:—

"I have to thank you for your dutiful address, and to assure you of the pleasure [illegible] many [illegible] from [illegible] In [illegible] at which [illegible] been [illegible] the Right Hon. Lord [illegible] drawn, the Chairman addressed the meeting, stating that two toasts only would be given—first, "The Queen;" second, "His Royal Highness, and the rest of the Royal Family."

Her Majesty's health was received, as is usual on all occasions, by tremendous applause; and the toast of his Royal Highness Prince Albert called forth similar enthusiasm.

Prince Albert, in reply, acknowledged with gratitude the manner in which his health had been received, adding, that he felt exceeding pleasure in joining the farmers of England and [illegible] and a convivial [illegible] a paper).

The healths of the successful candidates were then drunk, for which the Duke of Rutland returned thanks, and expressed his delight in mixing with the yeomen of England.

At ten o'clock the company separated; and in the evening a Grand Ball was given by G. Hudson, Esq., at which Prince Albert was present.

EMIGRATION AND COLONISATION.

With a rapidly-increasing population—a trade augmenting at a slower ratio than the number of mouths to be fed—and with the prospect before us that other civilised nations, who cannot now compete with us in commerce or manufactures, will, at no distant period, be enabled to do so, the question of the subsistence of our people becomes of the utmost urgency. As a people, it may be truly said of us that we are pre-eminent among the nations of the earth. Our spirit rules the world. Our wisdom enters into the composition of the every-day life of half the globe. Our physical as well as intellectual presence is manifest in every climate under the sun. Our sailing ships and steam-vessels cover the seas and rivers. Wherever we conquer, we civilise and refine. Our arms, our arts, our literature are illustrious among the nations. We are a rich, a powerful, an intelligent, and a religious people. No place is too remote for our enterprise or our curiosity. We have an insatiable energy, which is of the utmost value to the world. We have spread ourselves over all regions. We have peopled North America, civilised India, taken possession of Australia, and scattered the Anglo-Saxon name and fame, language and literature, religion and laws, ideas and habits, over the fairest portions of the globe. Yet, with all this, we maintain in unproductive idleness no less a number than one million and a half of paupers. We hear the cry of distress raised at our own doors, and have no relief to propose but the compulsory charity of a poor-law. We have magnificent colonies, that only require labour to be customers for our goods, and aids instead of encumbrances to us; yet we have hitherto devised no plan by which the surplus of the home population shall be drafted to the rich pastures and fertile fields of Canada, the Cape, Australia, or New Zealand. We find, indeed, that the process of emigration goes on, and that a portion of the people, with youth and vigour in their veins, and hope in their hearts, manage to shake from their feet the dust of their native land, and make for themselves new homes beyond the sea. But though many go, a superabundance of population still remains behind; and our colonies complain that, for want of labour, their riches remain undeveloped, and their finest territories uncultivated and untrodden. The stream of emigration is but an occasional runnel. To be of due service to ourselves and to our colonies, it should be a great and daily flowing river. The problem is, how to make it so?

Among barbarous and semi-civilised nations, the expulsion of the surplus population was a matter conducted upon a great scale, and according to well-recognised principles. Among civilised nations, with a surplus such as ours, the task is one of the utmost difficulty. Were we annually to send off, by their own consent, two hundred thousand men and their families, we should not very greatly diminish the pressure of population upon those that remained behind; and the cost of such an emigration would be so enormous that no government could venture to propose it; or proposing it, indulge in the hope that the legislature would sanction it. The fatality of the case seems to be that we can neither afford to allow things to remain as they are in this respect, nor to adopt a remedy as extensive as the emergency. Yet every one who has devoted attention to the subject, or who exercises the commonest observation upon the state of the country and of the world, or understands even the elements of political and economic science, confesses that emigration, as far as it goes, is a real remedy for our social evils; and that colonisation might be made a remedy still more efficient if we could afford its cost, or carry it on upon a scale commensurate with the distresses of the home country and the necessities of its colonial empire.

In the meantime, the question excites attention. Until some effectual scheme of colonisation be devised, every attempt made to facilitate emigration is a national advantage, and every public discussion of the subject tends to the relief of the labour-market at home, and to the erection of new labour-markets in countries that may yet rival our own in wealth and intelligence, and perhaps surpass it in happiness. Our Government has been accused of inattention to this great subject, and not without reason. It has, doubtless, not done all it might have done; but now that the leading men of all political parties are becoming convinced of the paramount importance of the question, there is reason to hope that it will take firm hold upon the public mind, and that, sooner or later, society will recognise the truth that it is not only better, but much cheaper, to send out armies of industrious colonists to the north, south, east, and west, than to maintain armies of idle paupers at home; and that it is folly to allow an enormous population to grow up around us, without debating the mighty question how that population is to be made a blessing to us, instead of a curse.

But our Government, though it has not devoted all the attention to this matter which its urgency demands, has not wholly lost sight of it. For years past it has published annually, in a convenient form and as a cheap rate, an epitome of all the information requisite to guide the volunteer to the place of his destination; and the following summary of the contents of its last-published manual, given by a daily contemporary, will show the value of its labours in this respect. In the space of twenty-four pages it gives, says our contemporary, quite a profusion of facts, most methodically arranged, on the following topics:—The names, addresses, and duties of the Government emigration agents; cost of passage for cabin, intermediate, and steerage passengers from some of the principal ports of the United Kingdom to all the British colonies; the demand for labour in the several colonies; the prices of agricultural produce, farming stock, provisions, and clothing, down to the smallest items of household consumption; wages per annum, per month, per week, and per day, of every trade, employment, and domestic service; the prices and other conditions under which the Crown land may be procured in all the colonies; the privileges to military and naval officers settling there; the expenses of clearing and the public charges on land in the North American colonies and New Zealand; the colonies to which free passages are granted, and the regulations on the election of labourers in the several cases; rules for remitting money to assist emigrants; numerous useful hints to emigrants bound for the North American colonies, as to their contract tickets, means of subsistence, and further transport after arrival, tools, proper time to arrive in the colony, length of the passage, tax on emigrants, wages to be accepted, route to West Canada, and expense of a log hut; corresponding hints applicable to the Australian colonies; and, lastly, various official notices, such as the victualling scale for emigrant ships, certain exemptions from duty, advice to parties abroad wishing to pay the passage of their friends here, and abstracts of the Passenger Acts for the regulation of North American passenger ships.

All this is useful; and, if the Government would but go a step further, and not content itself with printing such a document, would employ its Poor-Law, Factory, and School Inspectors, as well as its other agents and servants throughout the country, in making known to the labouring classes generally the value, in this cheap and accessible form, of so vast a body of information, voluntary emigration would receive an impetus that could not fail to be of service to the intending emigrants themselves, and to the country generally.

An interesting episode in this great question has recently been detailed, and the country will be glad to learn further particulars, in order that it may gather from them some data as to the probable cost of similar emigration upon a more compendious scale. Our readers will remember that shortly after the French Revolution of the 24th of February, a large body of English workmen were forcibly expelled from France by the absurd and disgraceful jealousy of the French populace. The ultimate fate of these workmen remained unknown to the public generally until within the last few days, when the story was recorded by a daily contemporary. It appeared that the artisans expelled from France were chiefly natives of Nottingham and its vicinity, who, some years ago, had settled at Calais, Lisle, and St. Quentin, and there established themselves in the manufactures of those places. In consequence of the Revolution their trade became paralysed, and hundreds of them found themselves not only thrown entirely out of the means of subsistence by the stoppage of the trade, but exposed to the fury of the exasperated populace of Lisle, St. Quentin, and other places. Seeing no hope for themselves in France, they debated what course to pursue. They made inquiries, in the first place, as to the state of trade at Nottingham and in other parts of England. A majority of them were satisfied that nothing except personal safety was to be gained by returning to England. They then assembled at the Hôtel de Ville, at Calais, and appointed a Committee to manage their case. The Committee interested the British Consul, the British Chaplain, and two or three influential British residents at Calais, in their proceedings, [illegible] by a deputation the workmen might address to [illegible]. On the 21st of March the following memorial, signed by the Committee, was according[illegible] forwarded to Viscount Palmerston:—

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

In accordance with the sentiments unanimously expressed at a meeting of the English workmen, convened for that purpose in the English church at St Pierre lès Calais, on this day, March 21, 1848, the following memorial is respectfully presented to your Lordships. The object of your memorialists is to direct your attention to the singular and painful circumstances in which they are placed by the changes which have been effected in the government of this country. The present state of money affairs in that country, added to the entire want of confidence in the future, has reduced trade in every department to a perfect stand, and consequently left your memorialists without the means of obtaining a livelihood for themselves and families; it is, also, with extreme regret they feel it their duty to inform your Lordships that recent events have called forth feelings of a hostile character [illegible] towards the English, which we Lopel had long ceased to exist, thus rendering our position one of both insecurity and destitution. We, therefore, implore you, as the rulers of the country which gave us birth, to take our case into your serious and immediate consideration. Gloomy as are our prospects here, we feel convinced that our return to England would present no brighter picture, as from the paralysed state of trade there, it holds out not the slightest hope of our obtaining employment. If, therefore, we return to England, it will be with the certain prospect of becoming a burden to our countrymen, and inmates of the already too over-crowded workhouses. Having, therefore, put you in possession of the above facts, we take the liberty of suggesting the following plan, by which you can render an effectual and permanent relief. The scheme we propose is emigration to one of the British colonies (South Australia preferred), where workmen are scarce and labour wanted, our experience here having shown us the great advantage they possess who live under the protection of the British government. We, your memorialists, pledge ourselves to be men of good moral character and industrious habits, in the full possession of health and strength, and men whose feelings revolt at the idea of becoming a burden to their native land. If, therefore, you can provide us with the means of free emigration, we shall cheerfully and gratefully accept them; but if, unfortunately, it is not in your power to grant our request on these conditions, we are quite willing to enter into an engagement to refund a part or whole of the expense incurred, after our arrival, in any way which you, in your discretion, may think fit. Should the prayer of your memorialists be granted, you will confer a benefit upon a body of men who will in after-life look back with heartfelt gratitude to those who now rule the destinies of their native land.

Signed on behalf of the meeting.

Before this document was received at the Foreign Office, a committee of noblemen and gentlemen had been formed in London to devise means for the relief of the English workmen expelled from France. Lord Palmerston forwarded it to that committee, with a notification that the Government would be glad to co-operate with them in the task of relieving the workmen in the manner they had themselves proposed. The result was that an emissary was despatched to Calais, and afterwards to Nottingham; and that a subscription of £600 was raised in the last-mentioned town to assist the intended emigrants. Arrangements were then made with the Emigration Board. The British Consul at Calais devoted his entire leisure to the duty of preparing them for their voyage. Local committees, to provide for outfits, were formed by the British residents at Calais and Boulogne. Steamers were sent by the Government to bring the people to the Thames; and since April between 800 and 900 of these emigrants have been despatched from the Thames to Sydney, Port Philip, and to Adelaide.

It seems to us that all the parties in this interesting history deserve praise; but the workmen most of all. It also seems to us that we have, in this case, a glimpse of the true course to be pursued both in Emigration and Colonisation. Those who bear the heavy burden of poor-rates should consider whether they cannot hold out inducements to the swarm of able-bodied paupers that vainly demand employment in this country, but do not vainly demand food, to emigrate voluntarily to Australia or Canada. To banish the pauper against his consent, because he is a pauper—even with a good end in view as the object of his banishment—would be a tyranny that would be scouted by all classes in this country; but to show the pauper the good he may do himself by voluntary emigration, and to give him pecuniary assistance for that object, would not only be wise and generous to the pauper, but politic in those who pay poor-rates. To convert a dependent and demoralised pauper into an independent and honest labourer, is a task worthy of all praise. It is the task which must be accomplished, not alone for these 900 men of Nottingham, but for many thousands annually of the people of this country, if we intend to grapple, in reality, with the most interesting, as well as the most difficult, question of the age. We shall, doubtless, be enabled, at some future period, to calculate the exact cost of the experiment alluded to. The overburdened parishes of England may then, with the aid of the Government, be enabled to judge whether the experiment can be carried on to a larger extent.

INSURGENT PRISONERS IN PARIS RECEIVING RELIEF FROM THEIR FAMILIES.

Nor these the female fiends, who, sword in hand,
Stood on the Barricades of "Red" July.
And scatter'd murder o'er the bleeding land—
Not these the frenzy-fired, who raised the cry
Of death and pillage, and with furious wrath
Committed deeds, too hideous for a name.
No, they were few; and upon Mercy's path
Crowds of good women blush'd to hear their shame.
Woman may err—woman may give her mind
To evil thoughts, and lose her pure estate;
But for one woman who affronts her kind
By wicked passions and remorseless hate,
A thousand make amends in age and youth,
By heavenly Pity, by sweet Sympathy;—
By patient laboring Truth,
By love, supremest in adversity.
Theirs is the task to succour the distress'd,
To feed the hungry, to console the sad;
To pour the balm upon the wounded breast,
And find dear Pity ever for the bad.
Blessings on Women! In the darkest day
Their love shines brightest. In the perilous hour
Their weak hands glow with strength our feuds to stay.
Blessings upon them! and when Wrath would show
Its condemnation on the few that err'd,
Let it be calm, and cease the world to vex;
And for the good to admiration stir'd,
Forgive them all, and bless their gentler sex.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE SQUADRON OF EXERCISE. The St. Vincent, 120 guns; Prince Regent, 92; Bellerophon, 80; Blenheim, ... Amphion, 34; Tweed, 16; Pilot, 12; Erolc, 16; Ardent, 10, and Racer, 12, were off Portland at ten o'clock on Sunday morning, making westward.

THE Hermes steam sloop, navigated by C. Bolton, Esq., the second master attendant of Portsmouth Dockyard, left that harbour on Monday night for the Tyne, to ship and navigate her Majesty's new screw frigate Dauntless, of 24 guns, to Portsmouth. The Hermes embarked the extra men who assisted in navigating the Columbia, 90-gun ship, to Portland.

INVALID DEPOT.—One thousand seven hundred and thirty-two invalids, waiting their final discharge from their respective regiments, are now at Chatham, where their clothing will be delivered by Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital, for the purpose of being placed on the pension list. That Board granted pensions to near 5000 men during the year 1847.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—On Sunday morning a sermon, on behalf of the funds of King's College Hospital, was preached by the Rev. Henry Howarth, B.A., at the church of St. Clement Danes, Strand. A very eloquent appeal was made, and at the conclusion of Divine service a liberal collection was made in aid of the hospital.

THE ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.—The eighteenth annual meeting of members of the Association will [illegible] at Swansea on Wednesday, the 9th of August. The most active preparations are making in that town under the auspices of the mayor, and a liberal subscription has been entered into for defraying the expenses of receiving the association in a fitting manner.

THE Emigration Commission on Tuesday last appointed a vessel to be despatched from Deptford on the 31st of August, with 400 emigrants, to Twofold Bay, New South Wales. On the 25th of August, a like number will be despatched for Adelaide, south Australia, making a total of 1400 emigrants, exclusive of children, to leave London during the ensuing month.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Paris continues tranquil, as far as such a state is consistent with the periodical recurrence of vague apprehensions of danger from the dreaded ouvriers. On Friday, the 14th (the anniversary of the taking of the Bastile), these fears of violence had assumed such gravity, that the troops of the line and National Guards were held in readiness to act; but the day passed over without any disturbance occurring. Open insurrection, therefore, was not feared; secret plots and conspiracies were what was apprehended.

Attempts at assassination still continued. The night sentinels forming the outposts of the camps and the detached forts were frequently fired at, and sometimes killed. A soldier was thus killed at the camp of St. Maur.

Within the last fortnight the emigration of people from Paris has assumed formidable dimensions. All the employés in the passport offices have been insufficient to discharge the requisite duties. At the Prefecture of Police there has been daily a queue of several hundred yards in length.

The severity of martial law was much relaxed in Paris, but the utmost vigilance was exercised at the barriers in searching all carriages suspected or capable of containing arms and ammunition. No day passed without the detection of attempts to convey ball cartridges to the insurgents still concealed in the environs of the capital. In the interior of Paris the authorities were devising and enforcing measures for preventing the misuse of the ammunition supplied to the National Guards. In short, although there was an apparent revival of confidence, the Government was unremittingly watchful and active in its efforts to ensure the public safety.

The Committees of the National Assembly have advanced considerably the examination of the proposed constitution during the last week. Three committees have concluded their labours, and four have appointed their delegates to the commission on the constitution.

In the present state, M. Prudhon (of Communist notoriety) proposed in the National Assembly that all proprietors of house or landed property be deprived of one-third of the income arising therefrom, and that the produce of that confiscation should be divided between the State and the occupying tenants. This strange proposition was, instead of being instantly scouted, as strangely referred for consideration to a committee, that of finance. Being called upon by the committee to explain the spirit of his proposition in formal terms, M. Prudhon expressed himself in nearly the following words: "I am neither a Communist nor a Socialist. I am opposed to a progressive scale of taxation. I believe, however, that property will suffer the fate of Christianity, which is wearing out, and will wear out. It has not more than a certain time to last—perhaps three hundred years. I wish to accelerate the demise of property, but I do not wish to effect it without its life all at once. It is for that reason that I take only one-third of its income, without prejudice to what I shall propose subsequently."

No member of the committee having supported M. Prudhon's proposition, M. Garnier-Pagès moved that the reporter be appointed to recommend its rejection by the National Assembly. Several members, and amongst them M. Thiers, declared, however, that the question having been raised, it ought to be fully discussed. It was accordingly resolved that the proposition brought forward by M. Prudhon should be thoroughly discussed, and that it was expedient that all those anti-social doctrines, which are sought to be propagated by all possible means amongst the mass of the population, should be publicly discussed, because, being calculated to maintain ideas the most insensate, and the most subversive of all order and security in the minds of the people, it was imperative that their falsehood and their atrocity be demonstrated.

The Moniteur of Sunday morning published a decree for the loan of 150,000,000 of francs from the Bank of France, and the treaty on which it is founded, by which the minister is authorised to contract such loan, and as security to transfer to the Bank 75,000,000 of stock from the sinking fund, and to sell to the Bank certain forests of the state for the remaining 75 millions. The loan is to be advanced thus: 75 millions in 1848, and 75 millions in 1849. The amount payable in 1848 to be paid in equal thirds in July, August, and September, and that of 1849 at the rate of twenty-five millions a month from 1st of January. If the resale of the forests by the Bank produces a loss, the Treasury is to reimburse it, if a profit, the amount of profit is to be paid to the Treasury, the Bank merely taking the sale as a security for its advance. The rate of interest is fixed at 4 per cent. The loan of the seventy-five millions made on the security of the sinking fund to be repaid in 1850, and the other seventy-five millions by sales of the forests.

The table of the receipts of indirect taxes for the first six months of the present year has also been published, and shows a decrease of 61,818,000f. Compared with 1847 there is a decrease of 97,595,000f.

The following decree, signed by General Cavaignac, President of the Council of Ministers, appeared on Monday:—

"FRENCH REPUBLIC.
"LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY.
"In the name of the French People.

"The President of the Council of Ministers, charged with the Executive Government, after having consulted the Council, decrees—

"Citizen Marie is appointed Minister of Justice in place of Citizen Bethmont, whose state of health does not permit him to continue his labours, and whose resignation has been accepted. Citizen Bastide, Minister of Foreign Affairs, is appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs, in place of General Bedeau, who cannot perform his functions, in consequence of wounds received in the days of June, and whose resignation has been accepted. Captain Vaudrey, of the Staff, is appointed Minister of Marine, in place of Citizen Bastide, appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs.

"The Minister of Finance is charged with the execution of the present decree.

"The President of the Council of Ministers charged with the Executive Government, "E. CAVAIGNAC.

"Paris, July 17." "GODDCHAUX, the Minister of Finance.

The disarming of the National Guard of Lyons (which is to be immediately reorganised) was proceeding without opposition. Grape had been attached to some of the muskets surrendered, as a sign of mourning; and many of the National Guards, who would not themselves surrender their arms, sent them to the Mayor by their wives or children. The Minister of War received, on Sunday afternoon, the following telegraphic despatch from the General commanding at Lyons:—"The number of arms, distributed or plundered since February, consisted of 35,404 muskets and 1160 carbines; 32,861 muskets and 634 carbines have been recovered, and I trust that we shall succeed in effecting a complete disarmament."

In order as much as possible to extend employment to the well-disposed operatives in Paris, the Minister of Public Works has resolved that the two millions of francs (£80,000) voted by the National Assembly for supplying the matériel for working the railroad from Versailles to Chartres, which is shortly to be opened, shall be expended among the manufacturers of the capital and the suburbs who have received orders. Applications for locomotives and tenders, the carriages, waggons, and trucks. It is expected that these orders will give employment to a number of operatives who are now existing on an allowance from the Government, in many cases insufficient for the support of their families.

On Monday the Finance Committee took into consideration the proposition of M. Prudhon with respect to landlords and tenants.

M. Thiers declared that the whole proposition was a most fallacious and perfidious one. It was a flagrant injustice and spoliation.

M. Thiers was appointed to draw up the report of the committee on the proposition.

The following is a return of the killed, wounded, and missing, in each battalion of the Garde Mobile:—1st battalion, 6 killed, including the captain, 16 wounded, 27 missing; 2nd battalion, 6 killed, 6 wounded, 9 missing; among the wounded are Commandant Cary and Captain-Adjutant-Major Harnard, the wound of the latter causes the gangrene to set in. 3rd battalion, no killed, no wounded, 22 missing; this battalion was but little engaged. 4th battalion, 4 killed, 26 wounded, 15 missing; the Commandant, M. Tiunot, is among the wounded. 5th battalion, 9 killed, 46 wounded, 6 missing; 6th battalion, stationed at Rouen, had only a detachment at Paris, 2 wounded; 7th battalion, 6 killed, 54 wounded, 4 missing; several of the wounded underwent amputation, and some subsequently died. 8th battalion, 4 killed, [illegible] an officer severely wounded. 9th battalion, six killed, twenty-four wounded, fourteen missing; 10th battalion, three killed, ten wounded, five missing; 11th battalion, 3 killed, 4 wounded, 15 missing; 12th battalion, 10 killed, 39 wounded; the chef de bataillon, 2 lieutenants, and a sub-lieutenant are among the wounded. 13th battalion, 11 killed, 56 wounded; a chef de bataillon, a lieutenant, among the wounded 2 captains, 3 lieutenants. 14th battalion, 3 killed, 17 wounded, 22 missing; 15th battalion, 4 killed, 19 wounded, 1 missing; 16th battalion, not known; the Commandant Cippoline and Captain-Adjutant-Major Farey, of the 8th regiment, were killed at the taking of the barricades. 17th battalion, 6 killed, 14 wounded; 18th battalion, not exactly known; 19th battalion, 6 killed, 32 wounded, 3 missing; 20th battalion, 14 killed, 38 wounded—among the killed were 3 captains and 1 lieutenant; among the wounded the chef de bataillon and 2 lieutenants; 21st battalion, 5 killed, 19 wounded, 10 missing; 22nd battalion, 4 killed, 25 wounded, 10 missing—among the killed 1 lieutenant, among the wounded 2 captains, 3 lieutenants. 24th battalion, 2 killed, 13 wounded, 16 missing; 24th battalion, 8 killed, 30 wounded, 7 missing."

The reorganisation of the municipality of Paris, which has just been effected by a decree of General Cavaignac, terminates the career of M. Armand Marrast as Mayor of Paris. The municipality is restored to the organisation it had before the Revolution of February. The Prefecture of the Seine, which was abolished, is re-established, and M. Trouver-Chauvel, late Prefect of Police, appointed to the office. M. Dacoux is named Prefect of Police, and M. O'Reilly (formerly a political convict) appointed Chief Secretary.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

[illegible] there was but one case of no particular interest the announcement of an Inspector-General of the Fisheries, at a salary of 9,000f., was carried by a majority of 22, and the Bill proposed by the Minister of the Interior was adopted in its ensemble.

The Bill granting 300,000*l.* as an encouragement to the fine arts and belles lettres was adopted without discussion.

The discussion on the Bill for erecting a monument to the late Archbishop of Paris was opened by the President, who read a letter from the clergy of Paris, thanking the Assembly for the marks of sympathy which it had manifested towards the late lamented pastor, and requesting to have the statue erected in the cathedral of Notre Dame.

After some observations from MM. Babaud Larivière, Coquerel, Bousquet, and M. [illegible], who concluded his speech by observing that [illegible] manifestation an indication of public disposition to conciliation was to erect the monument on the very spot where the Archbishop was mortally wounded, and inscribe thereon the words "In France all citizens [illegible]," the general discussion was declared closed; and when the articles had been brought forward, M. Delongrais proposed to substitute the words—"In the Cathedral of Notre Dame" for "in the Pantheon."

This amendment was adopted almost unanimously, as were also all the articles.

A short discussion arose as to the cost of the monument, when, on the proposition of the Minister of the Interior, a sum of 50,000 francs was voted out of the budget of 1848.

TUESDAY. The discussion on the question of rendering education in military schools gratuitous, which occupied the Assembly to-day, assumed a most tumultuous character; the President was twice obliged to suspend the sitting. At last, the Minister of War proposed that the measure, which was to take effect on the 1st October [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

GRAND FETE CHAMPETRE AT CHARLTON HOUSE, IN AID OF THE FUNDS OF THE ROYAL KENT DISPENSARY.—THE PROCESSION TO THE TOURNAMENT.

GRAND FETE CHAMPETRE AT CHARLTON HOUSE.

On Friday last, this fine ancestral seat was the scene of a picturesque fete, given in aid of the funds of the Royal Kent Dispensary. Charlton is just the domain for such an entertainment; and the motive of its truly noble and benevolent owner, Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson, in placing his grounds at the disposal of the Charity, cannot be too highly commended. Three years since, the excellent Baronet gave up his estate for a similar purpose: the result replenished the treasury of the Dispensary; and the proceeds of this year's festival must be alike cheering. It presented, moreover, novel features of attraction, so as to enable us to illustrate the gay scenes.

The Lodge gates were opened at twelve o'clock, and the fete commenced at one. We have not space to enumerate the amusements, but must glance at a few of them. Music, of course, formed a prominent feature; and there were provided the Royal Artillery Band, the Royal Marine Band, and the brass band of the Royal Sappers and Miners. In the course of the afternoon was given a concert by the Chorus Singers of Her Majesty's theatre, under the superintendence of M. Maretzek; and they sang glees and madrigals, and other songs of the olden time, with beautiful effect. Then Mr. Sedgwick's concertina quartett party discoursed their soft music; and a party of singers in Pyrenean costumes sang some characteristic melodies; and Herr Von Joel, the German sojjour, and his son, commenced a sort of rivalry with "the pretty warbling choir" in the leafy orchestras of Charlton.

The Park and Grounds were also appropriated very ingeniously to a chivalric display, got up by Mr. Batty and his troupe, with his stud of horses, ponies, camels, &c., who must really have enjoyed their emancipation from the heat and gas-light of Astley's Amphitheatre.

At about two o'clock there was a grand Historical Procession of the whole of Batty's Company and Stud, in the following order:—

Advanced Military Guard, eight deep.
Band of the Royal Sappers and Miners.
Two Trumpeters on Horseback.
TWO LADIES ON HORSEBACK.
Two Banner Men
Two Knights en Caparisoned Horses, Earl of OXFORD and Earl of SURREY.
Two Banner Men
LADIES ON HORSEBACK
Banner Men on Horses
Royal Artillery Band.
Two Court Fools, in ancient party-coloured dresses—one seated on a diminutive pony, the other on an ass.
DANCING GIRLS, dressed in character, with baskets of flowers; and advancing in figured movements, under the direction of a ballet-master
THE QUEEN OF BEAUTY,
Seated on a milk-white steed, dressed in a costume of purple velvet, brilliantly embossed, and wearing a crown; Her Majesty was shaded by a silken canopy, borne by four pedestrian attendants, and accompanied by Ladies of Honour on horseback, and Court Pages.
TWO LADIES ON HORSEBACK
Two Knights, Earl PERCY and Lord STANLEY.
Two Banner Men on Horseback.
Royal Marine Band
TWO LADIES ON HORSEBACK
A CAMEL, caparisoned in the style of the Desert bearing an Egyptian, in Eastern costume.
Two Banner Men on Horseback
Two Knights armed cap-a-pie [illegible] and RATCLIFFE
Two Banner Men on Horseback
TWO LADIES ON HORSEBACK
Four Mounted Foresters.
Two Banner Men
FIGURATIVE CAR, drawn by four beautiful cream-coloured ponies, sustaining in the centre (living figures) Britannia, supported by the Four Seasons.
Four Pages
Two Banner Men on Horseback
Two Knights on Horseback.
Mounted Knights, and attendant Banner Men.

Thus, the pageant advanced across the lawn, in front of the fine old mansion, to "the lists" in the Park, where gallant knights charged each other, were by turns unhorsed, and returned to the fray, thus converting Charlton into a "Field of Cloth of Gold." Our Artist has portrayed this pair of picturesque scenes—the Procession and the Tournament.

Then followed a series of Scenes of the Circle, including some clever equestrian feats by Batty's artistes, besides triumphs of equitation and strength, dancing on the tight-rope, &c. But the most characteristic display was an equestrian pageant by eight horses, with their dames and cavaliers in costumes of the moyen age, who thus danced quadrilles with astonishing grace.

And thus the gay round of pastimes, not forgetting some taking imitations of old English sports, was kept up till seven o'clock, when the fete closed

There could not have been fewer than 12,000 visitors during the day, so that we conclude the proceeds to be a considerable addition to the Dispensary funds.

There was one omission, the cause of which was a very severe affliction. Mr T. Thompson had been advertised to give his "classic marble groupings, or

THE MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY'S COSTUME BALL AT HOLDERNESSE HOUSE.—THE SCULPTURE GALLERY.

...ong statues ... he was prevented by an attack of paralysis on the ... preceding the fête.

We must add a few words of the original locality, with its "ancient picturesque pile of building," says the pretty "Pictorial Guide to Eltham Palace," "belonging to no pure architectural style, erected by Sir Adam Newton in the reign of James the First. It is perched upon a hill of gradual ascent, and commands the noble prospect of the Thames. It is of red brick, faced here and there with stone, with an open balustrade running round its summit; above this ornamental parapet may be seen straggling groups of clustered chimneys, and two small towers that surmount the projecting wings of the principal front, and agreeably diversify the general outline. The entrance is ornamented in a style both varied and elaborate, which, though displaying great incongruity in its various parts, puts forth strong claims to our approval by reason of its admirable picturesqueness. This would appear to have been the one great aim of the architects of the Elizabethan period. In this centre part we have dwarfish columns and deep bay windows, garnished with heraldic ornaments and grotesque devices, producing great variety of parts, yet leaving no one blank upon which the eye might light and there repose."

The interior has a large manorial hall, with music gallery; a noble staircase; snug wainscoted parlours, and long oak-lined galleries, with antique windows and quaintly-moulded ceilings; and we rejoice to say that Sir Thomas Wilson is a man of taste, to appreciate these older features, and delights in restoring them from the disfigurements of his predecessors.

MARYLEBONE THEATRE.

One Illustration is taken from the second act of Mr. Bayle Bernard's favourite drama "Lucille," one of the best pieces of its class that we have. The scene is from the second act, and introduces De Vaucour (Mr. Howe), Lucille (Mrs. Keeley), and Julia (Miss Mary Keeley).

The appearance of these artistes, who commenced the season there on Monday, is a source of great attraction. Mr. Keeley has been playing in Morton's farce of the "Thumping Legacy," and he and his wife in the "Post of Honour," one of the Lyceum successes during their management.

The house has been elegantly fitted up, and is one of the most comfortable theatres in the metropolis.

GRAND FETE AT HOLDERNESSE HOUSE.

One of the most amiable conceits of the present fashionable season is the giving of magnificent fêtes, with the excellent motive of benefiting our artisans, by creating an instant demand for manufactures of a very costly character. Such are the Fancy Dress and Costume Balls, of which there has been a greater number this season than we ever remember. The working of the good is simply this:—The distinguished personages who thus throw open their mansions, enjoin that every visitor appear in a fancy or historical costume, the supply of which causes abundant employment in Spitalfields and other seats of manufacture. Milliners, tailors, hosiers, bootmakers, embroiderers, jewellers, cutlers, and a host of other trades are thus set to work, and much indirect good is unquestionably produced by this novel means of giving a stimulus to artistic skill.

On Tuesday evening, the 11th, Holdernesse House, the mansion of the Marquis of Londonderry, in Park-lane, was the scene of one of these magnificent réunions, suggested by the recent Spitalfields Ball, the great feature of which entertainment—the Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of England—was arranged by the Marchioness of Londonderry.

Holdernesse House has long been celebrated for these displays of ingenuity and fine taste; but never had the fête of Tuesday week been equalled within its beautiful salons. The whole of the interior of the mansion was brilliantly decorated for the occasion; and the Sculpture Gallery, wherein the Ball took place, presented a superb scene.

There were about 1000 members of the leading aristocracy present. The ladies and gentlemen engaged in the Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of England were among the earliest arrivals, and assembled in the gallery.

Irrespective of the Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of England, the noble hostess arranged for this especial occasion a Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of France.

Every guest was attired either in fancy dress or uniform. The Marchioness of Londonderry wore a most superb costume, consisting of a petticoat of rich white satin, with deep gold and silver lama; a kirtle, or upper robe, of the finest ermine, embroidered with fleurs-de-lis and gold dragons, and clasped down the sides with broad bands of red velvet, covered with jewels; a train of cloth of gold, lined with white satin, and edged with heavy gold twist; and a broad waistband of magnificent jewels. Her Ladyship's head-dress consisted of an imperial crown of diamonds, emeralds, rubies, turquoises, &c., with long Gothic plaits, equally covered with precious stones. The top of the dress was adorned with a broad chain of jewels, with hanging open sleeves of ermine, looped up with diamonds.

The Marquis of Londonderry was attired in the full uniform of an English general of cavalry, with the hussar jacket.

The dresses generally were of the most recherché character. Among the best fancy costumes were those of the Viscountess Villiers, and Captain Willes Johnson, R.N., the latter of whom personated a Chinese mandarin. Not the least interesting in the brilliant throng were the Lord Ernest Vane, youngest son of the Marquis of Londonderry, who personated a page in the costume of the period of Henry VIII.; and the infant Earl of Sunderland, the beautiful child of the Marquis and Marchioness of Blandford.

At seven o'clock, the Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of England, headed by four or five of the 2nd Life Guards band playing a slow march, moved from the gallery down the grand staircase to the morning room. This quadrille was followed by that of the Queens of France; and both sets having been duly marshalled, they returned up stairs, and, passing through the suite of saloons, entered the gallery, where dancing was immediately commenced. The effect of this procession was exceedingly good.

After the fancy quadrilles, dancing was commenced by the general company, and the festivities were prolonged until an advanced hour on Wednesday morning.

Some beautiful photographs of the characters in the Quadrille of the Kings and Queens of England, taken from the life by Mr. Beard, jun., were upon the tables in the principal saloon during the evening, and excited much interest.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.
LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1848.

CONTRARY to the anticipations indulged in a few days ago, the state of Ireland is not satisfactory. Agitation has not received its quietus by the deportation of Mr. John Mitchel, and the promptitude of the Government in following up its prosecutions against men who by spoken or written incentives to violence have endangered the peace of the country. It appears that an extensive though secret organisation of clubs has pervaded the whole of Roman Catholic Ireland; and that although many persons imagined that the danger had been much exaggerated, the Government formed a juster estimate of its magnitude, and took such measures of precaution and repression as the circumstances warranted. Dublin, Cork, Waterford, and Drogheda have been placed by proclamation under the special provisions of the Peace Preservation Act, with the view of enabling the Executive to resort to summary measures for the disarming and arrest of those whom it may have reason to regard as disaffected; and, although the circumstances are not known in detail which have induced the Government to resort to this extreme course, the country may be certain, that, after so many months of patient and energetic forbearance, it has not acted in this instance without sufficient justification.

Among other circumstances upon which the Government appears to have acted are the disturbances that have occurred at the town of Carrick-on-Suir, in Tipperary. In this town, with a population of 10,000, a club of men armed, to resist the Government, amounted to 2000, at the head of whom was the Rev. Mr. Byrne, the Roman Catholic priest. This person marched at the head of the club to a great meeting of physical-force repealers at the mountain of Slievenamon, where he made an incendiary harangue. He was arrested on his return, and lodged in the Brideswell; but a large assemblage of the townspeople, joined by the peasantry of the neighbourhood, collected in the streets, and demanded his instant liberation. The clubs were strong, the police were insufficient to meet their threatened violence; and the state of matters grew so alarming that it was thought advisable, to prevent his forcible rescue, that he should be liberated on the bail of two respectable householders, who appeared in court to answer any charge that might be preferred against him. There was no magistrate present in the town, and the police acted upon their own responsibility.

In addition to this, it appears that Mr. Smith O'Brien, who has long escaped the penalties of the law, and kept his speeches within the limits of safe sedition, has rendered himself amenable to the provisions of the late Act by a speech at Drogheda, and will be forthwith prosecuted against. The Clubs, as an aggregate meeting in Dublin, at which the representatives of thirty of these confederations were present, have passed a series of resolutions, to the effect that the end of their organisation is the overthrow of the power of English legislation, and that, so far from seeking disorder or anarchy, they desire to secure the independence of Ireland, "with the least possible injury to any class." The most favourable circumstance in this present condition of Irish society is, that the priesthood generally condemn the violence of the Clubbist agitators, and that the conduct of such men as the Rev. Mr. Byrne is loudly disapproved by the most esteemed and truly influential of the Roman Catholic Clergy.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL has made the usual Ministerial declaration, which is always expected towards the end of July, with regard to the measures to be passed or to be abandoned during the few remaining weeks of the session. The present session has been a long, but certainly not a prolific one, unless mere talk can be considered fruitfulness. It appears that, with the exception of the Bills for the Better Security of the Crown, and for the Repression of Seditious Speaking and Writing in Great Britain and Ireland, the only Ministerial measures that will be passed this session are Lord Morpeth's Health of Towns Bill, very greatly modified; the Bill for the Renewal of Diplomatic Relations with Rome, which has been so altered in committee, that only a third and a half of the original remains; the new modification of the Sugar Duties; some minor matters relating to the New Poor Law; and Lord John Russell's own Bill for preventing corrupt practices in small boroughs. All other measures, including the Repeal of the Navigation Laws, and a swarm of measures relating to Ireland, are to be postponed till next session. Surely the mode in which the business of the House is managed must be wrong, when important measures are postponed for want of time, although, as everybody knows, time is rightly wasted by long debates leading to no issue, and "count-outs" are of weekly occurrence.

"LOOKING INTO THE MIDDLE OF NEXT WEEK."—Under this heading, our facetious, but not always veracious, contemporary Punch insinuates, in its publication of this week, that the views of events in Paris and elsewhere, which have appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, have been manufactured in London, "and that orders are doubtlessly given to the artist to get up a great revolution immediately, with plenty of barricades in it, so that they may be inserted as wanted." We can bear a good-natured joke as well as other people, and might, perhaps, be content to let this impertinence pass, as the mere idle breath of a professed jester, were there not an evident desire on the part of the writer to have his insinuation accepted as truth. Our contemporary does us the justice to acknowledge the beauty and excellence of the pictorial embellishments of this journal—an opinion which we are proud to know is shared by the great bulk of the public, as well as by the choicer few whose appreciation is of itself a high reward; but he does not seem to have any idea of the rapidity with which our artists can do their work. We shall merely add, as the best reply to the insinuations of Punch, or the charges of any other person or journal, that we shall be at all times happy to show the original sketches, as received from Paris or other cities, upon which our artists and engravers have worked, and to afford every information of the authenticity of any and every engraving that appears in the pages of this Journal. Punch, and Punch's Dog, and Judy to boot, may be gratified by the inspection of the originals at our office, at any time he or they may please. We have no desire to boast of our exertions or of our pecuniary outlay in these matters; but we must, in self-defence, affirm, in answer to a charge like this, that we spare neither trouble nor expense to procure the most authentic sketches from the most able and most celebrated artists, both at home and abroad, and that we shall be glad to afford the most satisfactory proofs of this allegation to any one who may doubt it, or to any Subscriber, doubtful or not, who will do us the favour to call at our office for the purpose.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Sunday morning the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel in Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Sackville Canon officiated.

On Monday her Majesty and his Royal Highness the Prince Albert paid a visit and took luncheon with the Queen Dowager at Bushy Park, and afterwards paid a visit to the Comte and Comtesse de Neuilly, at Claremont. The Queen had a dinner party in the evening at Buckingham Palace.

On Tuesday morning her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, and attended by Major-General Wemyss and Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour, equerries in waiting, drove to the Botanic Gardens, at Kew, where they were received by Sir William Hooker. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness visited the Botanic Museum. His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided in the afternoon at a meeting of the Commission for promoting and encouraging the Fine Arts in the new building, the Palace of Westminster. The Queen, Prince Albert, and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, honoured the performance at Her Majesty's Theatre with their presence.

On Wednesday morning the Queen and Prince Albert rode out on horseback, attended by the Hon. Eleanor Stanley, Major-Gen. Wemyss, and Lieut.-Col. Seymour. Prince Albert visited and inspected Mr. Cubitt's establishment at Millbank in the forenoon. The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, drove in the afternoon in an open carriage-and-four to the Willow-bank, Fulham, to honour with their presence the fete in aid of the Ladies' and Washhouses. Prince Albert honoured the performance at the Lyceum Theatre with his presence in the evening.

PUBLIC MEETINGS

COLLEGE OF CIVIL ENGINEERS, PUTNEY.—On Tuesday, the annual distribution of prizes at this valuable institution took place in the hall of the College, in the presence of a numerous and distinguished party of visitors. The meeting was also honoured by the presence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Bishops of London and Oxford, the Earl of Devon, Lord W. Fitzroy, &c. The proceedings commenced by a general review of the progress of the institution during the past year by the Rev. the Principal, who, after alluding to the advance made by the students, called the attention of the meeting to the plans in progress for improving the College system by the addition of classes of metallurgy and general engineering for Indian officers. On this latter point he dwelt at some length, urging upon those gentlemen present who were connected with the first great advantages to be derived from promoting instruction in civil engineering to officers in both services, civil and military. He then referred to the measures in progress under the Government for improving the condition of our large towns, which would require the services of numerous well-educated, intelligent officers to carry them out efficiently; and he thought it ought to be satisfied that the demand for a practical and scientific education, such as could be obtained at the College, would constantly increase. The prizes were then distributed.

SPITALFIELDS RAGGED SCHOOLS.—On Tuesday evening the third annual general meeting of the friends and supporters of the Dolphin-court Spitalfields Ragged School was held at the British and Foreign Model-room, Spitalfields. The Lord Ashley, M.P., in the chair, supported by Henry Hoare, Esq., J. Robertson, Esq., Dr. King, Rev. J. Allen, and several other gentlemen. The report contained a brief history of the destitution that has existed in this part of the metropolis. During the last winter the wretched state of the children, from want of food, became so painfully apparent, that the committee were compelled to open a room to the extent of 200 meals a week; and about 80 of them, through the assistance of General Bruldshaw and his daughter, who subscribed £12 for the purpose, were supplied with clothes. Amongst the number of children now attending the school, it was found that 50 were without parents, 13 with only stepmothers, 3 the children of convicts, 50 were without beds, 20 without shoes, 30 without caps or bonnets, and 10 entirely without linen. The sum of £100 has been received and acquitted. The children of both sexes provided with the wearing apparel furnished by the assistance of General Bradshaw were introduced, and sang hymns in a very pleasing manner. Several gentlemen addressed the meeting. After a vote of thanks to Lord Ashley, the meeting separated.

ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—The quarterly general meeting of the members of this society was held on Monday at the Freemasons' Tavern, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Lord Robert Grosvenor in the chair. The object of the association is to provide relief for builders, of sixty years of age and upwards, in reduced circumstances, as well as to maintain as annuitants for decayed master builders, their wives and widows. For this purpose a fund has been raised since the preliminary meeting, held exactly a year since; and the amount was greatly augmented by a long list of subscriptions after the dinner on Wednesday. The noble Chairman ably advocated the claims of the Institution to public support; and after the customary loyal toasts had been drunk, prosperity to the institution was drunk with great enthusiasm. Lord Robert Grosvenor having vacated the chair, it was taken by Mr. W. Biers, the President of the Society; and, after a pleasant evening, the party broke up. The musical arrangements, under the superintendence of Mr. Hatton, gave great satisfaction.

THE LONDON COFFEE AND EATING-HOUSE KEEPERS' ASSOCIATION.—The half-yearly meeting of the friends and supporters of this institution was held on Monday evening, at Freemasons'-hall, Great Queen's-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Mr. George Chislett, the President, in the chair. From the report, which was read by the secretary, it appeared that the funded property of the Institution, which at last year was £19,5 0 3s. 9d., had been augmented by the interest to £1989 8s. 10d., which, with the balance in the treasurer's hands of £69 11s. 10d., made the total amount £2058 18s. 9d. The number of pensioners on the fund was 47. The report having been adopted, the presidents and officers for the ensuing half-year were elected; after which the proceedings terminated.

ELECTION OF SHERIFFS.—A Common Hall was held on Thursday at one o'clock, to elect the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex for the ensuing year, in the room of Messrs. Bousfield and Mills, who refused to serve the office. After the usual formalities, the election fell upon Messrs Chandler and Benson.

GRAND FETE AT FULHAM.—On Wednesday last, by the kind permission of the Bishop of London and family, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Committee for the Fete in aid of the Ladies' and Washhouses, had the honour of receiving the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by their children, the Princess Royal and the Princess Alice, and attended by Major-General Wemyss and Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour, equerries in waiting, drove to the Botanic Gardens, at Kew, where they were received by Sir William Hooker. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness visited the Botanic Museum. ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—The quarterly general meeting of the members of this society was held on Monday at the Freemasons' Tavern, St. James's-street; Admiral Lord Radstock in the chair. Capt. Dickson, the secretary, read the quarterly account of receipts and disbursements, stating that the former had been £1989 8s. 3d., and leaving a balance in hand of £376 8s. 8d. A question having been brought forward for appointing as honorary secretaries such officers on foreign stations as were willing to accept that office and advocate the interests of the society abroad, the chairman thought it would be a bad precedent to call any officers honorary secretaries, except such as were settled ashore, at the dockyards, or elsewhere. After a short discussion, it was resolved that they should be called honorary correspondents. It was then announced that the voluntary subscriptions towards defraying the law expenses incurred in defending the actions brought by Miss Hoare had amounted to £425 11s., about half the sum required. Capt. Allen, Capt. Begbie, and Lieut. Brock, having been appointed members of the committee to investigate applications for relief for the ensuing six months, and some further business disposed of, the meeting proceeded with the consideration of the memorials from distressed widows and orphans of naval officers; and after awarding several sums in relief, the proceedings terminated.

BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday, the first anniversary of the establishment of this society was celebrated by a dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, which was numerously attended by the master-builders of the metropolis; Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., in the chair. The object of the association is to provide relief for builders, of sixty years of age and upwards, in reduced circumstances, as well as to maintain as annuitants for decayed master builders, their wives and widows. GRAND FETE AT FULHAM.—On Wednesday last, by the kind permission of the Bishop of London and family, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Committee for the Fete given at Willow Bank, the residence of Arthur Webster, Esq., in aid of the baths and washhouses for the London square, Whitechapel, and several other public works also present. Her Majesty was present at the performance of a grand concert under the direction of Signor Costa, and during the dancing of the Countess de Fahaun's Quadrille, the Countess of Eglinton's Juvenile Quadrille, and Lady Eddisbury's quadrille, in the large tent erected for the purpose. Mr. Robert-Houdin had afterwards the honour of giving his Séance Fantastique in presence of her Majesty in another part of the grounds, with which she appeared much pleased, returning at the conclusion to the mansion, where Messrs. A. Sedgwick and Beales' concertina quartet party performed several pieces. The Royal party left the grounds about seven o'clock. Dancing was kept up till a late hour.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &c., FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 15.—The number of births registered during the above week in the metropolitan and suburban districts was 1326. Of the number (which exceeds that of the preceding week by 44), 674 were males and 652 females. The total number of deaths during the same week was 936, of which 452 were males and 4.6 females. Thus the births exceeded the deaths by 390. The deaths are also 40 less in number than those of the preceding week, and 42 less than the weekly average during the last five summers.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

IRELAND.—The Earl of GLENGALL, in moving for copies of reports from the stipendiary magistrates, constabulary officers, and police, respecting the formation of clubs in Ireland since March, 1848, took occasion to enter into a statement of the state of things in that country, which has been already made known through the journals.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE observed in reply, that the Government were alive to the dangerous state of affairs in Ireland, and were determined to deal energetically with it. After some observations of Lords BROUGHAM and STANLEY, the subject dropped.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

STATE OF IRELAND.—Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that on to-morrow (this day) he would move for leave to bring in a bill to empower the Executive Government of Ireland to apprehend, and detain in custody until the 1st of March, 1849, such persons as the Government might have reason to suspect of conspiring against her Majesty's person and realms.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL.

The House then went into committee on this Bill, when the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER entered into his (at least) tenth explanatory statement on the mysteries of differential duties, foreign and colonial produce, &c.

After some discussion the clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

JURIES IN IRELAND.—On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. KENNY moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the law and practice of striking juries for the trial of criminal cases in Ireland, and especially all the facts connected with the striking of the juries in the late cases of Messrs. S. O'Brien, T. Meagher, and J. Mitchel. The hon. gentleman contended that the course taken in these latter cases was illegal, and strongly complained of the exclusion of Roman Catholics from the jury, especially in the case of John Mitchel.—Sir G. GREY defended the conduct of the Attorney-General for Ireland. After a tedious discussion, full of personalities, the debate was ultimately adjourned. Adjourned.

COURT OF CONSERVANCY.—The Lord Mayor held a Court of Conservancy at the Swan Hotel, Westminster-bridge, yesterday, at one o'clock. His Lordship afterwards—accompanied by several Aldermen, the Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and other civic dignitaries, embarked in the City barge, and proceeded to Kew, and inspected the banks of the river.

THE CHARTIST CONVICTS.—On Thursday twenty shillings was paid at the gate of Tothill fields House of Correction to release Mr. Ernest Jones for one month from oakum picking, to which he has been, in common with his fellow Chartist convicts, subjected since his incarceration, and will be, in default of the payment of a weekly sum of five shillings, the charge made by the county for his maintenance. The Times

M. Dornes, one of the members of the National Assembly, who was wounded at one of the barricades during the insurrection, died on Thursday morning of his wounds. He is the fourth member of the National Assembly who has fallen a victim of this miserable insurrection. The others are Generals Negrier and Duvivier and Colonel Carbonnel. M. Bexic, General Bedeau, and M. Lafontaine are still confined to their rooms with their wounds, and MM. St. Gardens, de Hautreliu, Sarrans, and Clement Thomas, who were also wounded, have completely recovered.

The National Assembly has passed a bill, granting 15,000 francs per month to General Cavaignac, as prix de bureau.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE SAILING SEASON.

Once more upon the waters. BYRON.

THE current week was an Olympian lull, pending the mighty meeting in Goodwood Park. The market at Tattersall's was flat and unprofitable, whatever it may have been elsewhere. If little was done in the way of speculative investment, it was not the fault of those who cater for it. The scheme of one Racing Lottery Office in the Strand alone announces the two drawings—on the Goodwood Stakes, and the other on the Doncaster St. Leger—which include prizes to the amount of one hundred and forty-five thousand pounds! This is the "fast" age: the race began with railway shares—it is continued in racing sweeps; presently the electric telegraph will furnish the means for still more new encounters; and who shall say but we may come round again to the philosopher's stone?

But our present purpose is rather with the bubbles that the water hath. Sparkling passages are many of these. For instance, Brother Jonathan has thrown down the gauntlet to the Squadron. In the wake of the tempest of Sunday, the 9th inst., there arrived in the harbour of Portsmouth a Baltimore clipper, destined to squash all the Yacht Clubs of Great Britain and Ireland into one everlasting cul-de-sac. There is something awfully grim and ghostly in the look of the flying Yankee. Who ever saw a white schooner? Can you imagine the Anaconda in a winding-sheet? And then her spars, lofty as those of a lunatic ship, and spanning the whole superficies of the topmast. There they are, aspiring to the clouds; and, blow high, blow low, so shall, a must, they be ever. This "craft" is to the eye—there's no saying what she is—probably of a hundred tons burden. She is a pretty model afloat, apparently drawing little water forward, with a lowish beam. It is said to be the purpose of those who have sent or brought her to these shores to challenge the elite of our vaster waters. Perhaps the same may be said of the new model sloop, apparently the look of the flying Yankee. Who ever saw a white schooner? Can you imagine the Anaconda in a winding-sheet? And then her spars, lofty as those of a lunatic sloop, and spanning the whole superficies of the topmast. There they are, aspiring to the clouds; and, blow high, blow low, so shall, a must, they be ever. This "craft" is to the eye—there's no saying what she is—probably of a hundred tons burden. She is a pretty model afloat, apparently drawing little water forward, with a lowish beam. It is said to be the purpose of those who have sent or brought her to these shores to challenge the elite of our vaster waters. Perhaps the same may be said of the new model sloop, apparently yachtsmen a wrinkle. The system adopted with pleasure-boats meant to race certainly seems a very anomalous one. A yacht of the description, of twenty-five tons, is got into "trim," as they are pleased to call it, by means of some thirty tons of ballast, to say nothing of her crew and indiscriminate hamper. The more weight a horse has to carry, the slower he is supposed to go: why should to be the reverse in the sailing body? . . . .

The sailing season, which has but now commenced, has already produced some novelties. We have had a match round Ireland; and Lord Cardigan has got into the squadron. The Royal Club are for the most part in a flourishing condition Some people will have it there are too many of them; but some people make it a point to grumble, to show their superiority. A considerable fleet of amateur galleys is for sale—for speed in the order of the day, as in racing sweeps; and the last boat is sure to beat her predecessor. There's the Mosquito can now distance anything that ever was built afloat on the river will build ye what shall beat her—for a consideration. A Hampshire journal has the temerarity to state that the Royal Yacht Squadron is in deep disgrace because of favours shewn to its contemporaries: "Instare omnes celsitibus ceteri?"

Among the nautical features of the Solent is the appearance of the Royal Yacht. Her début promises to "top" anything yet done with her. As heretofore, the Squadron lies at Cowes looks melancholy and not very gentlemanlike. The Royal Victoria, at Ryde, is the very ideal of a marine club-house, and the South-Western members are most appropriately lodged at Southampton. On the heels of Goodwood Races come the Wight Regattas, and these up the westward of the Needles. Though these festivals are still to come off, you cannot look on Cowes Roads, or the junction of the Medina with salt-water, without being aware that the sailing season has begun where alone pleasure-sailing is to be seen in perfection.

THAMES GRAND REGATTA.—THURSDAY.

This aquatic sport, which has for some weeks past been the chief topic of conversation amongst rowing men of all grades, commenced on Thursday at Putney under the able management of a committee of gentlemen, selected from the principal aquatic clubs, who have been unremitting in their endeavours to produce this aquatic banquet in the best possible manner. The attendance of spectators throughout the day was immense, and although the early part of the day's race the racing commenced at three o'clock, and continued until half-past seven.

The fourth boat (Newell's) did not start. They were not ready at the time of starting, and, having been waited for as long as the umpire possibly could, the start was made without them. It was certainly a beautiful start, and a most gallant race. The Claspers and Coombes were at desperate work, and of the committee barge the Claspers had just succeeded in drawing half their length in advance of the Coombe, but, as both the latter and the Shields steered too much into Bute Elms, whilst the others kept a beautiful course, it was a general impression that they would overhaul them. This, however, was not so: the Claspers gradually went further away, every inch of water being gallantly disputed by the Coombes. The race was won by upwards of two lengths. The Shields crew fell a long way astern

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock, and sat for half-an-hour.

WAYS AND MEANS.—On the motion for receiving the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means, Lord GEORGE BENTINCK availed himself of the opportunity of putting questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the duties on certain classes of sugar, to which the right hon. gentleman replied, in an explanatory speech as to the reasons which led to the following results:—That Dutch and Hamburg refined sugars were admissible for home consumption at £1 4s. 8d. duty per cwt.; and that there was a certain quantity of Muscovado and clayed sugars now in the bonded warehouses, which not having been imported in privileged ships, nor from countries where they were produced, those [illegible] Laws, for home consumption, except upon the payment of 42s. per cwt. duty.—The Report of the Committee of Ways and Means was then received, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

SPAIN.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, in reply to a question from the Marquis of LONDONDERRY relative to the events passing in Spain, stated that it was true that a Spanish general had been put to death by another Spanish general—both generals having been formerly in the Carlist service—but the circumstance had taken place before any foreign diplomatic agent could possibly interfere. The Earl of MALMESBURY remarked, that the pretender to the Spanish throne was in this country, and should be called on by the Government to withdraw his partisans from Spain. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE replied that the personage alluded to was residing here as a private gentleman, and that the Government had no right to interfere with him. It did not appear that he was holding himself forth as a pretender to the Spanish Crown, and, even if he did do so, the Government could not suppress him by holding any communication with him as such.—After some further observations, the question dropped.

LAW OF ENTAIL (SCOTLAND).—On the motion to go into committee on the Law of Entail (Scotland) Bill, the Earl of HARDWICKE opposed the motion, and moved, as an amendment, that it be committed that day three months. Lord CAMPBELL defended the Bill; and, after a short discussion, the amendment was withdrawn, and the Bill passed through committee.

The Canada Union Act Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed, after a few observations from Lord STANLEY.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

QUESTIONS.

Lord G. BENTINCK asked the Colonial Under-Secretary the reason why a reply given by the Montreal Board of Trade to the letter of the Governor-General of Canada—declaring "that it was their duty and their right to denounce the baneful consequences of the abandonment of the protective policy"—was not included in the Canadian papers laid on the table?—Mr. HAWES said that no such document had been received at the Colonial Office.

Lord LINCOLN inquired if it was the resolve of the Government to make a grant of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company, pending the inquiry into charges against the company? Lord J. RUSSELL replied that it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the arrangement with the Hudson's Bay Company, and to make grant of the land of Vancouver's Island to them, providing, however, for a free Government in the usual way of a charter of the Crown.—Lord LINCOLN gave notice that on the first Committee of Supply day he would bring forward the question.

Lord G. BENTINCK inquired if the Prime Minister could state the amount of duty on corn which had been remitted under the authority of the Government; if the minute of the authority for the remission of the corn duties could be produced; and if it was the intention of the Government to ask the House for a bill of indemnity?—Lord J. RUSSELL said he could not state the amount of duties that had been remitted; he would not object to produce the minute of the authority given for the remission; he did not consider the authority given as needed indemnity, and therefore he did not intend to ask for a bill of indemnity.

BUSINESS BEFORE THE HOUSE

Lord J. RUSSELL made his promised statement of the intentions of the Government relative to the principal bills before Parliament—what they proposed to press forward and what to abandon. It was determined to go on with the Public Health Bill which had passed the House, and obtained a second reading in the House of Lords. It was also their intention to endeavour to obtain the consent of the House of Lords to the Encumbered Estates Bill, with the amendments made in it by the House of Commons, because they regarded it as a measure of the greatest importance to Ireland. The bill introduced the other night relative to corrupt practices at elections would also be proceeded with, because it would be most unfit to allow the session to close without passing some measure on the subject. The Diplomatic Relations with the Court of Rome Bill, which had come down from the Lords, had been placed in the hands of Lord Palmerston; and he would move the second reading on the earliest opportunity, with the view of passing it this session. With respect to the Navigation Laws, the Government had come reluctantly to the opinion that they could not proceed with their proposed measure in the present session. He hoped that no objection would be made to the proposal to go into committee and agree to a resolution with the view of introducing a Bill that might be before the House and the country during the recess. The failure of the measure was, in the opinion of the Government, be a great disappointment to some of our most important colonies, and therefore the Government thought it their duty to declare their intention of proposing the introduction of the measure at the earliest period of the next session. The Government also came to the conclusion to "withdraw the Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill. They would likewise reserve for a future session the Irish Franchise measure. The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill the Government would endeavour to pass. The President of the Poor Law Board would also go on with the Poor Law Bills that he had introduced. There were many other Bills of great importance, which he hoped they might be able to include in his statement. The noble Lord concluded by moving that the order of the day for the second reading of the Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill be discharged.

Mr. GOULBURN desired to know, as it had been stated by Mr. Labouchere that the repeal of the Navigation Laws would confer an advantage on the West India colonies equal to a 2s protective duty, whether that was the opinion entertained giving any corresponding advantage in lieu of the withdrawn measure.

Lord G. BENTINCK expressed his satisfaction that the repeal of the Navigation Laws was put so far for this session. In reply to the allusion to disappointment that the colonies would feel at the loss of this measure, the noble Lord adduced recent proofs that in the declared opinion of the colonists the old policy of Protection was what they approved of, and that the consequence of persisting in the new course of policy would be to throw Canada into the arms of the United States of America. The noble Lord quoted the memorial from the Montreal Board of Trade to the Provincial Secretary, Secretary of the benefit consequences of the abandonment of the colonial protective policy, a document which, it appeared, from the assertion of Mr. Hawes, had not been sent home by the Governor.

After a long and desultory discussion, chiefly upon Irish measures and the Navigation Laws,

Lord J. RUSSELL said that he had abstained from referring to the state of Ireland, because a motion, put on the paper by Mr. S. CRAWFORD, would short bringing the whole question under discussion. Considering the multiplicity of business, he did not intend to make any motion this session with the view of altering the oaths to be taken by members of Parliament, though he thought them unnecessary, and, in some respects, even ridiculous. The noble Lord, in allusion to a remark that the passing of Parliament by the Government, he could not indulge in the hope that the labour of the session would be brought to a close the second week in August—he did not think it possible.

Sir D. NORREYS and Mr. B. OSBORNE severely commented upon the Government for their conduct towards Ireland, and expressed fervent desires to see the "men of straw," the "incapables," the "shelving" occupiers of the Treasury bench pushed from their seats, to make way for better men.

After a variety of observations from several other hon. members, the motion for the discharge of the Merchant Seamen's Fund Bill was agreed to.

THE DUTIES ON RUM.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the House went into Committee on the Rum Duties, and the right hon. gentleman proposed his resolution to reduce the difference from 9d. to 8d. He argued at considerable length that a differential duty of 4d. would place the same producer in the colonies on an equality with the spirit producer in this country, and that it would act beneficially to the consumer. His proposal would, in the first instance, cause a loss to the revenue of £64,000, but he looked to an increased consumption as the means of making up this loss. An increased consumption of 150,000 gallons in England would suffice for this purpose.

Mr. FAGAN opposed the resolution as a breach of faith with the Irish distillers, who had every reason to believe that the differential duty of 9d., when imposed, was understood to be intended as a final settlement of the question. The honourable member entered into a statement to show that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, in his calculations, understated the cost of producing spirits in Ireland. The honourable member moved, as an amendment, that the chairman report progress.

Mr. REYNOLDS said, he professed himself to be a free-trader, but, looking to the interests of Ireland, he would not be a free-trader in regard to spirits; and he was bound to confess that the people of Ireland had derived no benefit at all from the repeal of the Corn-laws. In fact, he thought that Ireland was entitled to consideration from England for having, by the free importation of English manufactures, consented to a measure that entailed a loss to Ireland of three millions a year

Captain JONES could not vote for the amendment, though he believed the proposed duty would be most unfair towards Ireland.

Mr. BARRY accepted the resolution as an instalment of what was due to the colonists

Lord G. BENTINCK entered into a succession of calculations to prove that the malt distillers of England would, under the proposed measure, pay 1s. 6½d. above the rum distillers, and that the malt distillers of Scotland and Ireland would pay 4d. more. The noble Lord also demonstrated that the assumed loss of £64,000, to be divided between the West Indies, the East Indies, and the Mauritius, would be no loss at all. He called on the House, in case the West Indies wanted compensation, to give it to them fairly and honestly, and not at the expense of the English, Scotch, and Irish distillers—to give them compensation at the cost of the slave-dealers and slave-owners of Cuba and Brazil.

Mr. GOULBURN did not advocate the measure proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer because it was a compensation to the West Indies, but because it was a just settlement between two classes of British producers entitled to equal consideration.

After a few words from Mr. FORBES, the Committee divided—

For reporting progress	.. ..	..
Against it	.. ..	1[illegible]
Majority against the amendment	.. ..	.. 1

Another motion for adjournment was made by Mr. MOSSELL; several Irish members accused the Government of having induced them to leave several a differential duty of 6d. would be conceded.

The Committee divided—

For reporting progress	.. ..	1[illegible]
Against it	.. ..	..
Majority for the Government	.. .. ..	..

Before the gallery was again opened another motion was made for [illegible] ment, and another division took place

For the Chairman leaving the chair	.. .. ..	1[illegible]
Against it	.. .. ..	..
Majority	.. .. ..	..

Another motion for adjournment having been made,

Lord J. RUSSELL consented to allow progress to be reported, on condition that [illegible] be allowed to go on with the committee at twelve o'clock on Tuesday.

Ultimately the Committee divided on the original resolution

For the Chancellor of the Exchequer's resolution	.. ..	116

The resolution was agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Some bills on the table were advanced a stage. Lord WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition relative to the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency, which gave rise to a brief conversation. In which the noble Lord, Lord BROUGHAM, and the Lord CHANCELLOR participated; after which the petition was laid upon the table, with a view to its being referred to a committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House assembled at twelve o'clock.

On the motion for the committee of the Highways Bill, the House, after a short discussion, divided, when the numbers were

For the motion	.. ..	88
Majority	.. ..	—54

The House then went into committee on the bill, and was occupied with the consideration of its various clauses until four o'clock, when, on the motion of Captain Pechell, the chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again. The sitting was then suspended till five o'clock. At that hour the House re-assembled, but a "count" being made on the motion of an honourable gentleman, and less than a quorum being found present, it stood adjourned to Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

HIGHWAYS BILL.—Mr. BERNAL having been interrupted by the count out on the previous evening, obtained leave of the House to report progress of the committee on the Highways Bill, and asked leave to sit again on Friday—Agreed to.

SALE OF BREAD BILL.

In reply to a question from Mr. WAKLEY,

The SPEAKER said that he had looked at the Bill in question and the precedents which bore on it, and he found that it was one which should have been introduced in committee of the whole House. (Hear, hear.) In the case of the Sale of Beer Bill in 1840, it was ruled that it should have been introduced in committee of the whole House; it was, consequently, withdrawn, and reintroduced in proper form by resolution. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. WAKLEY submitted to the hon. member for Warwickshire, whether, after what they had heard, it would be advisable to proceed with this Bill. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. SPOONER, who had charge of the Bill in the absence of Mr. G. Banks, said he had no alternative but to withdraw it.—At a later period of the sitting Mr. Bankes said he should on the 1st of August move for a Select Committee on the sale of bread, but did not intend proceeding with a Bill on the subject in the present session.

SUGAR DUTIES.

Lord G. BENTINCK withdrew the amendment of which he had given notice on the previous day, relative to the Sugar Duties; and gave notice of his intention to substitute a schedule of duties for all foreign sugars and molasses similar to that which stands in the existing law, when such sugars are not chargeable with any other duties.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER expressed his obligations to the noble Lord for calling his attention to the subject, which, however, had not escaped the notice of the proper department. He would undertake on the part of the Government to explain how he proposed to obviate the difficulties pointed out by the noble Lord.

Some debate ensued, in the course of which the Government were urged to give a decided opinion as to the course they intended to pursue, but which appeal was not responded to, and the subject dropped.

THE INCOME TAX.

Mr. HUDSON asked when the revised estimates for the year would be laid on the table

Lord J. RUSSELL had given notice to move for a Committee of Supply for Friday next; but of course he could not prevent members interposing motions to delay the Government business. But immediately the House went into Committee of Supply, he proposed to bring forward the estimates, taking the army estimates first

Mr. HUDSON.—You do not mean mere votes on account?

Lord J. RUSSELL.—No

Lord G. BENTINCK.—But when shall we have the real Budget? (A laugh.) The account of the actual expenditure and income for the year?

Lord J. RUSSELL.—If the noble Lord alludes to the reduction in the estimates, consequent on the reports of the committees on them, as soon as we know what those reductions are they shall be stated to the House. As to the army estimates, which he was going to take first, he did not think there will be any alteration in them

Mr GOULBURN wished to know when the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state the comparative income and expenditure of the year

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER could not at present say what extent of reduction in the expenditure the House might insist upon; therefore he was not in a position to submit such a comparative account

Lord G. BENTINCK.—What I want to know is when we shall have the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement of the receipts from the different sources of revenue, coupled with the balance-sheet of income and expenditure. We have as yet had no statement of the estimated produce of the year

Lord J. RUSSELL.—When the House shall have gone through and voted the various estimates—the army, navy, ordnance, and miscellaneous—and decided what the expenditure shall be, we shall be able to compare the expenditure with the revenue of the year, and my right hon. friend will then make his statement.

Mr. HUDSON.—When the Chancellor of the Exchequer brings forward his final Budget, I hope he will recapitulate and compare it with his three former Budgets. (A laugh)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I will do everything I can to please the hon. gentleman. (Laughter.)

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITABLE TRUSTS BILL.—Mr. ANSTEY moved that the order for the second reading of this Bill be read, in order to its being discharged, stating that he was only desirous of preventing the measure by the lateness of the session, and that he would reintroduce it next year.—Lord J. RUSSELL was understood to say that a general bill on the subject of charitable trusts would be brought forward by Government next year.—The motion was agreed to, and the order was read and discharged

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.—The order for the Committee on this Bill having been read, Mr. GRATTAN, Sir R. Inglis, Mr. Spooner, Sir G. Grey, and several other supporters, as well as opponents of the measure, urged upon Mr. Anstey to withdraw it, as it was impossible it could pass this session, and to go [illegible] motion would be only to occupy the time of the members. Mr. MR. ANSTEY, however, persisted in going on with the Bill, and charged the Government, especially the noble Lord at the head of it, with having been the cause of the [illegible] motion for a division. The numbers being 68 to 69, when, on the motion of Mr. FREWEN, its coming into operation was fixed for the 1st of January, 1849, instead of from the passing of the act

The Sale of Beer Bill, after a short discussion, was read a second time.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

IRELAND.

Lord STANLEY inquired whether the alarming accounts received from Ireland were founded in truth, and whether the districts named had been proclaimed? Also, what were the measures the Government proposed to adopt to meet the present grave state of affairs? He would expect a full statement on the subject in the next day (Friday).

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that seven districts had been proclaimed to the full extent authorised by the Act, and that, if it were necessary, Government would apply to Parliament for additional powers. He deprecated discussion on the matter as embarrassing to the Government. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY

[illegible] Consolidated Fund (£3,000,000) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The ENCUMBERED ESTATES BILL (IRELAND).—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved the consideration of the Report on this Bill.—Mr. NAPIER opposed the motion, and moved its recommittal for the purpose of striking out certain clauses which the Solicitor-General had introduced into it since it came down from the House of Lords. After some discussion the House divided. For rejecting the report, 107; for the recommittal, 52: majority, 14s. The report was accordingly received, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

DISTRICT AT ELECTIONS BILL. On the order of the day for the second reading of this Bill, Colonel SIBTHORPE moved as an amendment that it be read this day six months. On a division, the second reading was carried by a majority of 216 to 9.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL. This Bill was read a second time and ordered to be committed.

PLACES OF WORSHIP SITES (SCOTLAND) BILL was lost, on a division upon the third reading, by a majority of 98 to 39.—Adjourned.

MDLLE. JENNY LIND AS "SUSANNA," IN "LE NOZZE DI FIGARO," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE ARCHDUKE JOHN OF AUSTRIA.

FATHERLAND—an United Federal Empire, presided over by a President, who with his Imperial Ministry should guide the energies of confederated Germany, and direct toward the accomplishment of an united Imperial policy the scattered elements of power which its several States present—has long been the darling, cherished scheme of a numerous section of politicians in the various nations which are comprised under the "geographical expression" Germany. That project has at length been put into execution through the instrumentality of the Representative Assembly, which was convened at Frankfort some few months back, from the respective States; and the person chosen to discharge the arduous duties of President or Vicar of the Empire, in other words to take the position which the Emperor of Germany in former days occupied, is the subject of the present notice, the Archduke John of Austria.

How far the future may justify their choice, it would be idle to speculate; but it may be observed that there are many things in favour of the Archduke. His liberal politics have made him a very general favourite among the men o progress throughout Germany. From the attitude of opposition which he assumed towards the policy of Metternich, he was compelled, during that Minister's long career, to abstain from all interference in affairs of state, and he has therefore no political antecedents in his past life to thwart his taking whatever course his own judgment and that of his Ministers may indicate in any difficulty; and he is, moreover, a man of much decision of character.

His Serene Highness John Baptist Joseph Fabian Sebastian, Archduke of Austria, fourth son of the Emperor Leopold II., and consequently uncle to the present Emperor Ferdinand, was born on the 20th of January, 1782, and is therefore in his 66th year. He entered the army at a very early age, and though at present he holds the rank of Field-Marshal and Director-General of Engineers, his military career was not a very successful one. The stormy period at which he first obtained a command, viz. the commencement of the present century, was one in which all that had at other times proved great and powerful was annihilated beneath the military hurricane which, springing out of revolutionary France, swept over the face of Europe. At Hohenlinden -that "bloody fray" which our own poet Campbell has immortalised in his beautiful verses—his forces were completely routed; and all that he could accomplish in that campaign was by his personal courage and example to keep the spirit of the Austrians from being quite crushed by the defeats they sustained from the armies of France, led by the ablest of her generals. After the peace of Luneville, he was appointed Director of the Corps of Engineers and of the Military Academy of Vienna. Notwithstanding his youth, he was the object of many bright expectations in that gloomy period. he became excessively popular, especially in the Austrian provinces. He originated the measure of arming a Landwehr, or militia, and served through the campaign of 1805. In 1811 he founded the Johanneum in Grätz. He was always strongly attached to the study of natural history, and when released from military duties, he lived the life of a mountaineer, preferring the Styrian hills as a residence to the capital.

He knew the whole of this district thoroughly, and was on the best terms with its inhabitants, to whom he was known as a bold and successful explorer of the most inaccessible points. He served again in the campaigns of 1813 and 1815. With the peace began the long Ministry of Metternich, and the retirement from public life of the Archduke, who almost separated himself from his family by marrying the daughter of the Postmaster of Aussee; he withdrew from Vienna, and became all but socially proscribed; indeed, the gulf between him, the Court, and the old nobility was never closed. He lived in his retirement at Gratz, farming, botanizing, and hunting; but never for a day released from the espionage that Metternich kept upon his movements. His popularity was always feared, as much as his opinions. After a long absence he revisited the Tyrol in 1833, and was received with such enthusiasm that the Vienna journals were not permitted to publish the accounts of his reception. In 1842, at a public dinner, he is said to have given as a toast, "No Austria, no Prussia, but a united Germany." This incident has secured him much of his present popularity.

It is certain that it is entirely owing to him that the revolution of March was so bloodless. The deputation demanding the dismissal of Prince Metternich was returning from the Ministry without success, when the Archduke met them. Upon informing himself of their petition, he took it from them and entered the Council-room, leaving the door open, so that the deputation, standing in the ante-room, could see everything. Advancing to the table, he said, "Gentlemen, the people demand the resignation of Prince Metternich." The Prince refused acquiescence. Upon this the Archduke turned round, went to the door, and said, "Prince Metternich will resign." Metternich then got up, seeing a Prince of the House heading the movement against him, and signed his resignation.

In person the Archduke is of the middle height, thin, and bald; his countenance expresses great benevolence and good-humour. Though of so advanced an age, he has preserved much of the enthusiasm of youth.

THE ARCHDUKE JOHN, REGENT OF GERMANY.

FINE ARTS.

HIGHGATE FIELDS DURING THE GREAT FIRE OF LONDON, IN 1666. Painted by E. M. WARD, A.R.A.

"The poor inhabitants were dispersed about St. George's-fields and Moorfields, as far as Highgate, and several miles in circle. Some under tents, some under miserable huts and hovels, many without a rag or any necessary utensils, bed or board, who, from delicateness, riches, and easy accommodations, in stately and well-furnished houses, were now reduced to extreme misery and poverty.

I then went towards Islington and Highgate, where one might have seen 200,000 people, of all ranks and degrees, dispersed and lying along by what they could save from the fire, deploring their loss, and though ready to perish from hunger and destitution, yet not asking one penny of relief, which to me appeared a stranger sight than any I had yet beheld."

The touching episodes in this passage from the "Diary of John Evelyn" are given by Mr. Ward, in the accompanying picture, with excellent effect, notwithstanding the multitude of incidents with which he has filled his canvass. The figure nearly in the centre of the composition is the philanthropic Evelyn, who has left us the best record of the Great Fire. At this period he was in his 66th year; his costume is a specimen of the dress of a gentleman of fortune in the reign of Charles II. The group to the left of the Diarist, in the foreground, is a company of itinerant players and minstrels, who, in their artificial life, present a strange contrast to the stern realities—the burning cathedral (Old St. Paul's) and the City—in the distance. Yet, such contrasts of luxury and license with terrible suffering were as common at that period as when "Nero fiddled while Rome was burning." The family to the right have taken refuge beneath a hastily-made tent, with such valuables as they have saved from the fire, and their glitter has tempted the group to the extreme right, who are about to steal the coffer and the rich plate: their connivance with the girl who is filling her pitcher at the spring is a nice bit of artistical by-play; beside her lies a wretched woman who has abandoned herself to despair. Yet, if the family are about to lose their precious vessels, they have reason to rejoice on another account; for their black servant is rushing in, bearing in his arms the youngling or the flock, whom he has just rescued from the chaos. The group upon the hill consists of a religious enthusiast, who is seeking to impress his hearers with the awfulness of the visitation. One of his hearers appears to be in the last extremities of despair. The family group at the foot of the hill bear their misfortune with comparative placidity.

This is, altogether, one of the most interesting pictures in the Exhibition. It illustrates, certainly, one of the most popular events in our history; and by combining the minuteness of both diarist and artist Evelyn and Ward will have a work of historic fidelity and artistic execution. The picture is, indeed, purely national in character, and would be a valuable acquisition to any public gallery; and its high character entitles the artist to so distinguished a position.

MICHAEL ANGELO ATTENDING ON HIS SICK SERVANT, URBINO. Painted by L. HAGHE.

In our notice of the Exhibition of the New Water-Colour Society, we characterised this as a fine picture. The scene is very touching: the head of Michael Angelo is especially thoughtful and noble, and the gratitude of the servant capitally expressed. The incident is altogether highly characteristic of the benevolent nature of "the greatest painter that ever existed," and whose last words were, "In your passage through this life remember the sufferings o Jesus Christ."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

There has been no novelty in the operas since our last publication. The management has found the attractions of Mdlle. Lind sufficient to ensure good houses. On Saturday, Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" was repeated by special desire of her Majesty and Prince Albert, who honoured the performance with their presence; and on Tuesday, at the same Royal wishes, Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento" was given, the Queen and the Prince Consort again being present to witness Mdlle. Lind's Maria.

For the extra night, on Thursday, Bellini's "Sonnambula" was represented, with Mdlle. Lind's charming Amina, a character which will be always ranked as the best part in her répertoire.

Rossini's "Gazza Ladra," and Mozart's "Don Giovanni," are still spoken of in the coulisses as the works in which Mdlle. Lind will shortly appear.

Our Illustration is one of the most striking scenes in the "Nozze di Figaro," and, besides Mdlle. Lind's charming enactment of Susanna, shows Mdlle. Schwartz as Cherubino, and Mdlle. Cruvelli as the Countess—a highly successful performance.

TOMB OF CHATEAUBRIAND.

In the Memoir of this celebrated savant, in our Journal of last week, he is stated to have been a native of Brittany, whereas he first drew breath at the port of St. Malo, on the coast of Normandy; and, some years since, he chose for his last resting-place the islet of Grand Bay, situated to the south-west of the town. The interesting circumstances of this choice are thus related by the Malouins, and have been obligingly communicated by a Correspondent, M. N.

"The father and mother of the late Vicomte were on board a vessel bound for St. Malo. It was night when they neared the coast, and a terrific storm was raging. No boat could venture to the assistance of the crew, and the vessel was wrecked upon a rock not far from the shore. It is not stated if any of the crew were lost. The mother of M. de Chateaubriand passed the night upon that rock, and there he was born. When he had reached manhood, he desired that, as his life had commenced surrounded by the ocean, so he might sleep in death, guarded by its restless waves. He accordingly purchased the rock, and built upon it that tomb to which, as we have stated, his remains will be removed. Thus, born amid the tempest of the elements, and dying during the lull of a more fearful and scarcely ended storm of human passions, he will rest in his lonely tomb, mourned over by the waters."

THE THEATRES.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday, Rossini's "Donna del Lago" was performed. On Tuesday, "Norma" was announced, with the last scene from "La Cenerentola;" but owing to the illness of Grisi, the last-mentioned opera was given in an entire form, Alboni in the finale, "Non piu mesta," receiving a double encore, as well as rapturous ovations before the curtain.

Thursday will be a memorable night in operatic annals, for the production of Meyerbeer's masterpiece "Les Huguenots." It was the first time that an Italian version of the lyric drama has been presented on any stage. Popular as this work has been in France, Belgium, Germany, &c., it has hitherto not found its way to Italy, owing to the objections entertained against the libretto in the countries under bigoted rule.

The "Huguenots" was originally produced at the Académie Royal de Musique, in Paris, on the 29th February, 1836. The German company, in 1842, performed it at Covent-Garden Theatre; and in 1845 and 1846, the Brussels Company, at the same locality, and at Drury Lane Theatre, performed the opera very creditably. But it has been reserved for the Royal Italian Opera to mount this magnificent production with a most gorgeous mise en scène, and with a most perfect ensemble, in the cast of the principal characters, and in the orchestral and choral adjuncts. To add additional éclat to this remarkable representation, it was commanded by her Majesty, who honoured the theatre with a state visit, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager and the Duc cess of Kent occupying boxes on the occasion. The Queen is known to be an ardent admirer of Meyerbeer's compositions, and sings the duo "Oh courezvous," in the fourth act of "Les Huguenots," with a skill and dramatic feeling which may be pronounced to be truly artistic. It was Meyerbeer who directed the musical arrangements for the King of Prussia, when her Majesty honoured his dominions with a visit in 1845.

The Italian translation has been admirably done by Signor Maggioni, the author of the libretto of Balfe's opera of "Falstaff." The drama has been reduced to four acts, instead of five, by placing the first and second acts in the original opera in one. Divers curtailments have also been made, on the authority of Meyerbeer's own score, arranged for Berlin. The music of the page, Urbain, which is written for a soprano, was transposed for a contralto by the composer; and he has added for Mdlle Alboni a cavatina, expressly composed for the Royal Italian Opera. No work yet presented at Govent-Garden has called to action all the resources of the establishment in a more striking degree than the "Huguenots." Grieve and Telbin have contributed exquisite scenery: the costumes, by Mrs. Bailey and Mdme. Marzio, are historically accurate, as well as picturesque. The incidental dances, under the direction of Coppi, ought we to omit a favourable mention of the exertions of Signor Boncompagni, the chorus-master, and of Mr. A. Harris, who has arranged the spectacle. But the presiding genius of all the astonishing materials in the unwieldy one "Huguenots" has been Costa. When it is recollected that Meyerbeer took eleven months to get up his opera at the Académie Royale, and that Costa has accomplished his herculean task in little more than a month, some notion may be formed of his extraordinary labours.

The opera is thus cast:—Marguerite di Valois (betrothed to Henri Quatre), Mdme. Castellan; Favet Lady of Honour, Mdme. Bishop; Di Cosse, Mdme. Brambilla (Governor of the Louvre), Signor Tamburini; Valentine (his daughter), Mdme. Pauline Viardot; Il Conte di Nevers, Signor Tagliafico; De Cossé, Signor Mei; Tavannes, Signor Lavia; De Retz, Signor Polonini; Meru, Signor Rocho; Maurucci, Signor Soldi; First Monk, Signor Corradi-Setti; Head of the Night Watch, Signor Talamo; Raoul di Nangis (a Protestant gentleman), Signor Mario; Marcello (his servant), Signor Marini; Urbain (Page of Honour to Marguerite), Mdlle. Alboni.

We must reserve our musical analysis until the forthcoming week. In the first act, the first sensation was created by Mario, in his opening air, "Ah! più bianca," with Hill's exquisite alto accompaniment. Marini looked quite a picture in the dress of Marcel, and was immensely applauded in his Lutheran song, His "Pif paf" warlike air, with the curious obligato of pistols and sphecidæ, narrowly escaped an encore; it was given with due energy. Alboni, in the Page, came in for the next demonstration of gratification; by her delicious singing of the cavatina, "Nel cor mi sento," the finale to the first act went off with great spirit. In the second scene Alboni carried away the honours in the new cavatina expressly composed for her by Meyerbeer, "No, no, cessa di dir." It was rapturously encored, her Majesty giving the command for the repetition. The oath of reconciliation and the outbreak of rage in the finale, were wonderfully done.

The second act passed off with unbounded spirit. The "Rataplan" chorus was much applauded, as also the duo between Viardot and Marini. The septuor of the duel brought out the voice of Mario magnificently, and the effect of the double band and triple chorus in the finale was immense. The third act was stupendous. No language can depict the sensation produced by the colossal concerted piece, "The benediction of the daggers," preparatory to the massacre of the "Huguenots." The last movement of this enormous composition was encored, and the house rang with cheering at the close. The duo succeeding his chorus, between Viardot and Mario, electrified the auditory. For intensity of dramatic power and feeling it has been rarely excelled, and, at the close, both artistes were called before the curtain amidst continued cheering from every part of the house.

The fourth act, with a splendid ball scene and the celebrated trio between Viardot, Mario, and Marini, terminated this truly great work.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at the theatre, with their suite, in twelve carriages, precisely at eight o'clock. They were received by Messrs. Delafield and Webster, in full Court dresses, and conducted to the Royal box, which was in the centre of the house. Nothing could be more elegant than its aspect: but, as we propose to publish an Illustration thereof in a coming Number, we must defer an account of the decorations, fitted up with so much taste by Mr. F. Gye. On the entrance of her Majesty, the National Anthem was sung, the solo verses by Castellan, Alboni, and Viardot; every political allusion being tremendously cheered. The enthusiastic loyalty of the house in fact knew no bounds, and a more magnificent coup d'œil was never witnessed. The Queen looked remarkably well, and was dressed in mourning, and wore a tiara of diamonds. Prince Albert had a Field-Marshal's uniform. The house was crowded in every part. The Royal visitors remained until the end of the opera, when the National Anthem was played by the band. Viardot, Mario, and Marini were called for three times in succession, and a similar compliment might have been justly paid to Costa.

HAYMARKET.

The Adelphi company have commenced their representations at the above house. It is the intention of the management to produce all the dramas, farces, and burlesques that have been most successful at the other establishment in succession, and perform each about half-a-dozen times. By this arrangement the entire company will appear in turns. The short season commenced with "The Green Bushes," the burlesque of "Norma," and "Did you ever send your Wife to Camberwell."

LYCEUM

A burlesque of "Blue Beard," which was once so popular at the Olympic during the Vestris management, was revived here on Monday, with excellent effect. Mr. Frank Matthews plays Abomelique, vice Mr. James Bland, and Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam is Fatmeite, the character originally sustained by Madame Vestris. Mr. H. Hall is O'Shock-a-back; and Mr. Selby the lover Selimar.

In Miss Fitzwilliam the chief praise is to be awarded. She is an accomplished burlesque actress, giving the lines with full effect; and her beautiful fresh voice told to great advantage in some parodies on the "Furlani" polacca, "Robert, toi que j'aime, and an unaccompanied morceau in the last scene. Mr. F Matthews was a fine tyrannical bashaw, and sang his own march with most diverting importance

On Wednesday evening "The Beggar's Opera" was performed, by the special desire of Prince Albert, who honoured the theatre with his presence. The other pieces were "Poor Pillicoddy" and "Blue Beard." The house was very full

A clause in the lease of the HAYMARKET prevents Mr. Webster from lowering his prices. The half-price is therefore taken at the early hour of eight o'clock.

At the conclusion of the LYCEUM season, Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam are engaged for a certain number of nights at the STRAND.

The PRINCESS' closes this week. The season has been anything but successful, and latterly the house has only been opened on the evenings of Madame Anna Thillon's performances for the "Fille du Régiment."

Miss Laura Addison is, it is said, engaged at the HAYMARKET next season. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean will also be permanent members of the company; and we believe Mr. Farren and Mrs. Glover think of retiring.

MUSIC.

M. THALBERG.—The morning concert of M. Thalberg, on Monday, at the room in Her Majesty's Theatre, attracted a numerous and fashionable audience. The only lady vocalist was Mdlle. Lind, who gave the "Prayer" from Weber's "Der Freyschütz"—not the grand scene, as was announced—with much feeling. In the same language she sang with Lablache, her soi-disant and vocal exercises were neatly executed, and, with Lablache's drollery, ensured an encore. The greatest treat in Mdlle. Lind's vocalisat on was her rendering of two Swedish melodies, to one of which the demand for a repetition was rapturous. These airs are curious, and exact imitative faculties which Mdlle Lind invested with peculiar charm. The other singers were Gardoni, Colletti, Hatton, and Lablache. Thalberg played his new fantasia on "Lucrezia Borgia" comprising as they did his "Pasquale" and "Lucrezia Borgia" fantasias, "Home sweet home" and "Barcarol."

MADAME CHARLE HENSELE.—This vocalist gave a matinée on Sat day, at Cutler's Rooms, Marlborough-street. She sang airs by M , , , &c., skilfully, with a soprano voice of moderate power and compass. She was assisted by Madame Tagliafico, Mdlle. de Meric, the Misses Hughes, Signor Ciabatta, M. Goria the pianist, Herr Ehrman the violinist, &c. Pilotti and Kuhe were the accompanists.

MUSICAL SOIREE.—On Wednesday, Master Alexander Ranch , the boy violin st, gave a matinee musicale at Dr. Conveau's rooms, in Foley-place, conducted by Alary, and assisted by Madame Tagliafico, Madame de Lavanz, Vera, Miss Messent, Miss Clara Loveday, the Chebrus, Signor Ciabatta, Tagliafico, &c.—The second harp recital of Gerhard Taylor was given at Lafcadio's Rooms, Newman-street. He was more applauded in his admirable performances. On Monday Mrs. Hampton, the sister of Osborne, the pianist, will give a soirée musicale at the mansion of C. R. Mansell Talbot, Esq., M.P., Belgrave-square, assisted by Viardot, Alboni, Castellan, Corbari, Regnr, Salvi, Marini, Tamburini, Rovere, &c.—On Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, Italian Operas at Her Majesty's and Covent-Garden Theatres.

IRELAND.

THE CLUBS.

The clubs are undergoing a more perfect organisation. They are being divided into sections and sub-sections, so as to answer to the roll-call, and come more readily under the eye of the commander. All their movements, however, are well known; their minutest acts are reported to the police. Reports are furnished by members of their own body, and, knowing this, they proceed with necessary caution. It is calculated that the entire force of the clubs does not include 50,000

The county of Wicklow grand jury has unanimously signed a memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, praying his Excellency to put down the clubs, and, failing the means at his disposal, to apply to the legislature for additional powers, as they considered their existence to be most dangerous to the peace and prosperity of the county.

Mr. Doheny was admitted to bail on Saturday evening, the charge against him having been only for sedition. After regaining his liberty he started for Cashel, where the King Cormac Club received him with open ranks; and thence he was, on Sunday to the broad ridge of Slievenamon in an open barouche, drawn by four horses, and attired in the half-forgotten uniform of the '98 Club. The procession from Cashel is said to have reckoned 8000. On reaching the summit the host was met by a large assemblage, composed of Cork, Waterford, Wexford, and Dungarvan clubmen, on all these counties. Here the chair was not filled, as stated in the programme, by Mr. Doheny, but he spoke at some length, "advised the people to form clubs, cautioned them to be firm and four not, and the day was their own." There was no disorder beyond that which accompanies the gathering of some 30,000 persons—the report sets down 50,000.

Mr. Meagher proceeded from Waterford to the place of meeting in a car drawn by six horses, and followed by the clubs of Waterford in military array. On the return of the procession in the evening, some of the authorities were disposed to prevent them entering the city in marching order; and it was proposed to support a command that they should break ranks and enter in civil mode by the military and cannon if necessary. The magistracy of Waterford refused, however, to support the latter measure. The toll-bar was put down before the procession reached the bridge at the Kilkenny side the Suir, and it was enjoined that the procession should break up before being allowed to pass. The answer was that they would pay the whole toll-bar, and the party entered in triumph.

On Sunday last there was to have been an assembly of the Clubs in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and the members accordingly mustered in full force in their various club-rooms; but at two o'clock p.m. the assembly was postponed the reason did not transpire. A large body of police was in attendance at each of the places of meeting, and a full muster was taken of the day, ascertaining, when possible, the names of the members, their apparent rank in life, age, average heights, and such other minutiæ as might tend to enlighten Government with respect to the class of persons composing these dangerous bodies.

PROSECUTIONS AGAINST THE NEWSVENDERS

At the various police-offices, on Monday, informations were preferred by the police against newsvenders for selling copies of the Nation and Felon newspapers.

HEAD-OFFICE.—Sergeant Bowen, A 21, brought a boy, named Patrick Cullen, before Messrs. Fortue and Magee, for "vending a seditious publication called the Nation." It appeared that he was crying various papers, among others, the Nation, when the constable went up and asked for a Nation. The prisoner denied he had one, but, on searching him, the constable found a copy. The paper was handed to the magistrates, when Mr. Porter read the leading article, bearing the initials C. G. D." After a long discussion, in which Mr. Ennis, solicitor, appeared for the prisoner, Mr. Porter declared that the paper was a seditious publication, and that the magistrates would send the case for adjudication before a jury. Ultimately it was arranged to bind the prisoner to appear next day, when informations were received.

HENRY-STREET OFFICE.—Police-Constable C 48 charged Ellen Roche with selling copies of the Nation and Felon newspapers, on Saturday last, same being seditious and felonious publications. Mr. Kelly, the presiding magistrate, called for the papers referred to. The constable stated that he did not deprive the prisoner of them. Mr. Kelly, therefore, dismissed the case.

COLLEGE-STREET OFFICE.—Joseph Mooney was charged by B 4 with an offence similar to the above, before Mr. Tyndal. The papers were produced and identified by the constable. Mr. Tyndal said, "I will send this case for trial to the next sessions." The prisoner, having entered into two securities of £10 each, to appear at the next sessions, was discharged.

GOVERNMENT PROSECUTIONS.—The Limerick Grand Jury have found true bills against Mr. T. F. Meagher. He has traversed to next session, and his trial for "sedition" accordingly stands postponed until the month of March, 1849. The prosecution against the law officers of the Crown in the case of Mr. Darcy M'Gee, of the Nation, and Mr. Duffy, of the Felon, for similar offences, have, by some mismanagement, been rendered altogether nugatory. The offence with which Messrs M'Gee and Hollywood stood charged was committed on Sunday, July 2. The informations, however, were not lodged until Wednesday, the 12th instant, on the evening of which day, at six o'clock, their arrest was accomplished. Having been brought before the magistrates of College-street police-office, they were held to bail for a recognizance ordered to attend forthwith at Wicklow, in which county the offence was committed, and where the necessary bodies were duly to be holden. Thither the traversers repaired, on the 13th; but on arrival there it was discovered that the grand jury had been released from their duties at eleven o'clock the day previous, and just seven hours before M'Gee and Hollywood had been taken into custody.

THE 12TH OF JULY.—The anniversary of the battle of the Boyne passed over without any disturbance. The only place in the North where a collision between the Orangemen and Repealers was expected is Castlewellan, county Down. There is an eminence outside the town on which the Orangemen say that a man would hoist the flag of Antrim. The Repealers declared they should not, and, true to their determination, they entrenched themselves on the summit on the morning of the 12th, all armed, and counting some 5000 men. No attempt was made to dislodge them. A military force was at hand to prevent collision.

THE REPEAL PRESS.—On Saturday, the Nation and Felon appeared as usual, the Tribune standing over, in consequence of incomplete arrangements. The Nation leads with an article on the Clubs, by Mr. Duffy, dated "Newgate;" and the very strong sentiments of Mr. Duffy are backed up in another leader by Mr. M'Gee. Should the Government attempt to put down the Clubs by any existing or future legislation, Mr. Duffy recommends a Provisional Council of all the chief officers, and to resist, if necessary, with arms. Messrs. Martin and Reilly address the Earl of Clarendon in the Felon; Mr. Reilly concluding, as usual, with an "immortal hatred." A notice has been served by the police at the residences of all the newsvenders in Dublin, cautioning them against the sale of any felonious or seditious papers. Such offenders will render themselves liable to prosecution

ARRESTS.—On Tuesday, at Cork, Messrs. Isaac S. Varian, J. W. Bourke, and John O'Brien were arrested at half-past two o'clock, upon a charge of sedition uttered at Cross Barry on the 2nd of July. They have been admitted to bail.

MARTIAL LAW.—On Tuesday last the following districts were proclaimed under the late Act by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council of Ireland:—The city of Dublin; the county of Dublin; the county and town of Drogheda; the city of Cork; the city of Waterford; the county of Waterford, Tipperary, Kilkenny, and Carlingford, in the county of Cork; the baronies of Kilculliihn, Middlethird, and Gaultier, in the county of Waterford.

ARREST AND RESCUE.—The Rev. Mr. Byrne, Roman Catholic priest, was, on Monday, arrested, on a charge of sedition, and placed in the Bridewell of Carrick-on-Suir. On the affair becoming known, people assembled in large numbers, made an attack on the police, and succeeded in rescuing Mr. Byrne; they also set free all the prisoners. The military, being without orders, did not act.

THE departure of the Lord Lieutenant for England had been delayed for a few days.

SLIGO BOROUGH ELECTION.—The following was the state of the poll at the final close:—Somers (Repealer), 102; Hartley, 99; Ball, 87. A meeting of Mr. Hartley's supporters took place on Saturday morning, when it was decided that a petition should be immediately lodged against Mr. Somers, grounded upon his non-qualification; and, secondly, his having a sufficient number of what are termed "locks" upon the voters' list to place Mr. Hartley in security. At six o'clock the Mayor declared Mr Somers duly elected to serve as member for the borough in Parliament.

MEETING OF THE IRISH LEAGUE.—A crowded meeting of the Irish League took place in the Music Hall on Wednesday evening. A deputation from the Corporation of Kilkenny was in attendance. The Mayor of Kilkenny was called to the chair. On Mr. W. S. O'Brien making his appearance he was received with [illegible] 702 new members were admitted. Dr. Cane, of Kilkenny, proposed the following resolutions, which were unanimously carried:—"That the Acts of the English Parliament since the Legislative Union between this country and England, but more especially during its latest sessions, are [illegible] at proofs of the utter hopelessness of looking to it either for justice or good government, and that there is no prospect of happiness or prosperity for this country until it is free from the painful influence of foreign, hostile, and oppressive legislation. Resolved, "That acting on this conviction, the Irish League has been formed with the sole view and object of restoring to this country their ancient constitution of Queen, Lords, and Commons, by the combination of Irishmen in a course of action at once constitutional and decided." The Rev. Mr O'Kelly, Mr Smith O'Brien, and other gentlemen addressed the meeting, recommending the retention of their arms by the people, notwithstanding the Government proclamation

A Cabinet Council was held at two o'clock, on Tuesday afternoon, at the Foreign Office. The ministers present were Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Minto, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Marquis of Clanricarde, Mr Hard of Auckland, Sir John Hobhouse, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Lord Campbell, the Marquis of Chandos, and Viscount Morpeth. The Council sat two hours and a half.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—FLOWER SHOW. On Tuesday, the fourth of the ornamental flower show of the Royal South London Horticultural Society was held in these pleasant gardens. The show was decidedly one of the best of the season, both for quantity and quality of the specimens exhibited, no fewer than four large tents being crowded with the most beautiful varietas of almost every species of flower, both foreign and domesticated, in bloom at this period of the year.

The one is too full of pieces to very easy and very commonplace; and that in six, an old Problem shorn of its original beauty, and rendered unpracticable by your alterations. ROYAL AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S MEETING, AT YORK.

IN our Journal of last week we reported the proceedings of this great Meeting up to the Council Dinner on Wednesday evening. At the close of the discussion which followed the address of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in acknowledgment for his health being drunk, Mr. Hudson, the Secretary to the Society, read the List of Prizes awarded by the Judges, which will be found in an adjoining page.

THURSDAY.

This day the Cattle Show was visited by 20,733 persons. In the early part of the day the tickets were exhausted: about 1200 were admitted by paying money at the door. On Tuesday, 1113 persons were admitted; on Wednesday, 6066; and on Thursday, 25,783; making in all 32,912 for the period spoken of. By far the greater proportion came in with the half-crown tickets, whereas, formerly, from one-third to two-thirds only have been admitted, and the remainder at one shilling each.

THE PAVILION DINNER

Took place on Thursday afternoon, at four o'clock, in the Great Pavilion. The number of the company could not have been less than 1200, and comprised, with the exception of the agricultural labourers, all classes connected by occupation or otherwise with the landed interest of the country. The appearance of so large an assemblage, when rising to do honour to the toasts proposed on the distinguished guests present, was particularly striking and fine. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, who was received with enthusiastic and vociferous applause, sat on the right hand of the President (the Earl of Yarborough), on a raised platform, which ran along one side of the Pavilion, on which the following noblemen and gentlemen were also seated: Earl Fortescue, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Zetland, Earl Powis, Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Beaumont, the Chevalier Bunsen, M. Van de Weyer, Mr. Bancroft, the Lord Mayor of York, Lord George Bentinck, Lord Feversham, Professor Johnston, Viscount Morpeth, Mr. M. Milnes, M.P., Mr. C. Hilyard, Mr. Hudson, M.P., Mr. Pusey, M.P., Mr. George Stephenson, civil engineer, and other distinguished personages. In other parts of the pavilion were seated the Marquis of Downshire, Sir T. D. Acland, Mr. Childers, M.P., the Duke of Richmond, Sir Francis Lawley, Sir C. Lemon, Sir Robert Price, Lord Portman, Lord Southampton, the Earl of Egmont. The table opposite the President's, on the other side of the Pavilion, was occupied by the Earl of Chichester, President elect, and the other Vice-Presidents of the Society.

The Pavilion, as shewn in our Illustration last week, was erected between the Castle and the Ouse, in St. George's Fields, a spacious piece of land belonging to the Corporation of York, and situated between the high road to Selby and the very beautiful and fashionable promenade called the New Walk, "made," says Drake, under the date of 1730, "a year or two ago, at the expense of the city." The Pavilion, like the buildings at the showyard, was erected by Mr. Manning, of London. It was 140 feet long, by 84 feet deep, and was capable of accommodating 1400 persons comfortably, though the contract for the dinner was for only 1200.

The dinner being dispatched, the noble Chairman proposed the health of the Queen, which was drunk with great enthusiasm.

In introducing the next toast the noble Chairman referred to the presence of his Royal Highness Prince Albert at the meeting, and the evident pains he had taken in the inspection of its several departments. His Lordship concluded his address by observing: "And I need not remind you that one of the great objects of this Society has been to lead the country to know that it is not merely for the benefit of the farmer that it holds these meetings, but that it wishes sincerely that the condition of the labourers may be bettered. (Cheers.) I cannot remind you of that without asking you if you do not believe with me that the country was perfectly electrified with the speech which was made lately by his Royal Highness, when he was advocating the claims of the labourer? (Loud cheering.) Under all these circumstances, then, I have the satisfaction of proposing to you the health of "The Queen Dowager, Prince Albert, Albert Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and the rest of the Royal Family." (Loud and long-continued cheering.)

His Royal Highness Prince Albert rose to acknowledge the toast, and was received with loud and reiterated cheers. He said: "Gentlemen, I have been most deeply touched to witness the expressions of your loyalty to the Queen (renewed cheering), and to the members of the Royal Family generally. (More cheering.) I beg to return you my best thanks for having received the toast of my health with so much cordiality. (Cheers.) It has been a great satisfaction to me to have been enabled this year to pay you an old debt—(cheers)—an thus coming amongst you, and attending at this most useful and interesting meeting. (Loud and reiterated cheers.) All I have seen to-day and yesterday exhibits a bright picture of the progress of British agriculture; and for much of that progress the country is, I firmly believe, indebted to this Society. (Cheers.) Agriculture, which was once the main pursuit of this like every other nation, holds even now, notwithstanding the development of commerce and of manufactures, a fundamental position in this realm. (Cheers.) And although time has changed the position which was once held by the landed proprietor with his lands dependents, yet the country gentleman with his wife, and the country clergyman, the farmer, and the labourer form still one great, and I hope united family one united family, in which we gladly recognise the foundation of our social state. (Cheers.) Science and mechanics improvements have changed the mere practice of cultivating the soil, in these days, into an industrial pursuit, requiring capital, machinery, skill, and perseverance in the struggle of competition. (Cheers.) We must consider this a great progress, as it demands higher energies and higher intelligence. (Cheers.) Conscious of these changes, we agriculturists of England (tremendous cheering) collect in these meetings—these meetings of the Royal Agricultural Society of England in order to communicate to each other the result of our various experience, and the progress that some may have made in the application of science, in the improvement and ingenuity of machinery, or in the breeding and rearing of cattle. (Cheers.) Feeling, as I do, a high and lively interest in these noble pursuits (cheers), and having myself in a small way (renewed cheering and laughter) experienced all the pleasures and little hangs (cheers), and knowing its paramount importance to the country (cheers), I feel highly gratified that the President of the Society should have entrusted to me to propose to you the toast of the day, which is, 'Success to the Royal Agricultural Society of England.' I trust you will respond to it with enthusiastic cheers. Gentlemen, "The Royal Agricultural Society of England, and success to it,"

The toast was responded to with loud cheers.

The Earl Fitzwilliam then proposed the "Health of the Foreign Ministers present," which was eloquently replied to by M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Minister, and the Chevalier Bunsen. Among the toasts which followed were, "Agriculture, Manufactures, and Commerce;" "The Lord Mayor and Corporation of the City of York;" "The Yorkshire Agricultural Society;" "The Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland;" and "The Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland." The health of the President was then proposed by Mr. Pusey, M.P., and drunk with all honours. The American Minister proposed the health of the President elect of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, prefaced by an address characterised by liberal principles and striking command of language. The Earl of Chichester returned thanks, and concluded by proposing "The Railway Companies, and thanks to them for the facilities which they have afforded to the Society," his Lordship adding a merited tribute to Mr. Hudson, whose reply was received with loud and protracted applause.

We must not omit to record the enthusiastic reception given to the toast of "The Labouring Classes of this country," proposed in a luminous speech by Lord Wharncliffe, in which his Lordship dwelt with much force upon the interest of the wealthy in the welfare of the working population, and the duty as it is the interest of every man connected with agriculture, or connected with the land of this country, to advance the moral, social, and intellectual position of the labouring classes.

The Chairman then rose and said:—"I wish to express to his Royal Highness Prince Albert the great joy that he has diffused amongst the members of this Society by coming amongst us on this occasion, and showing that he is not indifferent to our transactions; and we earnestly but respectfully hope that it will be convenient to his Royal Highness again to visit this Society. I may, perhaps, be allowed to add, that it has been a great satisfaction to me that I was the first President who had the honour of receiving his Royal Highness as a participator in our proceedings."

Prince Albert then rose, and gracefully bowed his acknowledgments to the company, and was loudly cheered for some minutes.

His Royal Highness and the rest of the company then withdrew, at twenty minutes before nine o'clock.

In the evening Prince Albert honoured with his presence a Grand Ball, given by the Lady Mayoress.

FRIDAY.

This morning, shortly after eight o'clock, Prince Albert left York by special train, having been received during his visit to this ancient city with unbounded cordiality and enthusiasm. The proceedings of the Royal Agricultural Society terminated to-day with the general meeting of the Society in the Guildhall, at which the usual formal business was transacted.

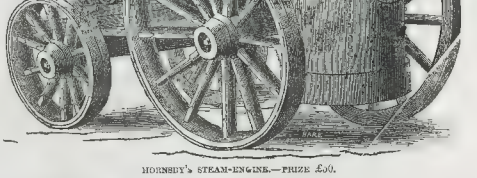
Portable thrashing, straw-shaking, and dressing machine—Mr. R. Barrell

We have engraved a few of the above.

Mr. Hornsby's Prize Six-horse power Portable Steam-engine; invented, improved, and manufactured by the exhibitor. This steam-engine is simple in its construction, fitted with governors, and easy to manage, with tubular boiler, fire-box, and smoke-box complete. The thickness of boiler plates as follows: Fire-box, various ¼ in., 7 16th, ⅜ in., and ½ in. thick; the Horizontal part, ½ in. thick; smoke-box ¼ in., and chimney ⅛ in. thick; the quality, Page's best scrap plates; the diameter of cylinder, 10 in.; length of stroke of the piston, 14 in.; number of revolutions of the crank shaft, 110; crank shaft 3 in. in diameter; journals, 2½ in., wrought iron; diameter of fly-wheels, 6 ft.; weight of ditto, 7 cwt., which acts as driving pulley. The engine calculated to work at 6-horse power; probable time it will require to generate the steam to working pressure is 48 minutes; quantity of fuel it will consume in getting up the steam is 84lbs.; consumption of fuel for every hour it is in full work is 84lbs.; mounted upon carriages, with four wheels, and double shafts, complete, for thrashing corn and other agricultural purposes. Price, £265.

HORNSBY'S STEAM-ENGINE.—PRICE £50.

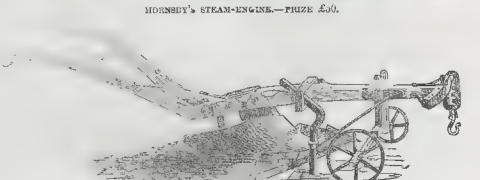
Mr Kilby's Prize Turf and Stubble Paring Plough; invented, improved, and manufactured by Thomas Glover, of Thrussington, near Leicester. This implement gained a prize of £5 at the Royal Agricultural Society's show at Liverpool and £5 at the same Society's Show at Northampton, and £4 with Silver Medal, at the Yorkshire Agricultural Show at Scarborough, 1847. The implement pares turf or stubble ground to any thickness required, from 1 to 3 inches, and 14 inches wide. It lays the turf in a hollow cut, a form admirably adapted for drying. It may be worked by a pair or three horses, according to the nature of the ground and the depth required; and will complete two acres per day. The improvement consists of a simplification of the machinery, by which the same effect is produced, and a reduction in price of £1. Price, £5 10s.



MR. KILBY'S PARING PLOUGH.—PRICE £5.

Mr. Busby's Horse Hoe on the Ridge—Silver Medal. The simple and effective operation of this hitherto unnoticed implement is a boast of admirers of York. The harrow at the back brings the weeds to the surface, and prevents their growing again, as would otherwise be the case in wet weather.

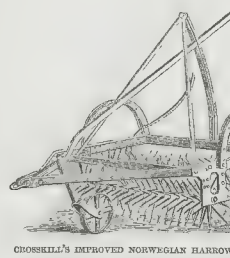
Messrs. Sharman and Co's Prize Patent Scarifier, with Seven Wrought-iron Tines; invented by Mr. Arthur Sharman, of Playford, and improved and manufactured by Rassmus and Mary, of Ipswich. This implement received the prize of £10 from the Society last year at Northampton. It is made principally of wrought-iron, and covers a space of nearly two feet; the tines can be moved to different distances apart to suit various modes of tillage. It is equally efficient as a grubber in clearing of land, and as a general cultivator where the surface is not required to be turned down. Cast-iron or wrought steel hoes, from 4 to 6 inches wide, can be put on, with which it is admirably adapted to clean bean or pea stubble after harvest, break up clover leys where baked, or prepare for turnips. Price, delivered in London, £18 18s.; in Peterborough, Wellingborough, and York, £19 19s.



BUSBY'S HORSE HOE ON THE RIDGE.—SILVER MEDAL.

Mr. Crosskill's Prize (medal) Improved Norwegian Harrow; improved and manufactured by the exhibitor. This Norwegian harrow is fitted with three sets of rowels, or roller parts, 4 ft. 6 in. wide, the rowels revolving separately or independently of each other, thereby avoiding the danger of breakage from stones, &c. The rowel points are of an improved form and length, the more effectually to imitate the action of the garden fork. Price, £12

Mr. W. N. Nicholson's Prize new Cottage Range (with registered improvements). Invented, improved, and manufactured by the exhibitor. Price, £2 2s.



CROSSKILL'S IMPROVED NORWEGIAN HARROW.—SILVER MEDAL.

We append a few notes upon the specimens we have illustrated:—

In the great breeding county of York, a show of stallions is a matter of great interest. A very large number (120) of horses were shown at the late meeting including several well-known and fashionable sires. Our Illustration gives portraits, drawn on the block from the animals, of The Father of the Turf, winner of the first prize of 20 sovs; and Freeman, winner of the second prize of 15 sovs.

The Father is a thorough-bred, by Muley Moloch, out of Thomasina by Welbeck. He never raced, being disqualified for the Derby, St. Leger, and his other engagements, by the death of his owner the late Christopher Wilson, Esq. This is the eighth premium he has won. He is a rich dark chesnut, sixteen hands high, short legs, with good bone, cap tal middle and top, but looks rather too thick on the shoulder, and light in th ; gaskins and hocks. His fortunate owner is Mr. Gaunt, of Wetherby, in the West Riding

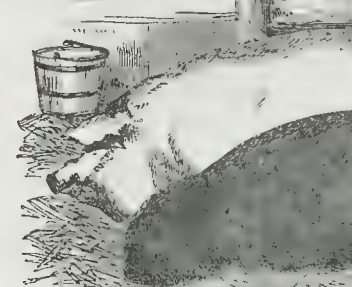
The Cattle we have illustrated contrast well the peculiarities of the two breeds, Short Horn and Hereford. Notwithstanding that the county may be termed the head-quarters of the breed, the Short Horns were fewer in number than usual, and, perhaps, not of such high quality as we recollect to have seen at other shows of the Society. The bulls we have engraved, though good in all their points, were rather too near their Hereford neighbour fully to satisfy expectation : the heifers fell almost during criticism.

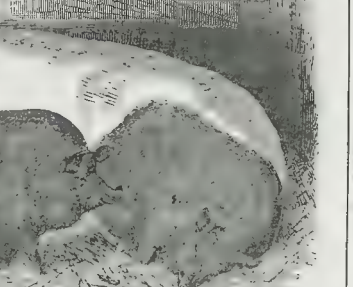
The two Sheep are from the Long-woolled Pens, being shearling rams of the Cotswold breed—winners of the first and second prizes of 30 and 15 sovs in Class I. They are large, level animals, very wide forward, and well up otherwise ; probably weighing 6 or 6½ lbs. a quarter.

The Pigs excited great interest, particularly in the West Riding visitors. Some of them were almost unapproachable excellence and beauty, particular ; the dark gentleman we have represented sitting, who won the two prizes of 15 sovs and 5 sovs.

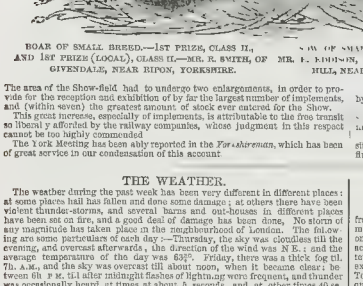
This has been altogether the finest important Show yet held by the Society.



BOAR OF SMALL BREED.—1ST PRIZE, CLASS II, AND 1ST PRIZE (LOCAL), CLASS II.—MR. R. SMITH, OF GIVENDALE, NEAR RIPON, YORKSHIRE.



BOAR OF SMALL BREED.—CLASS II.—1ST PRIZE (LOCAL), AND 1ST LOCAL PRIZE IN CLASS I.—MR. HULL, NEAR LEEDS.



BOAR OF LARGE BREED.—CLASS I.—1ST PRIZE (ROYAL), AND 1ST LOCAL PRIZE IN CLASS I.—MR. HOBSON, PARK-HOUSE, LEEDS.

The area of the Show-field had to undergo two enlargements, in order to provide for the reception and exhibition of by far the largest number of implements, and (which seven) the greatest amount of stock ever ranged for the Show.

This great increase, especially of implements, is attributable to the facilities transit so liberal y afforded by the railway companies, whose judgment in this respect cannot be too highly commended.

The York Meeting has been ably reported in the Yorkshireman, which has been of great service in our condensation of this account

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been very different in different places : at some places hail has fallen and done some damage ; at others there have been violent thunder-storms, and several barns and out-houses in different places have been set on fire, and a good deal of damage has been done. No storm of any magnitude has taken place in the neighborhood of London. The following are some particulars of each day :—Thursday, the sky was cloudless till the evening, and overcast afterwards, the direction of the wind was N.E. ; and the average temperature of the day was 63°. Friday, there was a thick fog till 7h. A.M., and the sky was overcast till about noon, when it became clear ; between 6h and 8h. till after midnight flashes of lightning were frequent, and thunder was occasionally heard, at times at about 5 seconds, and at other times 40 seconds, after the lightning ; the storm was situated to the N. and N.W. ; the direction of the wind was N.E. ; and the average temperature was 64°. Saturday, till 3h. A.M. frequent flashes of lightning were seen, followed by thunder at very long intervals, and the sky was overcast till the evening, and put thinly so afterwards ; the direction of the wind was N.E. ; and the average temperature was 61°5 : on Saturday at midnight a thermometer placed on grass read 53°, and early on Sunday morning it read 29½° ; at this time vegetation on the open country must have been covered with frozen particles of water. On Sunday A.M. sky was partially covered with clouds at all times, and nearly clear nearly wholly so, the direction of the wind was N.E. ; and the average temperature was 56°5. On Monday the sky was almost one-half covered with cirrostratus and fleecy clouds ; the direction of the wind W.N.W. ; and the average temperature was 63°. On Tuesday the sky was for the most part cloudless ; the direction of the wind was W.S.W. ; and the average temperature was 64°. On Wednesday the sky was covered with clouds till 10h. A.M., and mostly so after that hour, and the average temperature was 63°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were :—

The companion picture shows a general view of York, from Clifford's Tower, situated at the southern extremity of the walls, in the angle formed by the confluence of the rivers Ouse and Foss.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The abundance of money, fine weather, and absence of any exciting news from the Continent caused a gradual advance in prices from the opening of the market on Monday until Wednesday. Consols on Monday opened 87¼ to ⅜ ; on Tuesday 89, closing at 88⅝ for Money and the August Account. Conflicting accounts from Ireland, which proved, after investigation, to be of an alarming tendency, agitated the market on Wednesday. The fluctuations were rapid and extensive, Consols at one period registering a fall of one and a half per cent Towards the close of business, however, a rally occurred, and 88¾ was the last quotation. Considerable depression marked the opening on Thursday : Consols quoted 87⅞, declined to 87½ to ⅝, but afterwards rallied, quoting 87¾ to ⅞. The market may be considered, however, the reverse of firm, and the late rapid advance will probably be followed by a strong reaction, should the news from Ireland continue unfavourable. Any downward tendency usually produces realisation on the part of previous buyers, depression being the result. Exchequer Bills have improved and maintain the advance. India Bonds continue below the market value. New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents have been in some demand. Consols may be sold and Reduced purchased at a present profit [illegible] arly the half-year's dividend due in October. At the close of the week Bank Stock was 199 ; Reduced, 87¼ ; Consols, 87¾ ; New Three-and-Quarter per Cents, 88¼ ; Long Annuities, to expire Jan., 1859, 9¼ ; India Stock, 240 ; India Bonds, £1000, 38 pm ; India Bonds, under £1000, 36 pm ; Consols for Account, 87¾ ; Exchequer Bills, £1000, June, 48 pm ; Ditto, £1000, [illegible] ; Ditto, £500, [illegible] ; Small, June, 48 pm.

Foreign Securities shared in the improvement of the English funds at the commencement of the week, and without suffering the same extent of reaction towards the close. On Tuesday the advance in prices was general, with the exception of Spanish and Dutch. Mexican improved 4 per cent.; Portuguese Three per Cents, 1 per cent. Russian attained par, and Brazilian, 71. Spanish Three per Cents, in the contracted quarter, receded to 21⅛ ; and Dutch Four per Cents were flat at 71. Danish has been gradually advancing since the proposed armistice, registering at present a rise of about 7 per cent. The market at the close of the week was heavy. Mexican declining on the receipt of intelligence that Paredes had still sufficient influence to embarrass the peace party in Mexico. Spanish also closed heavily at Brazilian Bonds, Small, 71 ; Colombian Bonds, Three per Cent., 40 ; Danish Bonds, 1825, Three per Cent., 70 ; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1840, 17¼ ; Ditto, Account, 17⅝ ; Portuguese Three per Cent., 17¾ ; Spanish Five per Cent., 1840, 11½ ; Do., Account, 12 ; Do., Passive, 3 ; Three per Cent., Account, 22 ; Dutch Two and a Half per Cent., 47½ ; Do., Account, 45¾ ; Do., Four per Cent., Certificates, 72.

Shares on Monday and Tuesday were not only firm, but in many instances at an advance. London and North-Western quoted 129 ; Eastern Counties, 15¾ ; South-Western and Great Western also tended upward. But the reaction in Consols brought sellers into the market, and prices again receded, as may be seen by the annexed list : Aberdeen, 23½ ; Birmingh a and Oxford Junction, 14 ex in. ; Buckinghamshire, 4 dis. ; Caledonian, 2 [illegible] Chester and Holyhead, 3½ ; E. Counties, 14½ ; Do New Guaranteed 6 per [illegible] er Cent., ; Great Northern, 64 ; Great South [illegible] Lancashire and Yorkshire Quarter Shares, 13½ ; Ditto, Fifths, 7½ ; Ditto New, Gua. 6 per cent., 3 ; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 32 ; Ditto Guaranteed 5 per cent., 85 ; London and North Western, 129¾ ; Ditto, New, 7½ ; Do. Fifths, 7½ ; Ditto £10 (M. and B.) B, 11 ; Midland, 104 ; Ditto, ditto, £36 Shares, 145 ; North British, 22½ ; Ditto, Thirds, 2½ ; North Staffordshire [illegible] Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton, 27 ; Scottish Central, 99½ ; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, Class B, 14½ ; South Devon, 17 ; South-Eastern, 25½ ; Ditto, No. 2, 2 ; Ditto, No. 3, 16½ ; Ditto, No. 4, Thirds, 9½ ; South Wales, 7⅛ ; West Valley, [illegible] Cent. Guaranteed, 97½ ; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 32½ ; Ditto, New and Berwick, 31½ ; Ditto, Extension, No 1, 17¼ ; Ditto, ditto, No [illegible] ; [illegible] istorn Preference, 99 ; York and North Midland, [illegible] ; [illegible] tension, 31¾ ; Bolton [illegible]

SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols opened yesterday at 87¾, but soon after declined, upon its transpiring that Lord Hardinge would be immediately despatched to Ireland. Affairs in that country it was considered daily assumed a graver aspect, and the closing price of Consols, in consequence, fell to 87½ to ⅝. The Foreign and Share Markets were flat, with limited transactions.

THE MARKETS.

CORN.—The supply from [illegible] RANGE (Friday).—Since Monday the arrival of English wheat for our market [illegible] arrivals as well as [illegible] and samples have been reasonably good, and of full average quality. The slow of samples to-day exceeding the wants of the buyers—whose attendance was somewhat limited—the demand for all kinds of wheat of home produce was in [illegible] on state, at barely Monday's prices. The best parcels of foreign wheat were [illegible] . A late rise in the middling and inferior kinds next to nothing was [illegible] and prices were with difficulty supported. Scarcely a sample of English barley was [illegible] and the show of corn was good. The trade was heavy, and [illegible] relief in favour of the buyers. Malt—the supply of which was moderate—[illegible] at barely late figures. The oat trade was in a very depressed state, and, in some instances, prices were quite 6d per quarter lower. Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour very bad.

ARRIVALS.—English : wheat, 6540 ; barley, 261 ; oats, 3320 ; Irish : oats 3090 ; flour, 1610 ; barrels. 12,670 ; and 11,240 sacks. Flour, American, 32s to 37s per 196 lbs ; Italian, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—A few parcels of new rapeseed caraway seed have been disposed of this week. In all other kinds of seeds next to nothing has been done.

LINSEED, English, sowing, 46s to 49s ; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s ; Mediterranean and Odessa, crushing, [illegible] ; Hempseed, 40s to 42s per quarter ; Coriander [illegible] ; Canary, [illegible] s to [illegible] s ; Rapeseed, 28s to 30s ; white, 30s to 32s ; brown, 24s to 26s, per last ; of ten quarters. Cloverseed, red, [illegible] s to [illegible] s ; white, [illegible] s to [illegible] s ; ditto foreign, £8 0s to £9 5s per 100 ; Rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £5 10s per ton. Canary, 7s to 7s 3d per quarter. English Cheese-seed, red, —s to —s ; white, —s to —s ; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s ; extra, —s ; white, —s to —s ; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s ; extra, —s ; white, —s to —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d ; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d, per 4lb loaf

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 1d ; barley, 29s 0d ; oats, 20s 9d ; rye, 31s 0d ; beans, 36s 6d ; peas, 37s 3d

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 47s 11d ; barley, 30s 6d ; oats, 20s 9d ; rye, 30s 3d ; beans, 37s 2d ; peas, 37s 8d.

Duties.—Foreign Grain.—Wheat, 19s 0d ; barley, 2s 6d ; oats, 2s 6d ; rye, 2s 6d ; beans, 2s 6d ; peas 2s 6d.

Flour.—The market continues very slow, and last week's prices are well supported in every instance. The deliveries are good.

Oils.—There is comparatively little business has been transacted in sugar since our last report ; and in some instances the quotations have rated almost nominal

Provisions.—Although the supply of foreign meat is large, the demand for that article is steady, at full prices. Fine Friesland is quoted at 80s to 84s, other fine marks [illegible] and mixed ditto, 68s to 72s per cwt. In Irish butter a slow sale, at last week's quotations. Cloonne, and Kilkenny, landed, 88s to 94s, Sligo, 76s to 78s. Limerick, 78s to 79s ; and Waterford, 76s to 78s per cwt. Bacon, in fair request. Fine singed sides, 56s to 60s. Irish ditto, 52s to 56s. Prime Dorset, 51s for middling and good, 48s to 50s for fine Devon, and from 42s to 44s for good ditto. For fresh [illegible] has been a moderate amount of sales, at full prices. In other kinds very little is doing. Waterford, singed sides, 50s to 52s ; heavy, 42s to 48s ; Limerick, ditto, 48s to 52s ; and heavy, 40s to 44s.

Hops and Stocks.—Old monday bag, 42s to 44s ; new ditto, 42s to 46s 10s ; old observ, £4 0s to £5 0s ; new ditto, £2 10s to £4 10s ; and straw, £1 4s to £1 10s per load

Spirits.—Rum, 1s 4½d to 1s 5d ; and per gallon less number. Ordinary [illegible] gs at 1s 3d to 1s 4d per gallon. Brandy and corn spirits move off slowly at [illegible] ds (Friday).—East Anglia, 12s ; Hotywell Main, 14s 9d ; Towneley, 12s ; Tanfield Moor, 13s 3d ; Hetwell, 15s 3d ; Hilton 16s per ton

Wool, Friday.—The plantation accounts being very favourable, notwithstanding the prevailing high winds, the demand for all kinds of hops is exceedingly heavy, and prices have further receded 2s per cwt. The duty is called from £265,000 to £262,000. Sussex pockets, £2 4s to £2 12s ; Weald of Kent, ditto, £2 8s to £2 16s ; Mid and East Kent, ditto, £2 16s to £3 per cwt.

Smithfield (Friday.)—The supply of beasts on sale in to-day's market being very moderate, the attendance of buyers on the increase, and the weather more favourable to slaughtering, the beef trade was steady, at an advance on Monday's quotations of 2d per 8lb, some of the primest Scots producing 4s 4d per 8lb, and at which a good clearance was effected. The arrival from Scotland comprised 280 Scots, and 400 others. There was a falling-off in the numbers of English sheep, the sale for which was firm, at [illegible] equa. to clean past last week's prime old Downs selling at 3d per 8lb without difficulty [illegible] best lambs were in moderate request, at full currencies ; otherwise the lamb trade was heavy, at barely late rates. In calves a full average business was doing, at our quotations. Pigs were slow in sale, but not cheaper. Meat-cows sold at from £15 to £18 each, including their small calves.

Per 8lb to sink the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d, prime large oxen, 3s 10d to 4s 0d, prime Scots, &c., 4s 2d to 4s 4d ; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 6d ; second quality ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d, prime coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d ; prime South Downs, ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d ; large coarse calves, 3s 4d to 3s 6d, prime small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d ; large hogs, 3s 10d to 4s 2d ; neat small porkers, 4s 4d to 4s 6d ; lambs, 4s 6d to 5s 8d. Suckling calves, 18s to 28s ; and quarter old store pigs, 12s to 20s each. Total supplies [illegible] Beasts, 2,400 ; sheep, 11,640 ; calves, 241 ; pigs, 270. Foreign supplies [illegible] Mouton, —.

Newgate and Leadenhall (Friday).—These markets were steady to-day, at full prices of 3d per 8lb by the carcase.—Inferior beef, 3s 4d to 3s 8d, middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d ; prime ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d ; prime small [illegible] 4s 6d ; large pork, —s to —s, prime ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 2d ; small pork, 4s 4d to 4s 6d ; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 2d ; small pork, 4s 4d to 4s 6d.

SOUTH HACKNEY CHURCH.

THIS very handsome Church is, perhaps, one of the best examples of modern skill in church architecture which we have lately had occasion to notice. It has been a long time in course of erection. A representation of the exterior, as seen from the west, and a slight descriptive notice of it, was given in our Journal of May 17, 1845, on the occasion of laying the first stone. We have now to record the completion and consecration of the church; and, to aid us in describing the interior of the building, which is very striking, we give a faithful view of it, and premise that our representation is taken from the western end of the church.

Passing through the west doorway, which is in the centre of the lofty tower, a square vestibule formed in the tower is entered, and separated from the church by a screen of open arches, above which is the organ gallery, supported by massive brackets of timber of extremely bold design. Doors in the screen give ingress to the Church, and its beautiful design at once arrests the eye

The edifice is divided into a nave, with aisles; and a chancel, separated from the nave by transepts. The nave is partitioned from the aisles by five pillars and pointed arches, above which rises the clerestory. The pillars are not of uniform shape—some of them being octangular, and others circular; and a very good diversity of ornament has been studied in the details of the capitals. The mouldings of the arches are enriched by characteristic ornamentation; and a moulded string-course, just above the arches, separates them from the clerestory

In the spandrils between the arches are richly sculptured brackets supporting the clustered pillars, whence spring the arches of the roof. The clerestory windows are of varied design and character, and are all filled with stained glass, as are also the windows of the aisles.

The roof, of open-work, is of excellent style, and of extremely lofty pitch, it being sixty feet in the highest point from the pavement. The arched and foliated ribs supporting the roof are of massive construction, and a degree of enrichment is given by the bolt-heads at intervals around them. At the intersection of the nave and transepts is a stone arch, of corresponding pitch to the ribs of timber just mentioned.

A striking and most effective portion of the church is the meeting of the transepts, chancel, and nave. From piers of clustered columns spring richly moulded arches, spanning the before-mentioned parts of the edifice; and from short octagonal columns, at the angles, rise groins of timber meeting in the centre, the spaces between the groins being filled with timber, and painted; whilst by the sides of the groins texts are painted, which were selected by the Rector, to illustrate the will of God, that in all times there should be a place set apart for his worship. The transepts have timber roofs; and, with the exception of large windows, of good design, filled with stained glass, are unornamented. The nave aisles open into the transepts by arches, and in the northern transept there is a door into the vestry.

The chancel is of stone, the roof being of the same solid substance as the walls. In plan, the chancel terminates with an apse, forming a portion of an octagon, at the corners of which and sides of the chancel are columns, whence spring groins, meeting in the centre of the roof. Tall, narrow, single-light windows are in each compartment of the walls, and beneath them an arcade of trefoil-headed arches is introduced. In the panels of the arcades in the apse, the walls are painted, and adorned with diapering. In the centre or eastern compartment, the wall is blue, powdered with stars, and the inscription, "Peace and goodwill towards men," painted on it; whilst the north-east wall is red, diapered with fleurs-de-lis; and the sacred monogram "I H S." The text "He was known of them in breaking of bread," is painted on it, as are also the Creed and Lord's Prayer. The south-east wall is enriched with the same diaperings as the opposite corner, with the commandments and the text "When I see the blood I will pass over you." In the north wall of the chancel within one of the arches of the arcade is an arched recess, somewhat resembling in form the memorials of the founders of churches to be met with in our old ecclesiastical structures; on the keystone of which two angels are sculptured, one of them pointing upwards, as if to say, "He is not here; He is risen." This recess forms the table of prothesis, or table on which the sacramental elements are placed, previous to consecration. The space within the altar-rails is covered with a beautiful carpet.

The pulpit and reading-desk are on either side of the chancel arch, and entrance to them is attained from the steps leading to the chancel. They are of admirable design and workmanship. The pulpit is of octagonal form, and the whole surface covered with diapering, elegantly wrought. The reading-desk is of open-worked arches, and has fronts looking westward and southward, the spandrils being filled with diapering. Many of the seats are free; and others have doors to them, as pews; while all have floreated ends. The last seats at the western end of the Church have very highly enriched bench ends, one of which we represent in our initial letter; and on the buttresses are different devices—one having the crest of the rector, a stag pierced with an arrow; another, the lamb with a flag; the third has an eagle; and the fourth a lynx, as symbolical of Christian watchfulness. The backs of these last seats are very elegantly ornamented with panels and quatrefoils, as may be seen in our large view of the church.

The windows in this Church are filled with stained glass, all of it of very meritorious design. The chancel windows contain, in small compartments, the incidents in the life of our Saviour, figures of the Apostles, &c., executed with great depth and brilliancy of colour, by Wailes, of Newcastle. The windows in the transepts are by Messrs. Powell, and represent in the tracery of the north window Abraham offering up Isaac; and, in that of the south, scenes in the life of Moses typical of the Redeemer, such as Moses striking the rock, Moses with the Laws, and lifting up the Serpent in the Wilderness. The remaining portions of the windows are filled with richly diapered glass. The aisle windows are simply but elegantly diapered, with the exception of the two at the western end of the aisle, which have separate subjects in them; these latter are by Wailes, the former by Mr. Castell. The clerestory windows are of various design and character; one of them is a memorial window, placed there in lieu of erecting a monument to a little child, and in it are represented Jesus blessing little children, and raising Jairus' daughter. This window, which is exquisitely painted, is the production of Messrs. Ward and Nixon; and by the same gentlemen are two other clerestory windows, containing scriptural subjects. The clerestory windows on the north side contain, in single lights, figures of Elias and John the Baptist; then, in double lights, the Royal arms of England; the arms of the see of Canterbury, London, &c., disposed: these, and one in the western entrance, are the work of Messrs. Powell, of Whitefriars.

In front of the altar-rails the floor is laid with Minton's tiles. The font, placed near the western end, is beautifully sculptured; it is not, however, from the design of Mr. Hakewill, but was presented to the Church. The organ is the one from the old church at Hackney. Of the peal of bells, eight in number, one was given by his Grace the Archbishop of Armagh; another by Mr. Bowdler; and we believe some of the others are also gifts.

From this brief description it will be imacined the Church is one of no ordinary beauty or interest, and that the greatest praise is due to its architect, Edward C. Hakewill, Esq., for so admirable a specimen of his talents.

The Church was on Thursday consecrated by the Bishop of London, assisted by the Rector, the Rev. H. H. Norris, whose clear good voice was distinctly heard over the whole of this large Church, in spite of the storm of wind, which caused great noise in the roof.

There were upwards of 1500 persons assembled within the building, of whom about 200 were clergymen, in their robes; the parochial clergy entering with the Bishop within the altar-rails

The Bishop preached an excellent sermon, after which, while the sentences of the offertory were read, a collection was made, amounting to £517

The Bishop mentioned in his sermon that the entire cost of the building had been £16,000, and that £600 was wanted to make up the deficiency

After the sermon, the worthy Rector entertained the Bishop, and an immense assemblage of his friends and parishioners with great liberality in his grounds; were, ever and anon, the music of the peal of bells of the new Church seemed to rejoice every heart.

On Tuesday the foundation stone of a large Wesleyan chapel, with school rooms, and minister-house attached, was laid in St. John's-square, Clerkenwell, by the Rev. J. Bunting, in the presence of a numerous assemblage, assisted by a body of the Wesleyan clergy. In the evening a public meeting was held in the old chapel adjacent, Mr. Healey, M.P., in the chair, to promote the Wesleyan Church Extension Fund.

DINNER TO SIR HARRY OF SCINDE.—A complimentary dinner was given last week, at the United Service Club, in Pall-mall, to Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Napier, on his return from the conquest and pacification of Scinde, in India. General Lord Strafford was in the chair.

FROM a return of the number of petitions to the Commissioners of Customs since the 18th August, 1846, praying for the admission of saccharine matter at a rate of duty less than that imposed upon sugars not equal to white clayed, it appears that 21 petitions were presented, and the commissioners adjudged the duty to be paid in each case. In "eight" instances the duty had not been paid, and the goods still remained in warehouse.

INTERIOR OF THE CHURCH OF ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM, AT SOUTH HACKNEY, CONSECRATED ON THURSDAY.

RE-INTERMENT OF QUEEN MARY OF GUELDRES, IN HOLYROOD CHAPEL.

RE-INTERMENT OF QUEEN MARY OF GUELDRES.

IN the low ground, a little to the east of the North Bridge at Edinburgh, until lately stood the Gothic Collegiate Church, founded and endowed by Mary of Gueldres, wife of James II., in the year 1463; and, at her death, she was buried in the north aisle of the sacred edifice. A short time since, the entire pile was taken down, to make way for the North British Railway; and, during the removal, the remains of the Queen were found. They were carried to the Crown-Office, and, after lying there some time, were ordered to be conveyed to the Chapel Royal, at Holyrood, as their final resting place

The re-interment took place on Saturday last. The Lord Provost, magistrates, and town-council, several members of the Society of Antiquaries, and about 300 ladies and gentlemen, were present on the interesting occasion. At eight o'clock the coffin containing the royal remains was conveyed in a hearse from the Exchequer Chamber to the gate of the Chapel Royal, and was there borne on the shoulders of four men to the royal vault, in the south-east corner of the chapel. The agent of the Duke of Hamilton, as deputy-keeper of the palace, acted as chief mourner, while the right side of the coffin was taken by the Lord Provost. As the procession moved slowly along to the vault, which had previously been prepared for the reception of the Royal remains, the company remained uncovered, and the ceremony at this stage was of a singularly solemn and impressive character. Passing into the royal vault, the floor of which is strewn with all that is left of the Kings and Queens of Scotland, the pall-bearers deposited the Royal remains in a recess in the south wall, and soon emerged from the tomb, without any religious ceremony being performed. A cast of the skull has, we understand, been taken in presence of a number of eminent literary and scientific gentlemen

The accompanying Illustration of the scene is from a sketch by an Edinburgh artist.

CAPTURE OF A GANG OF RIVER PIRATES.—During the past week a gang of thieves, who, for a length of time, have successfully carried on their nightly depredations on the Thames, have been captured and committed for trial from Gravesend to Maidstone Gaol

ASSASSINATIONS IN PARIS.—The Patrie of Monday night says:—"At noon to-day, as a grenadier of the 59th Regiment of the Line was crossing the Port d'Arcole, he was stabbed in the back with a knife. He was taken to the Hôtel de Ville. The assassin made his escape." "On Friday morning," says the Gazette des Tribunaux, "as a detachment of the Garde Mobile, quartered at Courbevoie, was escorting a convoy of gunpowder from Mont Valerien, through the Bois de Boulogne, one of the soldiers, quite a youth, quitted the line in the Allée de Fouras, and laid himself down in the thicket, saying that he was so much overcome with the heat and fatigue, that he would rather undergo a fortnight's imprisonment in the Salle de Police than march a step further. As the convoy continued to move on, the captain thought it better to leave the tired man behind than lose time in forcing him to rejoin his company. At six o'clock the battalion returned to the barracks at Courbevoie. The young soldier never made his appearance. At daybreak on Saturday morning, some of his comrades returned to seek him at the spot where they had left him, and found him dead, with seven knife wounds in his body. Neither any part of his accoutrements, nor of 15 francs which he had in his pocket, had been taken from him. Suspicion rests upon a man who, in the village of Suresne, assailed the party with cries of brigands, thieves, and other opprobrious terms. Search is being made for this person"

THE IRISH REBELLION.

It is seldom indeed in the history of any free country, that such measures as have been resorted to by the British Government, within the last few days, for the suppression, or rather the prevention, of rebellion in Ireland, have been received with unanimous approval from men of all parties. With unexampled rapidity, a law has been introduced and carried through all its stages, the object of which is to suspend the commonest rights of a free country; yet, so deep was the conviction in the breasts of all who had a voice in the matter, that present severity towards the guilty was the truest mercy for them, as well as for the people whom they mislead, that no opposition worthy of the name was excited to the propositions of the Minister. The suspension of Irish freedom was voted by acclamation—not because the British Government, Legislature, or any individual of the many who formed the overwhelming majority, nourished any design or any thought hostile to the liberty of Irishmen, or any other section of the people; but because the Government and the Legislature, supported by the common sense of the people of all grades of society, felt and knew that not to suspend Irish liberty for the present was to endanger it for the future, at the cost, moreover, of a fearful sacrifice of human life. Months ago a tribute, as just as it was unexpected, was rendered to the clemency of the British Government, and to the real freedom of the Irish people, by the organs of the Provisional Government of the French Republic, which stated that, not even amid the license engendered in France by a successful revolution, could such proceedings have been tolerated as those of the Irish deputation to M. de Lamartine. The calm, forbearing dignity of the Executive, which elicited this praise, has been maintained amid many provocations, until further delay on the part of the Government would have been a cruel tampering with the lives of perhaps thousands and tens of thousands of unoffending or deluded people. Then only, at the last moment, the British Government determined to act. It has been, and will be, supported in its determination by the moral force of the whole Empire.

So grave a measure as the virtual suspension of all constitutional freedom in Ireland was not to be resorted to without a justification sufficient not alone for Englishmen and Irishmen, but for all Europe—not alone for the present, but for all future time—not alone for the contemporary press, but for the unborn writers of impartial history. That justification has been found in the circumstances of this Irish rebellion; and even those who most vehemently condemn the sins of omission and commission of the Russell Administration, cease their condemnation, and unite with its friends in support of the policy it has been so reluctantly compelled to follow in Ireland. Upon the heads of the vain and ferocious men who have misled the Irish people, must the odium rest of this suspension of liberty. It is not the least remarkable characteristic of the power put forth upon this occasion, that it has been exerted not to destroy, but to save—not to uphold English rule in Ireland, because there is no peculiarly English rule in that portion of the country—but to save Ireland itself from anarchy and bloodshed, and the unspeakable horrors of a war of peasants for the possession of the soil. Such a war would be even more terrible than that which raged but a few weeks ago in the streets of Paris; and the Irish, if left to fight it out without the intervention of a single Saxon, would soon have reason to implore as the greatest of boons that union with and support of Great Britain which their blatant "felons" now so zealously, mischievously, and stupidly repudiate.

We know of nothing in history more deplorable and disgraceful, more painful and disheartening, than the conduct of the physical force agitators in Ireland since their first split with the late Daniel O'Connell. Self-glorification at the expense of the pockets of the people may have been the fault of that great leader; but he never indulged in self-glorification at the hazard of their blood. The O'Briens, the Meaghers, the Mitchels, and all the raving democrats who before the death of O'Connell began to dispute the palm of popular sovereignty with him, and who since his death have caused his real services to the Irish people to be forgotten in the hubbub of their noisy declamation, have manifested on every occasion such a brutality of feeling—such a disregard for truth—such a scorn for justice—such a contempt for common sense, in their appeals to Irish passion and ignorance against not only the unoffending English Government, but against that generous and maligned people that paid so many millions of money which they could not well spare, to relieve their Irish brethren from the miseries of starvation, that the contempt which we might feel towards them as agitators, gives place to disgust and indignation towards them as men. We all know that Ireland is unhappy. We all feel that Great Britain has, at the cost of much treasure, endeavoured to relieve its wretchedness. We are all aware that much remains to be done, and must be done before Ireland can be what she might be; but we are all aware at the same time, that if Ireland is so wretched and degraded in comparison with England and Scotland, the fault must rest, to some extent, in the Irish themselves. Every liberty enjoyed by Englishmen and Scotchmen is enjoyed by Irishmen. There was, at one time, a political disability attached to the majority of the people, on account of the religion they professed. It was removed. In all other respects they were upon the same footing as their fellow-citizens in this country; and when that disability was removed, they were, to all intents and purposes, and in every imaginable way, the coparmers of Englishmen and Scotchmen in constitutional liberty. If in anything they were not equal, it was in their burdens, for they were relieved from many taxes which press upon the energies of the people in the other two divisions of the Empire. The sum of their grievances, as alleged by the Mitchels and Meaghers, stripped of all verbiage and mystification, seemed to be that a Parliament did not sit in College-green. This was certainly a debateable point, but it was not a point that justified appeals to violence. It was, moreover, a point that argued but little for the intelligence of the Irish. Edinburgh was once the seat of an independent legislation. If the Scotch, like the Irish, had chosen to whine and howl that there was no longer a Parliament in that city, instead of devoting themselves to the pursuits of honest industry, to the development of their resources, and the enjoyment to the full of an equality in every respect with the larger and more important division of the kingdom, it is likely that Scotland would have been as miserable as Ireland now is. But Scotchmen were more wise. They were awake when Irishmen slept. They wrought when Irishmen only grumbled. They improved opportunities whilst Irishmen neglected them. They looked after realities and profited by them, whilst Irishmen dreamed, speculated, groaned, and wept about theories which were of no imaginable consequence either to Irishmen or any one else. Not even Mr. O'Connell, immeasurably superior in honesty (though he had not much of that to spare) and in ability to the conceited firebrands who succeeded him, ever devoted any pains to shew his countrymen the truth, and prove to them, not only that "he who would be free himself must strike the blow," but that he who would be happy must deserve to be so, and that the nation which would prosper must be made to prosper by industrious, painstaking, and persevering. He taught them to rely upon others and not upon themselves for aid; while his successors, following up his preaching in that respect, have given them an additional dogma to reflect upon and carry out—that it is proper on the part of a people to accept enormous relief amid enormous misery, and repay the boon with enormous hatred, vituperation, and ingratitude.

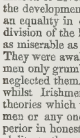
The recent proceedings of these men made it the imperative duty of the Government to prevent them from doing the mischief which their words and acts alike pointed at. In mercy to them, and to the people whom they have deluded, they will be kept out of harm's way for a time. Should, after all, a rebellion ensue, all its horrors will be infinitely less than the horrors which would have befallen unhappy Ireland, if her democrats and agitators had by any chance succeeded in their object of severing Ireland from her partnership with Great Britain—a partnership which to Great Britain is neither very profitable nor very comfortable, but which to Ireland is essential.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

COURT GRANVILLE, ESQ., F.P., OF CALWICH ABBEY, COUNTY STAFFORD

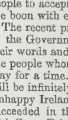


THIS gentleman, who died on the 16th inst., was son of the late Bernard d'Ewes, Esq., of Hagley and Wollescourne, and assumed in 1825—on inheriting the estates of his uncle, the Rev. John Granville, of Calwich Abbey—the surname and arms of Granville, as representative of the famed Sir Bevil Granville, the gallant C. valier commander, who fell, in the arms of victory, at Lansdowne Hill, near Bath.

Mr. Court Granville was born in 1779, and married, in 1803, Maria, daughter of Edward Ferrers, Esq., of Baddesley Clinton, county Warwick, by whom he had issue Bernard (now of Calwich Abbey), three other sons, and three daughters.

Mrs. Delany, the favourite of King George III and Queen Charlotte, was grand-aunt of the gentleman whose decease we record.

THE DOWAGER VISCOUNTESS BOLINGBROKE.



ISABELLA, Viscountess Bolingbroke, whose death we record, was (at the period of her marriage to the late Lord Bolingbroke) Baroness Hompesch, in Germany, the daughter of an ancient and ennobled family. By his Lordship she had two sons—Ferdinand, born 16th October, 1804; and Charles Robert, who died 21st January, 1844.

STANDISH, VISCOUNT GUILLAMORE

THE decease of this much-lamented Peer occurred at his seat, Rockbarton, county Limerick. His Lordship was eldest son and heir of the late celebrated Standish O'Grady, for several years Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, who was elevated to the peerage as Viscount Guillamore, in 1831, and died 21st April, 1840. The family whence the noble Lord descended was a scion of the great house of O'Grady, which [illegible] an equal antiquity and a common [illegible]

Lord Guillamore (whose death we record) sprang from the Wallers of Castletown, an offshoot of the stem of Waller, so famous for having given birth to the poet. In early life his Lordship was presented an Ensigncy in the Coldstream Regiment of Guards, became Captain and Lieutenant-Colonel in 1827, and was appointed Aide-de-camp to the Queen in 1842. He married, 16th of December, 1828, Gertrude Jane, daughter of the honourable Berkeley Paget, brother of the Marquis of Anglesey; and leaves by her a large family; his eldest son and heir being Standish, now third Viscount Guillamore, who was born the 8th of July, 1832

SIR JOSEPH DE COURCY LAFFAN, BART., K.H., M.D., AND LL.D.

THIS respected gentleman, whose death occurred last week, was third son of Walter Laffan, Esq., of Cashel, grandson maternally of Richard de Courcy, Esq., of the same city, and youngest brother of Robert Laffan, titular Archbishop of Cashel. He was born 8th May, 1787, and, having graduated at Edinburgh, gained such distinction in the medical profession as to be appointed successively Physician to the Forces in the Peninsular War, and Physician in Ordinary to the Viceroy, His Royal Highness the Duke of Kent. In 1828 he received a patent of Baronetcy, and in 1836 was honoured with the insignia of the Guelphic Order. Sir Joseph married, in 18[illegible], Jemima, daughter and co-heir of Paul Pilcher, Esq., of Rochester, and became a widower, without issue, in 1835. The [illegible] baronetcy, consequently, become EXTINCT.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS FOR THE WEEK ENDING JULY 2. From the Registrar-General's return of the births, deaths, &c. registered in the metropolis and suburbs during the above week, we find the births to have been 1309 in number, of which 669 were males and 640 females. This number is 1 less than that of the preceding week. The deaths registered during the same week were 1096 in number (567 males, and 529 females), this being less than the deaths from this cause by 3, and exceeding the weekly average for the last five summers by 124; they also exceeded those of the preceding week by 166. The excess over the average is principally accounted for under the heads of small-pox, the deaths from this cause being 3[illegible], and the average is [illegible]; 50, over [illegible] 37; diarrhœa, 54, over [illegible] 36; cholera, 21, average 7; typhus, 70, average 49. The [illegible] of cholera mentioned above are principally of English cholera, Asiatic cholera, and cholera morbus. One case, however, was of Asiatic cholera, namely, that of a woman aged 39, living in Mount-street, Regent-street, who died after an illness of sixteen hours' duration.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

With the restoration of peace and order in Paris, and their establishment on a secure basis, under the firm, albeit absolute and military rule of General Cavaignac, the news from across the Channel becomes less interesting and exciting. There is in fact, this week, quite a dearth of stirring incident, such as our readers since the formation of the Republic up to the present time have not failed to present. On this state of things augurs well for the future, and we trust it will become permanent.

The Assembly has voted the project of decree respecting the mobilisation of 200 battalions of National Guards—respecting which the committee to whom the question had been referred stated in its report that with the Government it believed in the maintenance of peace; but it considered that under existing circumstances France ought to be powerfully armed, in order to maintain hereher share of the influence which so justly belongs to her in Europe. Nevertheless, the committee was of opinion that this force, organized regularly, ought to be employed not only in case Europe should have to fear a foreign invasion, but likewise on all occasions wnen it might become necessary to repress anarchy, should it again menace public order and security.

The Commission appointed by the National Assembly to prepare a constitution, assembled on Monday, together with the fifteen delegates chosen by the standing committees of the Assembly. M. Armand Marrast, the President of the Assembly, having attended the meeting, was offered the Presidency of the Commission, but he declined the honour, preferring to retain the functions of reporter. M. de Cormenin consequently continued to fill the President's chair in the Commission.

The proceedings were merely of a formal nature. The President of the Commission simply demanded of each delegate to state the observations he had to make on each article of the project. After which the amendments proposed by the delegates were laid before the members of the Commission.

It was understood that the Commission would forthwith set about preparing their final report.

The Moniteur publishes the returns of the Customs duties collected during the month of June last, which amounted to 5,586,453 francs. They had produced in the corresponding month of 1846, 12,612,579 francs; and in 1847, 11,180,153. The receipts of the customs during the first half of the year 1848 did not exceed 38,180,764 francs, whilst they had amounted in 1846 to 74,676,736; and in 1847 to 65,966,675.

The number of French and foreign vessels that entered the harbours of France during the six months of 1848 ending on the 1st July, was 6095, measuring 881,250 tons, or 3905 vessels and 521,373 tons less than in 1847. The number of vessels of all countries, which sailed from French harbours during the last six months was 6084, measuring 676,363 tons, or 815 vessels and 94,884 tons less than in 1847.

The new loan was said to have caused much dissatisfaction among some of the monied interest in Paris. Many holders of Treasury Bonds, and the depositors in the savings banks, who had been compelled to receive Five per Cent. Stock at 80, and Three per Cent. Stock at 55, for their property, complained that they had been sacrificed to the avidity and dignity which were 2000f in favour of his mother, and declare it reversible on the head of his sister, Elvire Dornès.

The Assembly voted the decree by acclamation.

M. Barrot communicated to the Assembly the result of the electoral operation of Corsica, where M. Louis Napoleon had been elected.

M. Marrast read a letter from M. Louis Napoleon, dated London, July 10, in which he expressed surprise at the election in Corsica having chosen him for their representative, after he had resigned a post offered to him by three departments. The same reason, however, which had imposed upon him that sacrifice, obliged him again to decline the honour until the period when his presence in France should not be taken advantage of by the enemies of the Republic to disturb its peace. He charged him with communicating to the Assembly their resignation.

The order of the day on the Loan Bill (175 to 200 millions of francs) was then taken, and the Assembly, after a short discussion, passed a project of decree which M. Goudchaux, the Minister of Finance, had proposed, viz

"Art. 1. The engagements contracted by the subscribers to the last loan of 250 millions of francs not having been acquitted in respect of the last instalment due, that loan is declared null and void, so far as regards the instalments not paid up, and the rentes not delivered.

"Art. 2. A credit of 131,500f rentes 5 per Cents, the interest running from the 22nd March, 1848, which shall be negociated at the price of [illegible], shall be opened in the Ministry of Finance.

"Art. 3. The price of the rentes so negotiated, as provided in the preceding Article, shall be paid at the following periods:—On the 7th August, 1848, 17½ per cent; 20th September, 10; 20th October, 7½; 20th November, 7½; 20th December, 7½; 20th January, 1849, 7½; 20th February, 7½; 20th March, 10; 20th April, 7½; 20th May, 7½; 20th June, 5; and 20th July, 5 per cent.

"Art. 4. On the payment of each of those instalments, with the exception of the first, which is to be considered as a deposit to guarantee the payment of the remainder, the subscribers shall receive a coupon of rentes, representing, at the price of the negotiation, the amount paid. The coupon belonging to the first instalment of 17½ per cent. shall only be delivered after the payment of the first instalment.

"Art. 5. The certificates of the two first instalments of the loan of 1847, for 250 millions, forming the deposit or guarantee of 7 francs 50½ centimes per 9 francs rente, shall, until the 17th of August next, be deemed acceptable for the same amount of 7 francs 50½ centimes, or 3 francs rente in the payment of the first instalment of the new loan. The surplus shall be paid in specie. After the expiration of that delay, the certificates of the former loan shall be considered as null and void.

"Art. 6. A sinking fund of one one-hundredth of the nominal capital of the rentes issued in virtue of the present decree shall be included in the attributions of the sinking fund administration.

"Art. 7. The measures to be adopted for the execution of the present decree, particularly as respects the holders of certificates of the new loan who shall not have effected the payment of the instalments as they become due, shall be decided by the Minister of Finance."

[illegible] was then put from the chair, and adopted by an immense majority.

The Assembly afterwards decreed the admission into the Hôtel des Invalides of officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the Garde Mobile wounded in the insurrection of June, and adjourned at four o'clock.

SPAIN.

Advices from Madrid mention that on the 18th inst., M. Sancher, Physician to the Queen, had been ordered by her Majesty to repair to Seville, to be present at the accouchement of the Duchess de Montpensier. The hopes of the Queen, who was understood to be in an interesting situation, giving promise to the throne of Spain, have been for the present frustrated, as the imprudence of her Majesty (for the Isopatch entered into no detail) must have occasioned that accident, which, however, had not impaired the health of the Queen. Several medical men, summoned to the Queen, had, on the 20th, left in all haste for that residence. All the intelligence from Navarre and the Basque Provinces described the Carlists as beaten, and dispersed on every point. The insurrection in fact was considered at an end, the young men of the province having abandoned the chiefs who had raised the Montemolinist standard in the country.

BELGIUM

On Saturday last, the seventeenth anniversary of the accession of Leopold I. to the throne of Belgium was commemorated with great solemnity. Early in the morning the Princes alone assisted at the ceremony of the "Te Deum," but on the present occasion the King himself, accompanied by the Queen and their august children, proceeded to the cathedral and attended the service.

The reception of the Royal Family was most respectful. There was no review, owing to the uncertain state of the weather.

ITALIAN STATES.

PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY.—From the seat of war we learn that the headquarters of the Italian army had been transferred to Mantua, five miles from Mantua. At the same time the Duke of Savoy proceeded with his division to take up his quarters in Castel Belfiore, passing the advanced posts at Castellaro. The Duke of Genoa was expected at Mozzecane on the 17th, so that Mantua will soon be blockaded on all sides.

The Austrians, on evacuating Ferrara, had even resolved that town on hearing the approach of Italian troops to that side of the Po. On the 17th General Bava attacked a body of Austrians about 2000 strong, near Governolo, and obtained a complete victory. He took a standard, two pieces of cannon, and 500 prisoners. This success is important, as it secures to the army the only passage across the Lower Mincio held by the Austrians, and renders it extremely difficult to attack the Italians on their right flank. The Piedmontese troops arrived at Venice on the 14th, and were received with loud cheers by the people. They [illegible] possession of the city in the name of Charles Albert.

On the 20th, a body of 1000 Austrians attacked 300 Tuscans and Lombardians, at about four miles from Rivoli. The engagement was obstinate on both sides; the Duke of Genoa commanded the Italians. The result was not known. Accounts from Roverbella, of the 16th, state that the operations before Mantua and Verona are still in progress, and that the cannon of the Austrians is heard every now and then directed against the works of the besiegers. Thus beckoned on every point, it is impossible that those two cities can be reinforced. Four hundred Austrians who made a sally from Mantua, and advanced as far as Grazo to reconnoitre, were made prisoners. Some slight affairs, the result of which is unknown, came off near Rivoli and Pastrengo. Peschiera Vecchia has been burnt by the Austrians.

The Austrians, it is said, are now in possession only of the interior road from Villafranca to Roncanova by Lagnano, four miles from Castellaro.

Charles Albert issued an ordinance on the 11th, decreeing the immediate union of Lombardy and the provinces of Padua, Vicenza, Treviso, and Rovigo, already voted by the people. Lombardy and the aforesaid provinces will form, with the Sardinian States, one single kingdom. A common constituent assembly will be convoked, by universal suffrage, for the discussion of the basis and the form of the new monarchy.

The Gornale del Lloyds Austriaco of the 16th states that vessels are now allowed to enter and depart from Trieste without impediment. Trade has not yet resumed its regular course, but symptoms of a revival are already manifest, and even speculative business is recommencing.

FLORENCE.—The accounts from Florence show that the total absence of repressive power on the part of the Government is producing serious disorders in Tuscany, which not only disturb public tranquillity, but even menace property.

ROME.—From Rome the accounts are still of a very unfavourable to the prospect of tranquillity. The Contemporanea of the 15th of July shows that two Governments exist in that capital—a regular supersus a superio—the one recognised and applauded by the Chamber and the people, that of Mamiani and his Ministry, the other, occult, illegal, and obscure—in short, the retrograde or ultramontane faction, fomented by the intrigues of the Jesuits. "It is to be hoped," adds the Correspondent, "that the Mamiani Ministry will triumph over the intrigues which beset its path, for it is the only Government that can save the country from a perilous crisis."

SICILY.—The news of the selection of the Duke of Genoa to fill the throne of Sicily has been confirmed. The following is the official text of the decree of the Sicilian Parliament:—"Art. 1. The Duke of Genoa, second son of the present King of Sardinia, and his posterity, are called to reign in Sicily, according to the constitutional statutes of the 10th July, 1848. Art. 2. He will assume the name and title of Alberto Amedeo I., King of Sicily, in virtue of the constitution of the kingdom. Art. 3. He shall not be crowned, and shall take the oath required by the 40th article of the statutes. Done and deliberated at Palermo on the 11th July, 1848. (Signed.) The President of the House of Commons, the Marquis de Torrearsa; the President of the House of Peers, the Duke de Serra di Falco."

NAPLES.—Advices to the 17th mention that, immediately on the arrival at Naples of the intelligence of the election of the Duke of Genoa as King of Sicily, preparations on an extensive scale for the invasion of Sicily were made. Orders were issued to prepare all the steam frigates and gun-boats in the bay and harbour, and all the commercial steamers were shortly to follow, as well as every description of boat capable of carrying arms. The sailors employed in the coasting trade, not only at Naples but at all the islands, were impressed. Every expedient was resorted to to augment the force which was to be placed at the forces available for the invasion consisted of about 20,000 troops in Calabria, about 8000 in the fortress of Messina, and 8000 or 9000 at Naples. It was expected that the embarkation would take place about the 20th, and that the forces would be landed at Syracuse. The Liberal party were in high spirits, feeling a confidence that the Sicilians, aided by Charles Albert, would certainly prevail against the Royal troops. It was expected that a British steamer would bring the new King from Genoa to Sicily. The British merchants resident in Naples were made to contribute to the forced loan. The Liberal cause has sustained a check in Calabria. The royal troops occupy Cosenza, Cabanzano, and the coast; the Liberals are in possession of all the mountains and the interior, from Tivioli downwards

GERMAN STATES

FRANKFORT.—On the 22d inst. the Assembly at Frankfort discussed the report presented by M. de Wydenbrugh, in the name of the international commission, on addresses and petitions concerning the relations with Russia, France, and the United States. The conclusions arrived at by the commission led to a recommendation to the National Assembly to adhere to the principle of foreign policy that is before set forth

"That our foreign policy should, before all things, watch over the honour and rights of Germany, is a principle which scarcely needs to be especially and positively recognised. It lives in the breast of the entire people, who are happy in being reunited in a single state, and who are ready to make any sacrifices required by the country for the maintenance of their liberty and unity. But the commission thinks at right that it should be an established point that Germany will never allow the interference of any foreign state in the independent development of its internal affairs, and that it will never lend assistance in the assertion of particular states for political principles. In the energetic execution of these principles, which all civilised peoples have adopted or will adopt, lies the guarantee that the movement which has awed the entire world, and which has already become an history, will not degenerate into a universal struggle of nations, and that it will not lose its most valuable acquisitions. Let us hope, rather, that the peace of Europe will be established on those foundations which will secure it for ever."

The conclusions of the commission were unanimously adopted.

The commission then made another motion to the following effect:

The National Assembly decrees that in the event of war in Germany there shall be sent German forces in sufficient number to put them in a position to oppose any hostile forces

M. Biedermann proposed to add an amendment to the effect that the abovementioned measure be left to the province of the central power, who should carry it out with due regard to the augmentation of the army, already resolved upon by the Assembly. The original motion, as well as the amendment of M. Biedermann, were agreed to

Lastly, the commission made the following motion

"1. The Assembly will pass to the order of the day on propositions for the conclusion of treaties offensive and defensive with different states. 2. The National Assembly declares it sees nothing but what is natural in the recognition of France as a Republic, and the sending to Paris of a Minister for Germany at the time of the approaching regulation of the legations for Germany."

This motion was unanimously adopted.

AUSTRIA.

The new Cabinet has at last been formed by Baron Doblhoff, and sanctioned by the Archduke John. The list was published on the 20th inst., and is as follows:—

President and Minister for Foreign Affairs, Baron Wessenberg; Interior, Baron Doblhoff; Justice, Dr Bach; War, Count Latour; Finance, Baron Kraus; Financial Secretary, Baron Stiffi; Trade, Mr Hornbostel; Public Instruction, Baron Doblhoff (who has taken that office provisionally); Secretary to the Ministry of Public Instruction, Baron Feuchtersleben; Public Works, Mr. Schwarzer

The new Ministry have issued a document in which they set forth the principles on which they propose to act. They declare themselves in favour of a constitutional, democratic monarchy on the basis of the popular will, expressed in a legal and constitutional manner. They are convinced that a Government cannot be strong unless it leans upon the people for the confidence and support of all friends of legal progress, and this, they say, will enable them to protect the rights of the people and the throne against all attacks. But liberty cannot be strong, unless Government too is strong. The Ministers declare that all just wishes and complaints shall be attended to, but they protest that no power on earth shall induce them to act in contradiction to their ideas of justice and right.

The regulations of the National Assembly were provisionally adopted at Vienna also on the 20th. Dr. Francis Schmidt, the member for Vienna, was elected President for a month. Messrs. Strobach, of Prague, and Macnevan, of Trieste, were appointed Vice-Presidents. The Archduke John was to open the Diet on the 22d. The election of the President does not in any manner prejudge the strength of the contending parties.

PRUSSIA

From Berlin this week we learn that the voluntary loan, as a financial measure, had proved a total failure, though individual instances of patriotic contributions are mentioned. Even the advantage of one-and-a-half per cent. more interest on the deposits, and exemption from the forced loan of those contributing their fair quota, had not been tempting enough.

The Court of Appeal had confirmed the sentence passed on the student Monecke for sedition—two years and a half's imprisonment, with forfeiture of the right of wearing the national cockade.

The trial of the ringleaders of the mob in the attack on the Arsenal had been concluded: Korn and Siegerist were sentenced to seven years, Lowensohn to two years, and Urban to one year's imprisonment in a fortress. The other persons in custody would be tried further.

A deputation from Cologne had arrived at Berlin, for the purpose of inviting the King to [illegible] the Constitutional Assembly. [illegible] Majesty had replied that he would [illegible] Diet, deputies were [illegible] to the Regent of the Empire, and to the two Kings of Bavaria, Louis and Maximilian.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN

According to our accounts this week from the Duchies, the temporary truce which had been arranged between General Wrangel and Hedermann for three days, from the 20th to the 18th instant (which was prolonged to afford time for answers to arrive from Copenhagen, Berlin, and Frankfort, we also learn that an English, Swedish, and Russian negotiator, respectively, had arrived at Kolding on the same errand, for the purpose, if possible, of bringing the long-expected armistice to a final conclusion. The Free Corps of Major Van Tann had been sent from the scene of military operations, and would be speedily dissolved, notwithstanding the opposition of the friends of the Provisional Government.

SWITZERLAND

Letters from Switzerland, of the 22nd inst., state that the draft of the Federal Constitution was adopted by the Grand Council of Berne, by a majority of 122 to 80. M. Ochsenbein, the former chief of the Free Corps, warmly defended, on this occasion, the Conservative cause, and mainly contributed to the defeat of the Radical party. In the Grand Council of Zurich the new Constitution was voted by the 156 members present. It is there is every probability, the Constitution be generally approved, the Switzerland of 1814 will soon have disappeared, and make way for a Republic similar to that of the United States.

POLAND.

Letters dated Cracow, the 18th inst., inform us that the new sentences pronounced against the persons compromised in the insurrection of 1846 have just been published. Karasinski was sentenced to 12 years' hard labour in Siberia, and 1000 lashes of the knout; Pokasenski to 500; Karzenkowski to 300; and Akord to 200. The three latter and five others, viz. Rembouski, Zaczewski, Gelewski, Cwerkiski, and Kwiatko, are moreover sentenced to twelve years' hard labour in the mines of Siberia. Karasinski suffered the corporal punishment with great courage. He will soon have recovered. Karzenkowski, a young man, 21 years of age, suffered the most.

HUNGARY.

The Hungarian Ambassador to the German Parliament at Frankfort has been instructed by the Ministry to enter into diplomatic communications with the German Cabinet as soon as it has been formed by the Regent.

The Commander of the Hungarian forces in the Banat has granted the Servian insurgents another armistice.

PRINCIPALITIES OF THE DANUBE.

Advices to the 1st inst. from Bucharest (Wallachia) mention an attempt at a Russian counter-revolution which had been made. A colonel named Solomon, to whom the Russians promised the Ministry of War, collected a number of soldiers, with whom he attacked the Provisional Government. He was repulsed by the National Guards; whereupon he hastened to the barracks, seized the artillery, and prepared for a siege. Ultimately, however, he fell into the hands of the people, who would have torn him to pieces, but for some young men, who conducted him to a dungeon; when interrogated, he confesse i that he was the pay of Russia.

Later accounts state that the Russian Consul Kotzebue, of Focksshani, has addressed a threatening letter to the Metropolitan, announcing the march of the Russian troops (100,000 men, it is said) into Wallachia, and strongly dwelling on the misfortunes to which the country would be exposed, unless a stop were at once put to the innovations now going on, and unless Prince Bibesco were recalled to the Government, and it is added that the measures of the Russian Government had so terrified the Provisional Government, that the members, after a vain attempt to raise the peasantry, fled in all directions. Bucharest was tranquil on the 10th, and it was expected that the inhabitants of the country districts would receive the Russians with open arms. In Wallachia the peasantry took upon themselves as their liberators, their policy having always been to protect the peasantry against the oppression of the nobility; which may explain the present state of things in the provinces of the Danube.

From Jassy, in Moldavia, we learn that the Russians have pitched their camp before the city, because the cholera rages within it.

UNITED STATES.

By this week's arrival the news from the States is of little interest. The official proclamation of peace with Mexico had been published at Washington. The President, in his message to Congress announcing the ratification, recommends the appropriation of twenty millions to fulfil the treaty stipulations, to be paid in four annual instalments; provision for the appointment of surveyors of the boundary line; for the appointment of a board of commissioners to decide on the claims of United States Citizens against Mexico; the immediate establishment of a territorial government over California and New Mexico, and the extension of laws over the same; the regulation of commerce on the coast by law; liberal grants of public land to settlers; and, finally, that no increase in the army be made.

That part of the message which states that indemnity had been secured by the acquisition of territory, and that the brilliant exploits of the army were a guarantee for security, was received with laughter, as was also that portion of it which says, "we shall probably be saved the necessity for another foreign war for a series of years."

The President's message also states the whole United States debt as 65,000,000 dollars.

Congress is still in session; the exclusion of slavery from Oregon appears to be the chief topic of debate.

The Presidential canvass engages great attention.

MEXICO.

Accounts from Mexico to the 22d of June mention that Paredes had seized the city of Guanajuato, and headed a rebellion, under the plea of hostility to the treaty. There were strong symptoms of revolution in Mexico. President Herrera had issued a proclamation in favour of order.

The American forces were rapidly evacuating Mexico. Commodore Perry, in the United States frigate, was still at Vera Cruz.

The city of Mexico is described as at present literally swarming with desperadoes of every description, who lurk in all the avenues, awaiting an opportunity for the perpetration of their nefarious designs.

Perfect political liberty prevailed, and trade was reviving.

INDIA.

Advices in anticipation of the monthly mail from India have been received this week. The intelligence is important, and reaches to the 1st of June from Bombay and Calcutta, and to the 9th from Madras. The mid-monthly mail had been discontinued from Bombay, in consequence of the setting in of the monsoon.

At Lahore, General Kham Singh, of the Sikh Artillery, had been discovered heading a plot to allure our Sepoys from their allegiance, and had been hanged by order of the Resident, along with a Moonshee of the name, similarly implicated. It was expected that important information would be gleaned from a third culprit, who had been reprieved at the gallows on that condition. About twenty other persons were in custody on the same charge. The plot had been brought to light mainly by the instrumentality of several Sepoy officers. Previous to this discovery it had been considered necessary by our authorities at Lahore to employ further measures of precaution to secure the peace of that capital. Troops had been ordered to move up there and to the Jullunder Doab, from various quarters.

The engineers were occupied in raising a parapet around the whole inner edge of the rampart of Lahore, and by every possible means strengthening and isolating the works occupied by the troops. A large magazine of arms in the city, formerly of old by Runjeet Singh, had been transferred by order of the Resident, and blown up. It was said that the populace had begun to help themselves to arms from that arsenal. The strictest garrison duty was being maintained, and every officer had been called in from the districts. The measures thus enforced had left little grounds of serious alarm as to the ultimate issue of affairs at the Sikh capital.

From Moolan we learn, respecting the insurgents, that the Dewan had offered large bounties to Sikh Sepoys, and especially to horsemen, to induce them to join his standard, and there appears no doubt that considerable masses had already collected around him. He is said to be strengthening and garrisoning the fort of Moolan, and also that of Mittenkote, on the Indus, at the confines of our territory. He attempted to intercept an officer and his family who were descending the Ravee, but they received timely notice and escaped. His horsemen had been out also in pursuit of Lieutenant Edwardes.

The Nawaub of Bhawulpoor, whose territory is contiguous to that of Moolan, and who remained faithful to our interests, had been threatened by the Dewan.

It had been determined at Bombay not to undertake military operations from that presidency, at the present season of the year, against the insurgents, and it was understood that the Governor-General had decided upon deferring operations against Moolan until after the rains.

Several cases of cholera are reported to have occurred daily at Surat and Broach, in Western India.

WEST INDIES.

Our accounts this week state that at Martinique comparative order had been restored amongst the Blacks.

The Island of St. Domingo still remained in a very bad state. The slave population of St Jago de Cuba had evinced symptoms of a desire for insurrection.

From Trinidad we learn that a memorial, signed by a great majority of the inhabitants, against the Spanish slave trade, had been forwarded to her Majesty.

There had been heavy rains in the colony of Demerara.

The wet weather at Jamaica had been succeeded by a great drought, which was somewhat injurious to the crops. The embankments of the railway had been repaired, and the trains resumed their work.

His Excellency the Governor of Jamaica had issued a proclamation appointing the 27th of June as the day for the meeting of the House of Assembly. A proposition to borrow £15,000 upon security of the taxes or bonds of the island, had been rejected by a majority of Commissioners of Public Accounts.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been dull, the sky has been generally clouded, and rain has fallen frequently. The following are some particulars of each day:—Thursday, during the afternoon, the sky was partially clear, at all other times it was overcast; the direction of the wind was S.S.W. at the former part of the day, and W.S.W. at the latter; the average temperature of the air for the day was 60°. Friday, till the evening, the sky was partially covered by clouds, and wholly covered afterwards; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 58°. Saturday, with slight exception, the sky was free from cloud; the direction of the wind was W.S.W. at the early part of the day, and S.S.E. at the latter; the average temperature of the day was 64°. Sunday, during the afternoon, the clouds were somewhat broken; at other times the sky was overcast, and heavy rain was falling from 5h. 30m. p.m. till midnight: the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the average temperature was 56°. Monday, the sky was overcast during the morning, the clouds became broken after noon, and the night was cloudless; the direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the average temperature for the day was 62½°. Tuesday, rain was falling generally throughout the day, the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 60½°. Wednesday, the sky was overcast, and rain was falling frequently; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 61°, and that for the week ending this day was 61·2°.

The following are the extreme thermometrical readings for each day:—

Blackheath, Thursday, July 27th, 1848. J. G.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

On the occasion of the sale of the horses and carriages belonging to the Count of Paris and the Duchess of Orleans, in Paris, a few days since, there were few buyers and fewer spectators present. Most of the horses, all of them choice and valuable animals, of England stock, were knocked down at prices which ordinarily would not purchase horses of a mediocre class. The carriages went at corresponding prices.

It appears that the damage caused to property in Paris by the collision between the troops and the people on the 23d, 24th, and 25th of February last, was not so great as had been calculated. A grant of 200,000f. (£8000) was made by the Provisional Government to indemnify the sufferers, of which only 167,000f. (£6680) has been claimed.

The Dieppe Railroad is to be opened to the public on the 31st inst.

The Palace of the Louvre, it is said, is about to be finished. The plans proposed by Visconti have been adopted. The difficulty of providing money has been overcome by the offer of a company to make all the necessary advances on transfer of an adequate portion of the estates of the Crown.

The National Assembly of France has not terminated the discussion relative to gratuitous admission into the Polytechnique and St. Cyr Schools. It has been decided that bursaries shall not be granted to the sons of representatives, but that their nephews are not excluded from such grants.

L'Union, of the 20th, has the following:—"The Committee of the Interior has entertained a proposition for the institution of a governmental and popular press, and the creation of public libraries. The object of this governmental press will be to oppose publicity to publicity (Opposer la publicite à la publicité)."

The fleet under the command of Sir Charles Napier, C.B., arrived at Cork at twelve o'clock on Tuesday, and consisted of five sail of the line and several smaller craft. It was thought that the presence of these ships and so determined a commander would have a salutary effect in repressing the disaffected.

Several whales have been seen of late off the coast of Scotland. Last week a bottle-nose whale was caught by some fishermen in their herring nets in the Sound of Kilbrandon, measuring 30 feet in length, and weighing about ten tons.

The Catholic clergy in Ireland are said to be acting with true intrepidity, and, on behalf of order, exposing themselves to unpopularity. The noble example of Dean Burke and the Rev. Mr. Henebury, of Clonmel, has been followed by the Rev. Mr. England, parish priest of Passage, in the vicinity of Cork.

The wife of Archduke John of Austria, who is dignified in the official gazette as the first German lady, made a solemn entry into Vienna on the evening of the 19th. Crowds assembled to meet her, and a number of young girls, dressed for the occasion, formed a procession, after presenting to the wife of the Archduke crowns of flowers.

Steam-boat disasters appear to be becoming as common in our American colonies as in the United States. To the loss of the Dasna, in the St. Lawrence rapids, near Montreal, on the 20th of June, is now added the burning of the Speed, a new steamer built last year, for the route between Granville and Bytown (Canada), at an outlay of £9000.

There is no truth whatever in the curiously circumstantial reports of the arrest for sedition and subsequent rescue of the Rev. Mr. Byrne, at Carrick-on-Suir, which appeared in the papers of last week.

On Wednesday the Queen's printer issued eight new Acts of Parliament, all of which received the Royal assent on Saturday last.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company have granted a pension of £.00 per annum, for life, to Lieut. Waghorn, R.N., as an acknowledgment for the services he has rendered the cause of steam communication between this country and India.

On Wednesday afternoon a review and inspection of the whole of the disposable men from each of the six divisions of the City police force, amounting to nearly 500 men, took place on the parade ground of the City Artillery, Bunhill-row, in the presence of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Alderman Johnson, Wilson, and Salomons, the members of the police committee.

The Highland Destitution Board contemplates a cessation of labour somewhere about the 35th of September, by which time the committee calculates on being able to ascertain the extent of the potato rot and the productiveness of the harvest. Meanwhile emigration goes on apace.

At a meeting of Chartists held in Cripplegate on Wednesday evening, a petition to the House of Commons was agreed to, praying that the Chartist prisoners might be allowed to wear their own clothes, the use of books, pens, ink, and paper, that they might not be subject to hard labour and to the silent system and to solitary confinement, and that they might not be treated as felons when only convicted of misdemeanor.

At Strasburgh, on the 18th inst., an attempt at insurrection was made by two or three hundred operatives, employed in the Communal workshops and tobacco manufactory, who proceeded in a tumultuous manner to the Hôtel de Ville. The reppel was beaten, and the National Guard having taken arms, order was restored without a collision.

The cholera was on the decline in Russia.

Paris was visited by a tremendous storm of thunder and lightning on Sunday night and Monday morning.

Notwithstanding all that was said about the telegraphic signals with which, as was supposed, the insurgents at Paris communicated with each other during and after the insurrection, it has been discovered, after a searching investigation, that no signals were employed.

It is stated from the departments of France that the price of wheat has not been so low since the year 1830 as it is at this moment.

A number of unemployed operatives, forming 250 families, and who are now existing on alms distributed at their respective mairies in Paris, have petitioned the National Assembly to be permitted to establish a colony in Algeria.

Several societies are on foot in the midland counties, the object of which is to secure small plots of freehold ground to working men, that they may use the land for gardens, and in right of possessing it secure also a vote for the county.

The Railway Commissioners have granted to the South Western Railway Company, under their Act of 1845, an extension of two years to complete the line from the Waterloo-bridge station to London-bridge.

A deputation, consisting of Mr. G. Rochfort Clarke, Mr. Steward, Mr. Lee, Mr. Meadows, and M.. Stevenson, had an interview with the Commissioners of Railways on Tuesday, at their office in the Board of Trade, respecting an application for an extension of time made by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company.

Prince Albert has issued orders to the Hon. Artillery Company of London, of which he is Colonel, to proceed to Charlton for a series of drill practice. Gold medals will be fired for by the respective companies: Prince Albert's medal being open for the competition only of the prize men of the several companies.

The statement in a Sunday paper relative to the approaching sale at Stowe, viz. that the mortgagee of the property had been paid out by a relation of the Duchess of Buckingham, is untrue. The sale will take place as advertised.

The door-keeper of the Court of Chancery, whose duties are returned as "none," receives a salary from "fees" to the extent of £3218 per annum, his right to which is returned in the Parliamentary papers as "usage" only.

On Monday morning, at eight o'clock, William Thomas Hewson, aged 45, who was convicted at the last sessions of the Central Criminal Court of the murder of William Woodhouse, one of the Colnbrook-fields police men, underwent the extreme penalty of the law in the front of Newgate.

The export of tea from China to England from 1st July, 1847, to 18th May, 1848, was 48,981,000lbs., against 44,266,200lbs. last season, showing a decrease this year of upwards of 5,000,000lb.; of congou alone, 3,000,000lb.

Letters from Orleans mention a fact demonstrative of the improvement in the cultivation since the cessation of public order. Wool of La Sologne, which a short time since could not find buyers at 50 centimes (5d.) a pound, is now in demand at 60 and 65 (6d. and 6½d.)

The gunpowder magazine of Le Bouchet, in the department of Seine-et-Oise (France), containing 3000lb. of fulminating cotton, lately received from Vincennes, was blown up on Monday last with a dreadful shock, which destroyed the building to the foundation. Four young men who were in the house perished.

The annual inspection of the Corps of the Yeomen of the Guard, in full uniform, under arms, took place on Tuesday, in St. James's Palace, by the Marquis of Donegal, Captain of the Corps. The other officers were also in attendance.

According to the returns published by the Moniteur, the number of wounded of June still remaining in the civil hospitals of Paris, in the evening of the 21st, was 797. Nine had died on that day.

The West India Mail Packet Company's intercolonial schooner Leo, was wrecked on a reef 60 miles to the northward of Belize, on the 10th ult. The crew reached Belize in an open boat.

The Scourge, with Mr. Mitchel on board, arrived at Bermuda on the 20th of June.

The total number of British vessels built and registered since the passing of the act 5 and 6 William IV., cap. 56, amounted, in 1837, to 26,027 (tonnage, 2,879,211); in 1838, to 26,509 (aggregate tonnage, 3,018,0.4); in 1839, 27,145 (tonnage, 3,219,680); in 1840, to 28,962 (tonnage, 3,472,499); in 1841, to 30,09? HILL COOLIES.

(FROM SKETCHES MADE IN DEMERARA.)

One of the most recent efforts made to substitute free for slave labour in the West Indies, it will be recollected, was the importation of a number of Hill Coolies from India for this purpose. The experiment has miserably failed, as acknowledged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on the introduction of the Sugar Duty Bill, now in progress through Parliament. The people themselves are curious specimens of the human family, as we are enabled to illustrate, by means of a set of characteristic sketches recently made by a Correspondent at Demerara, and who has favoured us with the loan of his portfolio of drawings, from which the accompanying six have been engraved, the several individuals having stood to the artist for their portraits.

The Coolies were removed to Demerara from Madras in ship-loads to supply the labour-market in British Guiana, at the expense of that colony; and, as our Correspondent learned, at a rate which reached even the Negro himself, against whom they came to compete. Many agents were employed in their recruitment, and large bounties were given; such temptations led parties to crowd the colony with numbers of miserable persons, quite unable to perform any laborious employment. It was the general opinion that, owing to physical inability, scarcely one in a hundred of these Coolies was fit for manual labour; and, whilst our Correspondent was at Demerara a law was issued by the Governor, granting permission for labourers to enter Guiana, from certain countries only, namely, the East Indies.

"The wretchedness of these immigrant Coolies was truly distressing: numbers of them might be seen wandering about, and living in the open air, on charity, in George Town, congregating about the market-house and elsewhere, many of them covered with sores, and all but naked. Hospitals were subsequently provided for them in different places, in which they were maintained at the public expense; and by this means they were removed from about the town and frontier of the colony.

First in our portraits is Mooto Sami, the interpreter, a high-caste man, and accordingly entitled to wear a turban. He was a shopkeeper in Madras, where he sold clothes, when he was induced to go to Demerara. He was an intelligent person, and lived as servant to the immigration agent; and he had with him his wife and child. "Seeing," says our Correspondent, "so many of these people wandering about the streets when I landed, I thought I would in charity take one to perform any light work (as I by signs (pointing to their mouth) they all wished to do something for their living. One, accordingly, jumped up into my gig, and I took him to Mooto Sami, the interpreter, to ascertain what the man could do, and what I should pay him for his labour. The assumption of the interpreter, who just before was all humility, was astounding. He folded his arms, and drawing himself up with great sangfroid, and coldly throwing out one leg, in an assumed tone of voice and pompous manner, began to interrogate my intended domestic, whom he soon ordered off as an idiot. I afterwards learned that many of these Coolies are notorious thieves."

In the accompanying Illustration we have Lutchmee, the wife of Mooto Sami. In the picture are shown the luxuriant plantain and tree-fern of the colony.

A couple of Low-Caste Coolies are next portrayed. The manner in which these poor fellows lived, bivouacking on a piece of waste ground in the centre of George Town, Demerara, is shown in the background of Mooto Sami's portrait. Here 30 or 40 Coolies might be seen squatting or lying in the broiling sun, all day, tormented with insects. This spot adjoins the market, whence the poor creatures collected offal, or vegetable stuff, wherewith to keep body and soul together. Some of these men have very fine features and figure, some of them standing six feet at least, but their ankles and feet are usually swollen from hard usage, as well as from the stings of mosquitoes, sand flies, and jiggers, all which insects inflict serious injury upon new comers. These Portraits are by no means caricatures: a piece of coarse cloth is commonly the only covering, many have only a piece tied between the legs, supported by string across the loins; and in this state, wearing a sort of hat ("shock ng hat"), they might be seen in scores about Demerara, attenuated to a degree never witnessed in a negro. It is said that the former living on rice, and the latter on coarse vegetables, is the reason of this great difference in their muscular and fleshy appearance. All Negroes, without exception, are fat; and no one would hire the poor skeleton Coolies. The building in the distance of this picture is the Barracks, at George Town.

A Coolie Woman of low caste, and a Gentleman's Servant of better caste, form the fourth group. There were few women among the Coolie immigrants; they had their feet and ankles much swollen by insect bites. In drinking, Coolie women do not allow the vessel to touch their lips: in short, all these people have peculiarities in eating, drinking, and living, which make it the more inconvenient to employ them. Accompanying the low-caste Coolie woman is a Gentleman's Servant, of better caste; he wears a long robe, lightly embroidered, and a sort of turban in lieu of a hood.

Our Correspondent writes, the Portuguese Madeira immigrants at Demerara, of whom there are a great number, are very fine men, highly prized by the planter: they are very industrious and saving, and sometimes deny themselves even the necessaries of life. But, much mortality has taken place among them.

It may be as well to add, that in India the Coolie is commonly a Porter or carrier. Mr. Shoolbred, in his very useful "Oriental Interpreter," just published, refers to the Coolies, in connexion with the Bheels, "a race of people who inhabit the northern part of the chain of Ghauts, forming what is called the coast of Malabar. On one side they are bordered by the Co[illegible] and on another by the Gounds of Gondwana. They are considered to be [illegible]een the aborigines of Central India, and, with the Coolies, Gounds, and Ramoosies, are bold, daring, and predatory marauders occasionally mercenaries, but invariably plunderers. There are, however, many shades of difference in the extent of the depredations of these several people, in which the balance of enormity is said to be considerably on the side of the Bheels. They are, nevertheless, described as faithful when employed and trusted, and the travellers who pay them their chout, or tribute, may leave untold treasure in their hands and may consider themselves as safe with them as in the streets of London. Their word is sacred, their promise unimpeachable."

IRELAND ISLAND, BERMUDA.—(FROM A SKETCH BY A CORRESPONDENT.)

THE NEW AMERICAN PACKET-SHIP "DEVONSHIRE."

THE NEW YORK AND LONDON PACKET-SHIP "DEVONSHIRE."

THIS magnificent new sailing-vessel has lately been built in New York, whither she was brought to this country, and lay for a short time moored in the London Docks, where she excited the unqualified admiration of all who inspected her.

The new vessel has been named in honour of the Duke of Devonshire; and, previous to the ship sailing for New York, a large party of visitors were entertained on board. Her burthen is 1300 tons; and all her appointments are of a very superior description.

A very fine tinted representation of the Devonshire, drawn and lithographed by Mr. T. G Dutton, has lately been published in illustration of the noble bearing of the Ship.

IRELAND ISLAND, BERMUDA.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent at Halifax with the accompanying sketch of Ireland Island, Bermuda, showing the different localities of the Convict Hulks, and the principal points of the Island. The hulk Dromedary, the last vessel on the right of the picture, is the locus in quo of John Mitchel, who arrived by the Scourge steamer upon the 20th of June; and when our Correspondent left was to be seen taking exercise upon the breakwater outside the hulks, in a smart costume, with his name and number (1922) in large characters upon his back.

In the Sketch, we commence with the hulk Tenedos; then the Naval Hospital, with the ship Weymouth beneath; next, is the stone quarry; and beneath it, the residence of the Rev. Mr. Campbell, dockyard chaplain; and to the right of it, the residence of Mr. Ballinghall, master attendant. Cockburn's Cut and Bridge are next seen; then the Batteries, Telegraph, Soldiers' Barracks, and Church; and beneath, the three hulks, Medway, Coromandel, and Dromedary: and, lastly, the new Victualling Stores, now building; and the Keep, or Commissioner's house.

Of the Bermudas we gave a brief historical and descriptive sketch in our last volume. Sir William Molesworth, in his speech in the House of Commons, on introducing his motion respecting the colonies, stated the garrison at the Bermudas to consist of about 1200 men, at a cost, exclusive of the expense for convicts, of about £30,000 a year.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER VI.—LONDON DOCKS, SAILORS, AND EMIGRANTS.

THERE are people still living who can remember when Blackwall Reach had for its land-marks grim gibbet-posts, on which the bodies of pirates bleached and blackened in the storm and sunshine, "making night hideous;" when the whole neighbourhood beyond the Tower, instead o being the home of mighty ships—that seem to sleep after their perilous voyages in the Docks—was a nest of ill-famed streets and dangerous alleys, unsafe even in the open noon of day, and at night trodden with dread by the peaceful passenger; when the Tower Hamlets disgorged their lawless inhabitants to witness an execution on Tower-hill, attack a press-gang, or rescue some sailor from the claws of justice, to be borne in triumph to the nearest tavern, and amid flip, fiddling, and dancing, bid defiance to every Charley that for a mile around drawled out the passing hours. In those days it was not uncommon for the drum to beat an alarm, and a troop or two of soldiers to turn out of the Tower, to quell the brawls which arose between the land-lubbers and the sons of the salt sea: nor were the military always successful in putting down these midnight riots; for whether Jack hunted a Jew, or unroofed a crimping-house, he would not give in (unless overpowered) until he had chased down the one and demolished the other.

Even now, after all the alterations and improvements which have been made, there are places in the neighbourhood of St. Katherine and the London Docks which present almost the same features as they did a century or two ago. No contrast can be greater than that between the West and the East end of London: the very houses, dresses, and language of the inhabitants are different; for in the latter their talk is "all of ships." Here at the shop-doors dangle oil-case nor'-westers, with long fan-tails behind, telling that, unlike the hats in Bond-street, these are made to keep a billow that breaks over the head out of the nape of the neck; while the rough pilot-coats, that hang like skins about the tent of a Russian bear-hunter, proclaim that they were never made to be worn in "a lady's chamber," but to be donned where the winds whistle, and the sea-gulls scream, and the big waves come roaring after each other like a thousand unchained hungry lions. There you see the gaudy handkerchief which Jack loves to leave a little out, that it may be seen from his blue jacket pocket; those slops, in the whiteness of which he prides himself; and the checked shirt, that he delights to throw open about his sun-browned throat, while he leaves the fringed corners of his black neckerchief to flutter like a pennon in the breeze. There is a forecastle smell about the streets, a mingle ment of junk and rum, tar and biscuit, casks, ropes, and tobacco, not unpleasant to one who is proud of the wave-washed island on which he was born.

But the grandeur of this locality is its magnificent Docks—watery squares surrounded with high-piled warehouses, and filled with gigantic shipping, the tall masts of which tower proudly above the loftiest houses. Here you see keels that have ploughed up the stormy Atlantic—sails hanging idly in the breeze that have been filled with the spicy sles of India—figures ahead that have looked down into icy seas, or bent listlessly where the waves of the warm Mediterranean roll, and the arch-backed dolphins tumble. It makes the heart of a true-born Englishman, although he is not worth a groat, beat high when he enters the gates that open upon such a scene of naval grandeur; and we forgive those old sea-kings, while we gaze around, who all but conquered our country, and blended their Danish with our Saxon blood. Warriors of old, who guided their snorting sea-horses along the road of the swans, and swept the stormy Baltic to stand face to face with Alfred the Great, and to be at last scattered like the ocean spray by the arm of the Island King. Peace to their manes! they were the first who taught our grey forefathers that England's wooden walls are its safest bulwarks.

Many a house had to be levelled with the earth, and many an old grave-yard to be dug up, before these mighty Docks could be made; even the ancient hospital, founded by Queen Matilda seven centuries ago, was demolished; and where oft the Sabbath bell had tolled, and the old Londoners paused to glance at the "narrow beds" where their fathers slept, or wore the stones hollow with their passing feet—all were doomed to be swept away, to make room for the "guardian giants that prowl around our coasts." From this, good came: living London had not room enough for her dead; and the green hills that look down upon her glory were then turned into sepulchres; rural cemeteries sprang up, and there her departed sons and daughters were borne; instead of pent-up city churchyards, our metropolis became surrounded with great Gardens of Graves, which look like rural resting-places. Over such, a poet might fancy, their peaceful spirits would linger, and look beyond, to where the vast city gradually grows in length and breadth, from year to year, until, as is not improbable, it may at last extend its foot to the edge of the open ocean.

St. Katherine's, and the two adjoining London Docks—which alone cover a space of more than one hundred acres—will contain six hundred ships, and near half a million tons of goods. In the West India Docks, which lie nearer Blackwall, merchandise valued at twenty millions of money has at one time been deposited on the wharfs, in the warehouses, and in the vaults below. The wealth of London lies not in her gaudy shops; beyond the Tower stand her great storehouses. A stranger who passes on the river, on his way to Greenwich or Gravesend, sees but little of these enormous treasuries—the tops of the tall masts alone point out their "whereabouts." These Docks are surrounded by high, strong-built walls—so lofty, that it would be a puzzle to a most expert thief to scale them, on account of the finish of the coping; and, if even this were accomplished, a greater difficulty would remain in getting over the bulky goods which are stored within. The walls which enclose the two London Docks were erected at a cost of sixty-five thousand pounds; and no less a sum than four millions was expended in completing this vast establishment. The East India Docks are at Blackwall, and our Engraving is a view of the old Mast House in the Export Dock—one of the most prominent objects in the landscape, when the eye is turned in that direction, either from the summit of One-tree-hill, in Greenwich Park, or as seen from the right of the Observatory.

It will be readily imagined that such improvements as these were not made without meeting with much opposition, for it is on record that the cargo of a large vessel often took up five or six weeks before it was delivered. For before the Docks were made, goods were put into lighters at Blackwall, and carried to the old-fashioned quays near London-bridge, and after a long delay, occasioned even by the Custom House authorities themselves, they were finally removed to the different warehouses in the city. In these good old times river robbery was a thriving trade; and we have more than rumour for asserting that many a fortune was made by this systematic plunder. No marvel that when the first inroad was made on these old vested rights, a clamour was raised by carmen, porters, lightermen, and all the shoal of water-side labourers, who benefited more or less by the very difficulties which attended the removal of merchandise, and that from Wapping to Westminster the whole aquatic populace raised their voices against the dock crusaders. Even the Trinity House itself murmured about an invasion of interests, and contended that the Royal Cloak of Charles would be ruined. City limits and city privileges were all in a-l to these sticklers for old rights; nor have matters altered much even up to the present day, when a proposed improvement in the sewerage of the city seems to create as much alarm as if all its charters and privileges were about to be undermined and swallowed up. All these claims and demands had to be bought up, and thousands were expended in silencing these clamours before the Docks were commenced; for there were legal quays beside the river, and moorages within, and landing-places that time out of mind had their little perquisites. And when all the Joneses, Smiths, and Tomkinses were satisfied, the mighty work began to proceed; and thus in time spread out and rose up these broad city basins and high-piled warehouses, which are the pride of England, and the envy of so many surrounding nations.

But it is not the removal and storing of merchandise, in which as many as five thousand men are sometimes employed, that alone engrosses the eye of the observant stranger when he visits the Docks. There are other scenes of painful or pleasurable interest which fall upon the eye and heart, according to the humour of the man. One of those it is our province to portray.

About a year ago we dined on board a large vessel in St. Katherine's Docks, which had been chartered to carry out emigrants to America. it was a few days before the ship was announced to sail. The owner was a worthy gentleman, the party who had hired the ship needy adventurers, whose reference had blended all inquiries, and who were only found out when interference was of no legal avail. For days "hired vessels [illegible]" at every wharf and public-house in the neighbourhood, and the [illegible] not so openly made as that of an [illegible] for "[illegible]" Parties [illegible] for a long voyage [illegible] whatever they could get, paying no regard as to whether or not they had stores to last the voyage, or would starve before they were half over the Atlantic. "It was a sorry sight," and the law had no power beyond that of making a few arrangements that would contribute to the comforts of the poor passengers.

We went down into the hold, which was fitted up with berths, such a name may be given to the tiers of unplaned deal boards, which resembled large hen-coops piled one above another; and stretched on mattresses upon these wooden partitions were many of the emigrants, waiting wearily for the appointed hour that was fixed for sailing. It made the heart sicken to picture that hold, when out at sea with the hatches battened down, and the vessel driving through a storm. There were then little children running about, and playing at hide-and-seek amongst the bales and casks—fine-haired, rosy-cheeked, pretty beauties, whose sun-burnt arms and necks told that they had had the run of the open village-green; and such we found had been the case when we enquired Both father and mother were fine specimens of our English peasantry the grandfather and grandmother also there. They had fixed up the very clock in the hold, which had for years ticked in the old familiar cottage, and brought a few choice flowers in pots which they hoped to plant about their new home in a foreign land. An antique oak table, that had been in the family for many generations, was also doomed to bear them company for long years to come. The old grandfather, whose countenance would have enraptured an artist, sat in a deep Rembrandt-like shadow at one corner of the hold, with the family bible opened on his knee. They appeared to be well provided for the voyage, and were full of "heart and hope."

Another corner was occupied by a wretched looking Irish family. An excepting the old countryman and his family seemed to regard this miserable group with an eye of suspicion more than of pity, for it was whispered that a few biscuits and a little oatmeal was all the provision they had made for the voyage. They were capable, however, of having had some experience, considered that they were amply provided, and he had made the strictest inquiry. A bag of coarse bread, which had been cut into slices and then browned in the oven, had that morning, he said, been set on board to assist them—it was the gift of a few poor Irish people who lived in the borough of Southwark. This bread, he said, with little suet, made excellent puddings; and he promised that Pat should not lack the latter ingredient. It appeared that there were many little things which a willing hand might do on board a ship, and, as he said, "We never yet allowed one to starve; but this is a queer lot." If we remember rightly, the number of passengers were not sufficient to call for the interference of the Emigration Commissioners. The ship had been chartered to carry a cargo, a part of which, from some cause or other, was withheld, so the speculators endeavoured to make up the loss by passengers. Our attention was too much engrossed in conversation with those who were about to quit their native country, it might be, for ever, to enter fully into these legal matters, although we believe the number at last became sufficient to call for this interference.

To our feelings there was something very revolting in married and single, young and old, being thus placed together in the hold of a ship, which was never intended for the accommodation of passengers; and we think that Government might be worse employed than in applying a remedy to these evils. We know that many who leave our shores with refined and delicate feelings, who, however humble may be their station in life, are gifted with that innate feeling of modesty which in no country has a more natural growth than in our own—that many such are doomed to quit England, and, through circumstances over which they have no control, find great losers in these never-to-be-recovered gifts.

A voyage to America in the hold of a vessel, fitted up temporarily as we have described, is a scene not likely to fall under the eye of a popular author; it can only be sketched by getting the information from some poor unfortunate fellow who has been bumped and thumped against those huge beams which run inside the berths, and rolled about like a barrel, and has been lucky enough to outlive all such pitching and tossing. A state cabin, in the roughest gale, must be a palace compared with such a place in a moderate calm. And a common steerage, rendered as comfortable as circumstances will permit, a perfect Elysium. Picture those who have never in all their lives encountered a stronger gale than needed a safe hand to keep on the hat, turning all sorts of imaginable somersaults—and who never heard any noise louder over their heads than what some relative fell down drunk upon the chamber floor at a feast-time, first listening to the tramp, and thunder, and hurly-burly on deck, when the ship is struck by a heavy sea, and every timber groans again in its deep agony. No regular steward to assist—no steward to attend—both morning to bed—child squalling against child—one praying here, another cursing there—the hold all but dark, and, where a glimmering of light is seen, the sea rushing in like a cataract—and, over all, the wind howling like a raging demon, and every wave knocking at the ship's side, and demanding admittance; and, if such is only a picture of certain nameless place upon earth, it would convey no bad idea of one upon the sea.

And those dear children nestled together, with their little arms encircling one another in the cheerless berths—their mother incapable of comforting them! It gave one the heartache to think of what they were destined to endure. We pictured them in their restless slumber, murmuring like bees—dreaming of their cottage, then far away—or, dizzy with the rocking of the ship, recalling the swing which hung between the apple-trees in the garden, and unconscious of the danger with which they were surrounded. Then we remembered Him who "tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb"—

> Who moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform;
> Who plants his footsteps on the sea,
> And rides upon the storm.

Wearily over the wilderness of waters would they journey onward. Like birds with ruffled plumage, that feel themselves strangers when they have alighted upon a new land, the wild waste beside the ocean-shore where they landed would at first be trod with an aching heart; there would not be one old familiar object to comfort them. The Indian who carries the bones of his relatives to the far forest which he is driven into, and there erects a new hut, leaves scarcely an object of regret behind, for his hopes are anchored upon his great hunting-ground beyond the grave. One who has been taken higher and purer realms in the dreams of all [illegible]eafter, is chained to earth by greater regrets. The very tree in the centre of the village-green wears a new charm when seen through the "mind's eye" from a far distance, and the humblest objects become more endeared to us when they are no longer within our grasp. Brighter and broader landscapes may burst upon the view in a new world beyond the ocean; but never shall we again find those familiar features in the scene which we have left behind. oft

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY, July 30.—Sixth Sunday after Trinity. New Moon at 7h. 29m. A.M.
MONDAY, 31. Sun due East at 7h. 6m.
TUESDAY, August 1. Lammas Day. The Moon and Mars are near together.
WEDNESDAY, 2.—Mercury rises at 3h. 11m. in the morning, near the E.N.E. point of the horizon.
THURSDAY, 3. Venus sets at 7h. 55m. P.M.
FRIDAY, 4. Jupiter rises at 3h. 40m. in the morning.
SATURDAY, 5. The Sun rises at 4h. 32m., and sets at 7h. 39m.

For the situation of the planets in our Almanack of this year, the particulars with respect to Jupiter in the month of July were mentioned. Since then he [illegible]—Jupiter will be in the constellation Cancer throughout the month. He is visible a short time before the sun rises in the E.N.E. He rises, on August 1st, at 3h. 51m. A.M.; on the 16th, at 3h. 14m. A.M.; and on the 31st, at 2h. 37m. A.M.: on the 15th, he souths at 11h. 0m. A.M.; and sets at about 6h. 7 P.M. His motion among the stars is eastward. He is near the moon on the 25th. During the morning of the 15th and 16th he is very near Mercury; his path, and that of Mercury, is engraved in the Almanack, from which their positions with respect to the neighbouring stars may be immediately seen on any day in the month. The particulars with respect to Saturn will be given next week.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1848.

THE subjects of Emigration and Colonisation, and incidentally the management of the Colonial Office generally, were brought under the notice of the House of Commons on Tuesday night, by Sir William Molesworth. The speech of the honourable baronet is allowed, on all hands, to have been one of the most brilliant and useful made during the present session. The questions upon which he touched are among the most interesting and important that can be raised in the present circumstances of this country and of the world, as we endeavoured to show in our publication of last week; and Sir William Molesworth, by devoting his energies, time, and talents to the mastery of the matter in all its details, has rendered a public service of no small magnitude. The terms of Sir William's motion merely went to affirm the opinion of the House, "that the colonial expenditure of the British empire demands inquiry, with a view to its reduction; and that, to accomplish this object, and to secure greater contentment and prosperity to the colonists, they ought to be invested with larger powers for the administration of their local affairs." But the details which it was necessary to give in support of the proposition opened up far wider and more important subjects of inquiry than the theoretical advantages of self-government. Emigration, by the voluntary expatriation of labourers and small capitalists, had steadily increased from year to year during the last twenty years. The number of emigrants, principally to Canada, the United States, and Australia, amounted, in the year 1832, to upwards of 60,000 souls; in 1837 the numbers were 66,000; in 1840, they were 86,000; and, in 1847, they were 121,000. Still our colonies suffered for want of labour; and the United States of America received a large proportion of those available hands, which, if they had been turned towards Canada or Australia, would have greatly increased the prosperity of these colonies. Sir William Molesworth drew the conclusion from the valuable facts that he brought before the notice of this country, that free trade and emigration ought to be the sole objects held in view in reference to the colonies, in concurrence with maintaining the sovereignty of Great Britain over them; and urged upon the Government the folly of spending £4,000,000 annually upon naval and military establishments to defend these scantily-peopled countries, while, at an expenditure of half the amount, applied to the purposes of systematic colonisation, we could enable the colonies to defend themselves by the strong arms of wealth-producing labourers. Emigrants could be conveyed to the Cape of Good Hope, for instance, at an expense of £10 per head, whilst every soldier we kept there cost this country £60 per annum; so that if the money thus spent upon the 1500 unproductive soldiers we maintained there were spent in emigration, we could send 9000 men every year to the population of the colony, every one of whom, instead of an unproductive soldier, would be a productive tiller of the ground, and better able to defend the territory, in case of need, than the number of soldiers by whom they were now displaced. At this late period of the session there is little or no prospect of any tangible result from the motion of Sir William Molesworth; but, as the discussion upon it has been adjourned for a fortnight, we may indulge the hope that the debates which have already taken place upon it, and those which will ensue when it again comes before the House, will be the means of awakening an interest in, and spreading abroad a knowledge of the subject, that will be extensively and permanently useful at a future time.

THE most important foreign news of the week is the invasion of Sicily by the King of Naples. The Sicilians having chosen a Constitution for themselves in defiance of the power of the King of Naples, have gone a step further, and chosen a King in the person of the Duke of Genoa, the second son of Charles Albert, King of Sardinia. The Prince has accepted the honour, though he has not yet made his appearance in Sicily; and the King of Naples, having put down insurrection in his own capital by the aid of the lazzaroni and the eight Louis's that he imported for that purpose, has turned his energies towards the reconquest of the most lovely but most dissatisfied portion of his old dominions. All the steam-frigates and gunboats in the bay and harbour of Naples have been ordered to form part of the invading expedition; and all the commercial steam-boats, as well as every description of vessel fit to bear arms and troops, have been pressed for the same purpose. A forced loan upon all residents in Naples—British and others foreigners, as well as natives—had been levied to pay the cost of the expedition. On their side, the Sicilians are well prepared. They knew the risks they ran in throwing off the allegiance of the King of Naples; and it is not improbable that this war may lead, not to the re-conquest of Sicily by Naples, but to the conquest of Naples by Sicily. The finances of Naples are not in a good state for war. There is already a deficit of ten millions of ducats, as reported by a commission of enquiry that met on the 15th inst. The British merchants have paid their money under protest, and it will probably be restored to them, as it has been levied not only in defiance of international justice, but of the stipulation of a treaty between the two countries. Civil and foreign warfare and domestic dissension are thus paramount in every part of Italy. The Pope is losing popularity, and the King of Sardinia is gaining it; and France and England look on uncertain of, but deeply interested in the result, whether as affecting one or all of the kingdoms of the peninsula.

POPULATION AND TAXATION IN THE CITY AND METROPOLITAN BOROUGHS.—The population of the City of London in 1841, exclusive of the inmates of all public institutions, barracks, &c., was 126,702; the assessed taxes paid in the year 1847 amounted to £88,2.0 17s. 4d. In the City of Westminster the population was 215,801; assessed taxes paid, £178,124 6s 7d. Finsbury population, 265,043; assessed taxes, £108,569 10s. 2d. Lambeth population, 167,413; assessed taxes, £54,459 7s 5d. Marylebone population 2[illegible],6[illegible]; assessed taxes, £200,503 1s. 9d. Tower Hamlets population, 365,738; assessed taxes, £82,464 4s. 6d. Tower Hamlets population, 415,730; assessed taxes, £[illegible] 10s. 10d. INDIA AND CHINA.—Letters from the frontiers of Poland announce that important events have taken place in the Caucasus. A vague rumour of the commotions which have shaken the north and centre of Europe had reached the mountains; the Tcherkesses reported that France and England had declared war on the Czar, who would no longer be able to send troops to the Caucasus. Schamil and his followers availed themselves of this opportunity to strike a vigorous blow at the Russians. The hostilities commenced simultaneously on the Kuban, the Terek, the Sadsen, and Salak. The forts which had remained neutral sided with Schamil. These reinforcements enabled him to take possession of three or four forts. He attacked Kislliar and Mastoeq, two cities of more than 5000 inhabitants each. Prince Woronsow repaired with great speed to the theatre of the war, where he has mustered a considerable force. The cholera has broken out once more in the army.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH. Mr. MACKINNON asked the Government if it had any power to prevent the dissemination of false intelligence by the electric telegraph?—Sir G. GREY said that no power existed to prevent the spread of false rumours either by the electric telegraph or any other means. He would take that opportunity of informing the House that the party who had delivered the packages containing the false information published on Thursday, to the respectable news agents of the morning papers, who were in no degree implicated in the fraud, had been identified, and that he was prepared to identify in turn the party from whom he had received the packages. Search was at present being made for the guilty party, who would probably be soon detected. By the Electric Telegraph Company's Act, the Government had the power, under certain circumstances, of taking possession of their telegraph, for not less than a week—a power which had been exercised on a recent occasion, and which it was obvious should only be exercised on the instant, when circumstances justified it

THE YEOMANRY OF IRELAND.—Mr. A. BROOKE inquired if it was the intention of the Government, in the case of the insurrection taking place in Ireland, to call out the yeomanry of the south?—Lord J. RUSSELL said that the calling out of the yeomanry was a matter which, after frequent and mature deliberations, he thought would be best left to the judgment and discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. It was unnecessary for him to say that the Government had the fullest confidence in the zeal and loyalty of the yeomanry, and if it had hitherto refrained from calling them out, it was not from any doubt of their courage and fidelity.

On the motion for going into Committee of Supply, Mr. S. CRAWFORD moved the following resolution, which he supported by an able speech, on the condition of Ireland:—"That the present distracted state of Ireland demands the instant attention of Parliament, with a view to the speedy enactment of such measures as may be necessary, to improve the condition, redress the grievances, and establish the just rights of the Irish people, and thereby promote the good order and prosperity of that portion of the United Kingdom, and give increased security to her Majesty's Crown and Government."

A lengthened debate ensued, in the course of which Lord J. RUSSELL opposed the motion as unpracticable; and Mr S OSBORNE delivered a most able speech, in which he contrasted the promises of the members of the present Cabinet when out of office with their deeds when in office; and suggested various measures, such as the re-adjustment of the Irish church establishment, the reclamation of waste lands, an extensive system of colonization, periodical parliaments in Dublin, and annual visits of the Sovereign to Ireland, as a remedy for the social and political evils under which Ireland confessedly suffered

Mr. ANSTEY followed, and succeeded, as usual with the hon. member, in nearly clearing the benches

On the motion of Mr. MORGAN J. O'CONNELL, the debate was adjourned

IRELAND.

THE alarm created in town on Thursday, by the fabricated news of insurrection in the south, sent from Liverpool, has fortunately turned out to be groundless.

Up to the latest advices received last night (Friday), no outbreak had taken place; though the aspect of affairs is most menacing.

From all we learn this day, up to a late hour last night, that city was tranquil, but the provinces were represented as being in an alarming state.

None of the leaders had been apprehended. Mr. O'Brien was in Tipperary at the head of 10,000 armed insurgents. A large force of military and police had been sent to arrest him.

A conspiracy had been detected in Dublin, which had for its object the assassination of policemen and sentries on duty. Eight of the conspirators were apprehended.

On Thursday, Patrick O'Higgins, a chartist, was arrested, and committed on a charge of treason, and sent to Kilmainham gaol. On his premises were found 1500 pikes, and a voluminous correspondence with the English chartists.

A proclamation, suppressing the clubs, was issued by the Lord Lieutenant in Wednesday.

The following are extracts from the Dublin evening papers of Thursday, transmitted by the Electric Telegraph Company:—

"CORK, Thursday, 5 minutes past 12 A.M.

"All is uproar. The entire of the 36th and 70th Regiments, with the 12th Lancers, are drawn up on the Parade, accoutred and ready for action. No one except the authorities know the cause."

"CASHEL, Wednesday evening

"The whole of the soldiers are under arms. The police, drafted in from all the small stations, and concentrated in Cashel, will remain under arms until six o'clock to-morrow (Thursday) morning.

"Messrs. Smith O'Brien, Meagher, and Doheny are reported to be in the neighbourhood of Fethard, Tipperary.

"Smith O'Brien arrived at the village of Mullinahone (five miles from Callan), county of Kilkenny, from Fethard, county Tipperary, on Tuesday evening. He was refused accommodation at the small inn, but subsequently obtained it at Mr. Wright's, a proctor.

"The greatest excitement prevails throughout the district.

"The 85th Regiment and one of Cavalry are under arms and ready for transmission by railway, in the event of any unfavourable accounts from the south arriving by the late trains."

IT is stated on high authority that Chevalier Bunsen, who left London two days since, had been recalled to Berlin by the King of Prussia to occupy the important post now vacant in the Prussian Cabinet. It is also stated that Lord Palmerston has decided upon sending an English Ambassador to Frankfort (Lord Cowley is spoken of), whose office it will be to confer with the Danish negotiator, and to recommend energetically a settlement of that question. He will be seconded in this by M. Bunsen, one of the negotiators of the late armistice. M. Bunsen is replaced here by the Secretary of Legation, Prince Lowenstein.—Chronicle.

DREADFUL FIRE.—TWO FIREMEN KILLED.—Yesterday (Friday) morning, about half-past four, a most disastrous fire broke out in the extensive biscuit factory of Messrs. Lewis, and Westropp, New House, High-street, Wapping Three after floor were soon in flames, and when the whole building was in one burning mass, the roof fell in with a fearful crash, burying two firemen, named Pearcy and Hancock, in the ruins. Mackay, the engineer, was also much injured

IRELAND.

INSURRECTION IN THE SOUTH.

Advices of the most alarming kind reached town from Ireland on Thursday afternoon. According to these, Smith O'Brien had left Dublin for the south, where the outbreak was expected to commence. The Clubs have declared that they are determined to adhere to the policy of resistance to the death of all or any attempt that may be made to arrest the leaders; and, therefore, they say, they await passively the striking of the "first blow" by the Government

The course of action recommended by the "Provisional Government" is said to be this—that the heads of the Executive should fall back upon the strongholds of the Clubs in the provinces, and, safely intrenching themselves under cover there, defy the Government to proceed to extremities, thus throwing upon the latter the onus of commencing the insurrection. In pursuance of this view, Mr. O'Brien retreated to Wexford, Mr. Meagher to Waterford, Mr. O'Gorman, Junior, to Limerick, and Michael Doheny to Cashel or Clonmel. Mr Darcy Magee, another prominent member of the Executive, remaining the list of the missing at head-quarters, but his destination was unknown. Some of the inferior leaders were also in eclipse, in anticipation of the arrival on Tuesday evening of the Act empowering Lord Clarendon to deal in a summary manner shod with all persons "suspected" of treasonable designs against her Majesty's person or Government

A new Religious publication, entitled the Newgate Calendar, to be conducted under the auspices of the editors of the Irish Tribune, two of whom are now lying in gaol on a charge of treason and felony, was to have made its appearance on Tuesday. It has, however, been deemed advisable to postpone the publication since.

An address of Mr. John O'Connell to the people, denouncing the Clubs and the League, and describing the latter as "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare," is producing some beneficial effect amongst those Repealers who have not entirely committed themselves with the treasonable confederacy. The Downey Post says:—"We are assured that in one district of the county of Dublin, and we believe it is the case in many, that persons who had joined clubs, under the notion that they were only forwarding Repeal, have now come to the determination to break up and to surrender their arms."

On Sunday evening, Smith O'Brien and Thomas Francis Meagher reached Carrick-on-Suir at half-past five in the evening from Kilkenny; at their entrance Carrick, they addressed thousands, and told them for the present not to interfere with the police or soldiery, as they should perform their duties, but when the word should be given, not to spare any who opposed them.

Monday being fair day at Carrick, the town was filled with country-people, and Messrs Meagher and O'Brien addressed the people in a more violent and determined strain than heretofore, stating their determination not to be governed under the provisions of the new act. Both gentlemen were armed with pistols, which they are determined to use in the event of an attempt being made to capture them; they stated that by the evening from Kilkenny all their friends in the people's cause, and would hazard their lives for their service, and would now [illegible] A number of Waterford men [illegible] Meagher to come to Waterford, and that his fellow-citizens would protect him from arrest; but Mr. Smith O'Brien would not listen to that proposal, and brought off Mr. Meagher to Cashel, or, as others said, to Tipperary. Whilst this scene was enacting, 200 of the 3rd Buffs marched in from the camp at Beshorough and took up their position in the barracks. Few of either party slept during the night; the Young Irelanders, however, did not do anything to disturb the peace of the town, but business is totally at a stand-still, and all in and about the town are resting on their arms, waiting for the battle hour. In Waterford the Clubs are described as being well organised, and armed, and ready to act when called upon. The people seemed reckless from poverty; groups of working men might be seen in the streets the day and night, discussing politics and rumours the news of the hour. The Queen's forces in Waterford were about 1000 strong. The Shakemaulus steam-vessel was in the river, and it was proposed to form two camps on the hills which surround the town. In the country the peasants were arming; at Coolnamuck so much timber had been cut down for pike-handles, that the Clubs would not allow any more to be taken therein in compassion to the proprietor. At Mount Bolton the peasantry had even cut down the trees for the people, to prevent further waste; at Lord Waterford's demesne more ash trees had been cut down, and the useless parts left behind. All the anvils in the country were busy with pike-forging, and crowbars put in order and made sharp.

On Wednesday morning, in Dublin, a policeman who attempted to arrest three of the club men, who were armed, was stabbed in several places, and now lies dangerously wounded at Mercer's Hospital. The brave fellow never let go his grasp of two of the fellows, and they and a third are in custody, and will, no doubt, be indicted capitally at the next commission. The unfortunate constable (Byrne) at first, was considered a mortal wound, but now, though far more than fair hopes prove, but fever having set in, it was deemed advisable for him to make a declaration, and the magistrate on Thursday repaired to the hospital for that purpose. The telegraphic despatch which reached town on Thursday afternoon relative to the outbreak was as follows*.

"The whole of the south of Ireland is in rebellion.

"The station at Thurles is on fire, the rails for several miles torn up, and the mob intend detaining the engines as they arrive.

"At Clonmel the fighting is dreadful. The people arrived in masses. The Dublin club leaders are there. The troops were speedily overpowered; many refused to act

"The military at Carrick have shown disaffection, and have been driven back, and their arms abstracted.

"At Kilkenny the contest is proceeding, and here the mob are also said to be successful

"No news from Waterford or Cork."

* This news is very doubtful. We direct attention to the Ministerial statement on the subject in our Parliamentary report of Thursday)

CHILD FOUND IN A BAND-BOX.—About 12 o'clock on Monday night, as the watchman of the Joint Station, London-bridge, was going his rounds, and when passing by the Lost Property Office, he fancied he heard a child cry, which induced him to make a search, but not hearing the voice again, and seeing nothing suspicious, he was about leaving the office, when he heard another faint cry, evidently proceeding from a band-box, tied with tape, and addressed to a parcel at Croydon, which, upon examination, was found to contain a fine male child of some eight or ten days old, fast asleep It was immediately conveyed to Guy's Hospital, where some food was administered, and the child seems none the worse for its long journey (supposed from Dover)

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

On Saturday and Tuesday Verdi's "Nino" was performed, Mdlle. Cruvelli succeeding Mdlle. Abbadia in the character of Abigaile. Mdlle. Cruvelli sang and acted with great spirit, and was altogether the best representative of the part who has yet been heard in this country. Bellotti's Orontapo proves the advantage of a few acute artists filling secondary parts. He gave point, energy and importance. The great treat, however, in "Nino" is the splendid assumption of the warrior by Coletti. His Nino ranks with his Don Pasqual in excellence. He invests Nino with grandeur, and he develops the tragic situations with surpassing skill and power. Nothing could be finer than his fierce menaces against the conquered city, when he enters in triumph; and in the scene where Nino is struck with lightning, and he becomes a maniac, he produced a great sensation. His pathetic appeals to Abigaile to spare his daughter's life also affected the auditory. His singing is most impressive, not only in the airs but in the delivery of the recitatives. The "Chorus of Captives" in this opera is a touching composition, which always creates a great effect.

On Thursday, for the extra night, Mdlle. Lind repeated her exquisite performance of Lucia.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" was repeated on Saturday and Tuesday; and great as was the sensation created on its first representation on the command night on Thursday week, it has increased tenfold on every performance. For years there has been no lyric work produced on Italian stage which seems more thoroughly to rouse the sympathies of an audience and to command their fixed attention. Although the opera lasts nearly four hours, the amateurs remain to hear the last notes, spell-bound by the dramatic interest of the story, by the exquisite beauty of the music, and by the powerful execution of singers and instrumentalists. The Duchess of Kent, who was present on Thursday week, and the Queen, on Saturday, the Duchess of Cambridge, with the Princess Mary, besides a long list of fashion, also occupied boxes. We never recollect to have witnessed a greater manifestation of delight, and we have heard the acclamations at these nights of the "Huguenots." The mise en scene is indeed a study of itself; rarely have more pictorial and dioramic beauties been displayed. We have been much struck with one scene of the Huguenot chorus. We had imagined that it would have found favour with the audiences only after repeated hearings, as is generally the case with all masterpieces, such as the "Don Giovanni," "Guillaume Tell," "Semiramide," "Il Barbiere," &c.; but, on the contrary, our English public has seized upon and appreciated the beauties of the work at once. In the first act Alboni's two airs are rapturously applauded; the first, an andantino in romance-like form, with a charming cadenza; the second a florid and sprightly cavatina in A flat, which is slightly encored with fervour. Mario has in this act an elegant romance, with an accompaniment on the alto, exquisitely executed by Mr. Hill, and a delicious duet with Mdlle. Castellan The latter has a brilliant scena, opening with an andante, interrupted by a captivating trio for three soprani, sung by Mdme. Castellan, Mdme. Bellini, and Mdlle. Alboni, and winding up with a sparkling cabaletta. Mario in the first act has the celebrated Huguenot chant, and the martial song. "Piff, Paff," nightly encored, with its accurate accompaniment of piccolo, ophicleide, and drum. In addition to these pieces there is the chorus of reproaches and the oath of reconciliation, with its difficult unaccompanied quatuor, sung by Tamburini, Castellan, Mario, and Marini.

The music in the second act increases in interest. There is the fiery "Ratalplan" conplets, sung by Lavia, and the Chorus of Huguenots, nightly encored; the Litany of the female Catholic devotees, admirably chanted; and the interweaving of the themes of these two pieces. Then there is the characteristic Bohemian dance; the peculiar cry of the "Couvre feu," or proclamation of the curfew, by the Head of the Night Watch; and after this, a most powerful duo between Viardot and Mario, in which Marcel is warmly encored. The quartet, in peril from assassins. This duetto always creates an immense sensation, so finely is it executed. The septuor of the duel, for four basses (Tamburini, Marini, Rache, and Polonini) and three tenors (Mario, Hill, and Gardoni), brings down thunders of applause, and on Tuesday narrowly escaped an encore. Nothing could be more beautiful than Mario's head notes at the end of the septuor: he ascended to C natural with wonderful effect. The finale of this act—the ritual procession by torchlight, with military band, and the disputes between the Catholics and Huguenots—was surpassingly grand and impressive.

The third act (in the original opera this is the fourth) in all hands is admitted to be the most sublime inspiration of the composer. Opening with a plaintive romance by Viardot, depicting Valentine's sorrows in her union with Raoul whilst her heart is beyond De Nevers, it is followed by a concerted piece of colossal proportions, in which St. Bris arranges the plan for the massacre of the Protestants on the Eve of St. Bartholomew. The repudiation of the horrible means of assassination by Tagliafico, as Nevers, was emphatically declaimed; the horror of Valentine [illegible] by Viardot; but when the three men entered to [illegible] the effect was electrical. [illegible] the [illegible] of the muffled drums at the end, the tremendous outbreak fortissimo followed by the whisper of the multitude of fanatics pretending to kill all delighted. The encore for this piece was overwhelming; and yet after this came the duo between Viardot and Mario, in which Valentine vainly strives to restrain Raoul from proceeding to the scene of slaughter. This long, delicate, and trying duo, so replete with dramatic intensity, is distinguished as much by its melodious instrumentation as by its extraordinary orchestral treatment. It is full of breaks and episodes, descriptive of the varying passions of the characters—now all passionate love, and then pathetic supplication, and finally dead despair. The acting and singing of Viardot and Mario are beyond all praise; it was the triumph of vocal and histrionic excellence. One marvellous scale of nearly three octaves achieved by Viardot was cheered immensely; and one passionate phrase of Mario producing equal delight, at the fall of the curtain on the third act they were called for again and again.

In the fourth and last act, the minuet in the beautiful ball-room, with the tolling of the bells of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, announcing the commencement of the massacre, and the appalling scenes which follow, but the last duo, in which Valentine and Raoul, after the death of Nevers, are united by Marcel, only to meet their fate at the hands of the fanatic Catholics, was the climax of the exceptional musical productions throughout this performance.

The characteristics of Meyerbeer's work are great dramatic effect, its massive choral proportions, and melodious inspiration. The constant recurrence of the Lutheran Hymn of Marcel is cleverly contrived, and keeps the story perpetually in the memory. The character of this stern devoted Huguenot is finely conceived, and its attributes were never better developed than by Marini, who has gained great glory by his delineation. His making-up is alone a picture. The character of Valentine highly interests and commands the sympathies of the audience; indeed the love story, in the midst of this historical event, is carried on with the greatest skill by Scribe. The emotions produced by this opera—the breathless excitement with which it is listened to—are evidences how Meyerbeer has succeeded in depicting the terrible situation of the drama.

In our last publication we stated that the compliment of an ovation ought to have been paid to Costa as well as to the singers. We were in error—the compliment was so paid after we had left the theatre. He was called for twice, and never did conductor deserve more richly such a distinction. His overture of this opera was an astounding evidence of musical skill. We are proud of the result, for although the principal singers are foreigners, the band and chorus, with but few exceptions, are English, and we regard the result, therefore, as a national triumph

On Thursday night, for the benefit of Madame Grisi, the opera of "Norma," and the last act of "La Favorita," were given. Mdlle Alboni singing "Non mi mesta," from "Cenerentola," twice, between the two operas. The house was crowded in every part. The Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary occupied her Majesty's box, and there was a very fashionable assemblage in the other boxes and stalls. Grisi was received with more than ordinary fervour; she was recalled seven times before the curtain, amidst a plentiful shower of wreaths, garlands, bouquets, &c.; and numerous other demonstrations was a piece of costly jewellery, thrown from the grand tier, at the end of the first act of "Norma," the brilliancy of which was displayed by her wearing it in the second act. It was a superb cross of brilliants and other precious stones. The Diva was in splendid voice, and acted and sang with wonderful energy

MARYLEBONE.

The revival of Mr. Buckstone's effective drama, "The Dream at Sea," has been most fortunate, the houses having been exceedingly good This piece realises considerably more than half our notion of what a melodrama should be, for it possesses well defined and distinct characters, rapid action, and a series of strong and startling situations. The unfulfilled portion of our conception is in the dialogue, which is neither so natural nor so nervous as is requisite for this class of drama

The part of Bobby Nutts was originally written for Mrs. Keeley, but circumstances occasioning her secession from the theatre, it was given to Mrs. Nisbett Mrs. Keeley has now undertaken it, and avails herself of it to produce one of her richest exhibitions of mingled earnestness, archness, and affection. Mr Keeley's "quaint drollery" is a stereotype phrase, but we do not know how we can amend it, except by adding that his artistic expression of piteous disgust at the cowskin waistcoat legacy raised his character of Tommy Tinkle far above the conventionality of mere comic business. Mr. Howe's Lance Sycamore is manly and vigorous; and Miss Fanny Vining made, alternately, a gentle and an effective Ann Pretension. The piece is beautifully put upon the stage, the scenery being really very fine; and necessary appeals to have been spared in other respects.

DRURY-LANE is advertised to open for one night, on the 31st, with Lord John Russell's tragedy of "Don Carlos," which did not prove very attractive at the Surrey. There is still talk in the theatrical circles of Mr. Macready becoming the lessee in October

The LYCEUM closes this evening; but there will be an extra night on Monday for the benefit of Madame Vestris and Mr Charles Mathews

The project of erecting a theatre on the unoccupied piece of ground on the eastern side of Leicester-square, is said to be again in agitation. The style of entertainment will be limited to melodrama and spectacle, and a series of new plans and designs have been prepared; but the names of the chief parties are at present withheld.

EMIGRATION FIELD, PORT LINCOLN, IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

This is one of the most beautifully situated settlements in South Australia. The harbour is formed by Boston Bay; the country is very picturesque, the hills around are clothed with casuarina, and fine sheep-runs occur in the vicinity; the houses are mostly built along the sand, near the water's edge. Mr. G. F. Angas, in his account of the settlement in 1846, describes it as deserted by the settlers, who had left for Adelaide. "Perhaps," he adds, "about thirty families compose the entire population of this little settlement, which is almost shut out from the world; their only communication with the more settled and flourishing portions of the colony being by means of two small cutters that trade to Adelaide by the latter inform me that for ten weeks no vessel had entered the harbour. The remote position of the district, and the outrages committed by the natives upon the earlier settlers, are among the causes of the decline of this otherwise favourable locality. Yet, as South Australia continues to progress so rapidly, I doubt not but that in a few years, Port Lincoln, with its magnificent harbour, will become a place of importance and resort."

Mr. Angas's anticipations already appear in progress of realisation Mr. B. Wilkinson's volume,* which contains some of the most recent information respecting the colony, has the following gratifying passage:—

"There are plenty of runs suitable for farmers and their flocks, there can be little doubt, if we only judge of the tract that was known a couple of years ago; but since that time the discoveries are great, and tracts of land have been uncovered by adventurous explorers that would more than equal in value any country at present inhabited by the South Australian colonists. Around Port Lincoln some fine land has lately been found, and this at comparatively a short distance from Adelaide, if separated by water. The explorer in this case was Dr. Gemmel, in company with some friends; and they came across a vast extent of grazing country, before unknown to parties located in the district. It is situated about seven days' journey, or one hundred and fifty miles, towards the interior, on the route to Streaky Bay: and, from information from parties who have since travelled further over it, the prospects it holds out are very favourable. A quantity of land suitable for agriculture is also reported to exist around Port Lincoln, and there would be little difficulty in obtaining runs in that part for small flocks. The large sheep proprietors must always require comparatively large tracts of country before they have their flocks feeding over from twenty to thirty square miles of good land; but whoever owns not more than two flocks, or from 1200 to 1400 sheep, only wants two square miles to feed them on, which may easily be had in any great distance from the settled districts. A large pastoral country was lately found at Rivoli Bay, whither many thousand sheep have already gone. This is situated about two hundred miles to the south-east of Adelaide, and in the Australian Company's one hundred and 90,000 sheep to that part, and many of the large stock-owners followed their example; at present, I should say, not less than 100,000 are depastured where, only two years and a half since, the country was perfectly unknown.

We learn, too, from the map appended to this volume, that not far from Port Lincoln copper is reported to have been found.

Mr. Wilkinson's manual is, for the most part, the result of seven years' personal observation, and contains, from this source, detailed statements on the Prospects of the Labourer and Farmer, on Agricultural Stock Farming, Building, Gardening, Manufacturing in various branches, fast, not least, on Mining and Mineral Productions, in what the author terms "this flourishing colony." The appearance of a volume of such closely-packed information at this work presents, is remarkably opportune at the present moment, when emigration and colonisation are apparently about to receive that share of public attention which their importance demands.

THE STATE BOX AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On the occasion of her Majesty's state visit to the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-Garden, on the 20th instant, the arrangements for the Royal accommodation were of a novel kind. The ordinary Box occupied by the Queen is in the grand tier, being the third double box from the stage. The Box is of considerable dimensions, and behind is a richly-furnished suite of rooms; but, although this locality would have enabled the Directors to have received the Queen in a manner worthy of the distinguished honour conferred on the establishment by her gracious command, it was resolved to construct a Royal Box of unprecedented size and elegance, and to follow the example of the Continental theatres, in setting apart the centre of the house for the reception of Royalty. For this purpose four boxes on the grand tier and two boxes on the first (the tier above) were removed, and thrown into one large Box of an oval form. The original curve of the façade of the four grand tier boxes was changed into one more, and the new façade thus extended some feet over the passage of the pit, as far as the back row of seats. The Royal Box took in the portion of the corridor on the grand tier, and the space of eight boxes, and was then separated from the passages on each side of the grand tier by partitions. Thus the State Box was isolated from the remainder of the house, and the grand foyer or saloon, and other rooms on the grand tier floor, were exclusively appropriated to Royalty's use. The public being admitted to the boxes by side doors on the Piazza side and at the Grand Staircase in Bow-street. Her Majesty's approach to the State Box was thus completed. The usual private entrance in Prince's-place was reserved for the Royal carriages, and her Majesty entered by her own private staircase. Passing through her own rooms, a door was cut through into the passage on the Piazza side, from which the Grand Saloon was entered, the entire distance being a perfect level All the corridors, passages, and ante-rooms were lined with white satin, and hung with flowers and filagree gold ornaments. The foyer, or drawing-room for the Queen, was furnished with costly muslin from Willow Bank, Fulham, with a rich service of plate. The room was lighted with splendid chandeliers and candelabra, and before the two grand looking glasses were colossal pyramids of ornaments. The corridor and toilette room for her Majesty were likewise with white satin, and from the ceiling to the flooring were massive mirrors. The interior of the Box was lined with white satin on a figured ground, upon which at intervals were placed pilasters of the same material. Two breadths of Brussels lace forming a cornice valance were suspended from the ceiling. The two columns in the interior of the Box were covered with artificial flowers and interlaced with Brussels dentelle, and from these columns candelabra were suspended. Miniature bouquets of artificial flowers and filagree bands studded the satin linings. The Chairs of State, for the Queen and Prince Albert, were immediately in front of the Box; and below the façade, on the back row of the pit, stood four Yeomen of the Guard. The officers and ladies of the Royal house hold stood behind the Queen during the whole of the performance. The exterior of the Box was very splendid. From the façade of the box stills was suspended a canopy or massive burnished gold hand, surmounted by a crown elaborately worked, and supported by draped flags of the finest gold and silver tissue. From this gorgeous canopy were hung draperies of rich India crimson and gold damask, trimmed with exquisite Brussels lace, and these draperies, in graceful folds, hung over the sides of the Royal Box.

The ensemble was remarkably elegant, and reflected great credit on the taste of MR F. GYE, under whose superintendence and after whose designs the decorations and fittings for the Royal Box were accomplished. Her Majesty expressed to Messrs. Delafield and Webster, who were in attendance in full Court suits, her gratification at the performance of "Les Huguenots" and the arrangements of the Royal Box in the centre of the house, the effect of which is displayed by our artist in the accompanying Illustration.

GOODWOOD RACES, 1848.

THE PRIZE PLATE.

THE three prizes for this year's races maintain the advancement in this branch of design and manufacture which it has been our pleasing duty to record of late.

THE CHESTERFIELD CUP.—RICHARD COEUR DE LION AT JAFFA.

THE CHESTERFIELD CUP, in composition, consists of two portions by different artists. The group surmounting the Cup represents "Richard Cœur-de-Lion at Jaffa," where, as a strong proof of the Turkish estimation of Richard, Saphadin, the brother of Saladin, sought and received knighthood from the King of England, for his son. This fine incident has been admirably designed and modelled by Mr. Cotterell: the group is spirited and characteristic throughout. The Cup itself is in pure and florid arabesque, and the first work in this style executed in England. It has been designed and modelled by Mr. W. Spencer, and is a superb piece of plate. This Prize is from the establishment of Messrs. Garrard and Co., and is a beautiful specimen of manufacture in metal.

THE STEWARDS' CUP is almost literally what its name implies. It is a silver vase, in the style of the celebrated "Warwick." The frieze represents the Gnacho catching the Wild Horse of South America by the lasso; designed by Frank Howard; modelled by Alfred Brown, under the superintendence of E. H. Bailey, R. A. There are four bas-si relievo in the frieze:—1. The wild horse started; 2. The horse selected, run down, and the lasso thrown 3. The Guacho receiving the shock of the running horse; 4. The overthrown horse held by a Guacho, saddled by another Guacho, ready for mounting. This vase has been excellently manufactured by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell.

GOODWOOD CUP.—THE FIGHT FOR THE STANDARD AT THE BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

The third Cup consists of a splendid group: "Harold's Standard at the battle of Hastings, A.D. 1066," designed by Frank Howard, and modelled by Alfred Brown, under the superintendence of E. H. Bailey, R.A.

The incident is thus graphically told in the "Pictorial History of England":—"After the death of Harold, the English gave way, but they retreated no further than their standard, which they still sought to defend. The Normans hemmed them in, making the most desperate efforts to seize the banner. Robert Fitzernest had already grasped it when the battle-axe of Leofwin (the brother of Harold) laid him low, though he suffered the same fate almost simultaneously from the sword of one of the twenty knights who had undertaken to seize the standard. Thus ended this memorable battle, fought where now stand the ruins of Battle Abbey, on the 14th of October, 1066."

In Sir E. Bulwer Lytton's new romance of "Harold," this forms one of the closing tableaux.

The group has been beautifully executed by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE GOODWOOD MEETING.

TIME was when l'homme blazé of Parisian life was a sketch which real the original might be met wherever you turned your face in the French capital; and it is not so long since May-fair furnished its "used-up" hero every afternoon at the bow-window of Brookes's, or cantering, with the blue devils after him, adown Rotten-row. But ennui has bade the Boulevards adieu; and Hyde-park is no longer the rendezvous of men "whose blood is snow-broth." We live in stirring days, whose influence not only affects the more serious affairs of mankind, but has become the characteristic of their pleasures also. As the rail to the road—the valse à deux temps to the minuet de la cour—the electric telegraph to the royal mail—the Beacon Course to the last half of the Banbury mile, are the relations of taste in the first and second moieties of the nineteenth century (we discount dates at the present pace). The preamble will not be pronounced malapropos, under the circumstances which suggest it.

When Charles the Second attempted to visit Sussex, he had to be dug out of the mud several times in the course of the first day's journey. Some ten years ago the odds used to be laid against those who started for Goodwood Races arriving in time for the meeting. There was one "stage" to convey five thousand crack passengers; and one post-horse for every twenty carriages bawling for the next turnout.[1] Those were the day- of "the slows:" now Goodwood is the centre of a radius of rail- All that is necessary is to desire to be there—and there you are. The only travelling that occurs—whether you start from London, Paris, or Vienna—is between Chichester and the course; and as the greatest portion of that is through the finest park in the world, there is not so much to grumble at. There are those, to be sure, who urge against the ubiquity, that it interferes with the enjoyment of scenery and a knowledge of the country; and, moreover, that it may give birth to other "go-ahead" contrivances not quite so convenient. What, for instance, if it pervade our parts of speech, and introduce (as one might say in Irish) short-hand into conversation? Something portentous of such a change is the wording of an advertisement relating to a sale that takes place on the Monday next. In it the Messrs. Tattersalls, it is said, will offer for auction certain high-bred letters, "which have been regularly shot." Up to the present time the expression has been "shot over," or "shot to:" by "regularly shot" we should understand that the animals had been put to death by means of some explosive process—and in fact, "and no mistake." The deliveration is more American and less nice than suits the ear as yet. This digression has enabled us to reach Goodwood without too great precipitation.

That which the late Duke of Richmond established as a social gathering for his neighbours who had a sporting turn, has grown, under the auspices of his son, into the greatest turf gala in the world. Still, Goodwood was forced to its present prodigality of luxuriance by the exertions of Lord George Bentinck—a nobleman remarkable for the energy of purpose he brings to bear on that he takes in hand. When he gave up racing, luck came to the rescue. Mr. Mostyn took to the Bentinck stud—a monster establishment; and, on his declining, a successor was found in the person of Lord Clifden, by no means a turfite that does things by halves.

This cannot, however, be expected to last for ever. Once upon a time, a Black, employed at one of the great London breweries, fell into the cooler, and was drowned. The "tap" turned out to be one of the best they ever had. A few months after the accident, a customer had occasion to complain of the quality of the beer. "Well, sir," remonstrated the clerk, "you can't expect us to drown a nigger in every barrel you bring." . . . . Thus with the Goodwood Stud—it cannot be expected to command for ever the appliances and means that have raised it to its present transcendency—which is all the better reason that we take advantage of the moment . . . . Alas and well-a-day! what a moment was that when the morning of Tuesday placed it upon the dial! There is an old saying, "it never rains but it pours"—an axiom which might have had its origin on Goodwood race-course. Whether because it is nearer the clouds than any other portion of the kingdom put to a similar use, or because of its superior attraction, the fact is past gainsaying, that, when it does rain there, the character of the weather admits of no mistake. In one part of Great Britain an umbrella is effective; in another, a macintosh does good service; but upon the Sussex Downs, on the occasion of which we are treating, on the occasion of such a forenoon as that of the 25th inst., it comes to the same thing whether you encase yourself in a waterproof suit or go about in your shirt. Thus, it will be surmised, the clouds lowered upon the Goodwood Meeting of 1848. But against the atmospheric pressure in one scale, there was the pressure of the sporting mind in quality and quantity never dreamt of in the philosophy of a Queensberry, or a Banbury, or a Mellish. The stately home of the Lennox was already filled with "fair women" and gallants, to whom the other moiety of the quotation might well apply.

A goodly company of these braved the pitiless pelting of a storm that must be imagined, for it cannot be described. A couple of hours after noon the clouds broke, and the sun gleamed out tearfully, but it was very cold and comfortless. As the list was a formidable one, despite the skiey influences, they set about discussion promptly and earnest. The betting ring circulated its facts and its fables. Among the former was the break-down of Hydrangea, a favourite for the stakes; among the latter—but these may be spared. The appearance of Chichester on Monday evening had not promised well, and the abominable weather with which Tuesday broke might have been expected to cool the ire of for sport in the breasts of those who to partake of it had to leave their homes for the wild downs. But such was not the case. Since the days of Hambletonian and Filho da Puta no match had created such general interest as the meeting of Van Tromp and Cossack for the 300 sovs Sweepstakes, with what fortune will be seen anon.

The Hero having walked over for the Craven, Mr. Payne won the Levant with Gleuca. Then there was a dead heat for the Drawingroom Stakes, run a match between Glendower and Swordplayer—6 to 1 on the former—which the latter won with all ease in the second attempt. To this succeeded the Ham Stakes, booked at 3 to 1 on Honeycomb, which, however, Colonel Peel won with Tadmor, the colt by Ion out of Palmyra; and next came the Gratwicke—that Surplice could not lose; but he did, nevertheless—the winner being Lord Chesterfield's Bistaffina, a filly of small account. A Sweepstakes of 300 sovs. each, half forfeit, for four-year-olds, twenty-six subscribers, was run a match between Van Tromp and Cossack—the respective winners of last year's St. Leger and Derby, in which they had respectively beaten each other. The favour run towards Van Tromp, on whom 7 to 4 was laid, and he won in a canter—so absolutely that Cossack's jockey pulled up at the distance! Lord Clifden won the Innkeepers' Plate with Carbuncle; his Lordship's Sagacity walked over for the Goodwood Club Stakes, and the racing terminated. The course was very heavy; the attendance full and all the thoroughfares knee-deep in mud, and "quite shut out" all enjoyment.

Wednesday, though not as wet as its predecessor, was twice as windy, and soon after noon gave assurance of a wretched pleasure trysting. All was cold and comfortless, except the luncheons in the Stand, to which uncommon attention was paid during the sojourn on the Downs. At one o'clock business began with

The Queen's Plate of 100 guineas—which was to have been a match between the Hero and Footstool—that is to say, between the Goodwood and the Danebury parties. It was looked upon as a foriorn hope for the former—of course—and 5 to 4 on Chipchase was laid on the Hero. Nevertheless, he was beaten by a length—with ease—and therefore was scratched for the Cup—which must have been agreeable for the spirits of his backers in such exhilrating weather. The Stewards' Cup brought out a very large field, and in a very fine race fell to the flag of the Admiral.

And now came the race of the day—that for the Goodwood Stakes. Of the 123 nominations 16 came to the post, Reflection being the favourite at 3 to 1—very short odds in a handicap like this. Chanticleer, at 6 to 1 against him, carrying 7st. 2lb., won by a length—Pindit second. The winner forthwith came into strong favour for the Cup. Buffalo Gal won the Cowdray, in a very close shave with the Traverser; and the 10 Sovs Sweepstakes, for three-year-olds and upwards, Mr. King's Guzman's dam filly won in a bad race by a couple of lengths. The Members' Plate for the City of Chichester was won by Watchdog!, a half-a length—one of the four that started having run the wrong course. Sagacity won the Orleans Cup from a field of four others, cleverly. And thus ended one of the worst dog-and-cat days ever endured by a party of pleasure, which is a strong way of putting the fact.

THURSDAY.—Here, as at many other places of similar resort, the grand day set in with more promise than its two predecessors. There was now and then a gleam of sunshine, and the temperature was genial, and it was, altogether, better, as regarded the whole, than might have been expected. But it was not, in attendance, at all to be compared to many former Cup days. The effect of scratching the Hero was, of course, to give increased interest to the great event, for which, the preceding evening, and up to the hour of starting, six to four was current on Von Tromp. Lord Stanley's Archery having walked over for the Sweepstakes of thirty sovs each, Sir Richard Williams won the 200 sovs with the Picaroon filly, and Lord George Bentinck the Sussex Stakes with Glenalvon. The Duke of Richmond carried off a 100 sovs sweepstakes with Helter Skelter; and his Grace's Plate of £100 brought seventeen to the post. This was a scurry, won by Sweetplayer. The Molecomb was run for by half-a-dozen, and won, all the way, by John Day's Mr. Milner. And now came the cynosure of all comers—the Cup. There was a deal of gossip about the French horse, and other on dits, but when the nine that raced came in front of the Stand all was earnest and deep interest. A finer or truer race was never run. Von Tromp went out in front, and scarcely in the same place, and finished a gallant winner, without even an effort. Armin, a German bred horse, was second; and Lady Sarah third. The pace moderate till they came to the mile-post from home, when it became very good. Von Tromp won by 25 Sovs Sweepstakes in a canter; the 200 sovs ditto by Beiss; and Glendower having won the Racing Stakes, beating Surplice, a bad third, and thus giving coup de grace to his Leger hopes, the interest of the day ended.

The closing day at Goodwood has more of an amateur character about it than belongs to any other meeting on a similar scale. Its [illegible] turns may therefore suffice to wind up our record of the [illegible]. In abundance they were never exceeded on the British turf [illegible] they were good, and marked by features calculated to influence very considerably the betting on future important events.

"THE MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT—TIME OF THE RESTORATION."

PAINTED BY T. F. MARSHALL.

THIS was one of the most attractive pictures in the Exhibition of the Royal Academy, just closed. It is of a class which has become very popular of late years. The composition is generally simple, and besides is well told. The [illegible] parents, in one sense "the contracting parties," are seated at the table [illegible] betrothed lovers are on a settee to the right of the picture. To the left is a comparatively antiquated person, perchance a sister, revisiting the wedding garland; another female is more observant, and in the doorway is a little episode of family gossip. The period of the scene is "the Restoration," as the costumes bespeak. The room is a genuine interior: the wainscot and ceiling finely carved and panelled, the floor parquetted, and the bay-window dight with armorial boast. There is, too, the family portrait; that embellished accessory to comfort, the folding screen; and the luxurious, elegantly appointed table, with cushioned and embroidered chairs, not forgetting the inkstand-bound chest, bespeak the opulence of all the parties. This is, altogether, a picture of high merit, as regards composition, colouring, and carefully-studied accessories

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—SATURDAY, JULY 22.

The House of Peers sat for a short time, when the Royal Assent was given by commission to a great number of public and private Bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—SATURDAY, JULY 22.

The House assembled at twelve o'clock

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT IN IRELAND.

Lord J. RUSSELL, at a quarter-past twelve, rose amidst profound silence, and moved for leave to bring in a Bill to empower the Lord-Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor or Governors, of Ireland, to apprehend and detain, until the 1st of March, 1849, such persons as he shall suspect of conspiring against her Majesty's person and Government. The noble Lord having expressed his deep regret at being compelled to suspend the constitutional liberties of Ireland; and declared that, in his opinion, such a measure was absolutely necessary for the preservation of life and property in Ireland, for the prevention of the effusion of blood, and for the stopping of insurrection, proceeded to state the grounds upon which he rested his proposition. He considered it would be necessary for him to prove three things:—First, that the present state of things in Ireland was fraught with evil—that it threatened danger—that we were on the eve of an outbreak, if not timely prevented. Secondly, that there were means sufficient to produce great evils and dangers unless some measures should be adopted to counteract them. Thirdly, that the measure he proposed was the most appropriate for its purpose. He did not propose to rest his case on any secret information known only to the Government: but he would rest it on facts patent, notorious and palpable. He then proceeded to trace the history of the Irish Confederation down to the present time, establishing, from the avowed manifestoes published in the Nation and the Irish newspapers, that the fixed determination of these Confederates was to abolish entirely the Imperial Government and to take away from the Queen all authority in Ireland to annihilate all the rights of property—to hold up the name of England to those who would be in their oaths of allegiance and join in rebellion—and to hold up the threat of depriving all those of their property who would remain fast to their allegiance and refuse to assist in the insurrection. One of these manifestoes, entitled, "The Value of the Irish Harvest," set forth that there was growing on the Irish soil eighty millions of property, and declared that it would be for the new Irish Council of Three Hundred to decide how this produce should be apportioned; thus showing that by one sweeping confiscation the masters of this Red Republic were prepared to disregard all existing social rules, and to reduce everything to anarchy. The noble Lord then went into a review of the progress of these treasonable objects possessed by the Confederates. All the accounts received by the Government agreed in that the organization of the Clubs was formidable, that it was rapidly progressing, and that the moment was at hand when the plans of the associates were ripe for execution. He adduced the accounts obtained from Limerick, Louth, Cork, Waterford, and other counties, as evidences of the formidable nature of the organization of the insurgents; all the information received from all quarters, and all the opinions obtained from various persons being to the one effect, that though persons of property and the clergy of all denominations were deadly against an outbreak, no influence would have any effect in deterring many thousands of misguided men, especially of the farmer class, from joining in the proposed insurrection; in fact, nothing was now wanting but the planning of the day and hour, to be fixed by the leaders, for carrying into effect this fatal revolution. The noble Lord quoted a letter received that day from Lord Clarendon, in which the Lord-Lieutenant stated, in respect to the state of Ireland, that it was growing worse, and that the change of opinion from loyalty, on the part of [illegible] people, was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] first, the most direct, the immediate and efficacious remedy for the existing evil, would be the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—a power to be given to the Lord-Lieutenant at once securing the persons of those suspected of high treason. The Government might have been justified in demanding this power on an earlier period, but they delayed it as long as it was possible. He implored the House, if their conviction was this measure should pass, to lose no time in arming the Lord-Lieutenant with the power requisite. Without it, rebellion could undoubtedly be put down; but it would be at the expense of blood, at the cost of much misery and ruin. No man could say what the consequences of withholding these powers even for a day would be. The Government took the responsibility, however unpleasant it might be, of proposing this measure, and they confidently asked the House to accept their responsibility, mindful of the feelings they would preserve and mindful of the risks they might incur

Mr. FEARGUS O'CONNOR, the Member for Nottingham, having quoted the Irish people into rebellion, and with them attempting to repress the mischiefs of their own creating by means of Coercion Bills. Strong as the Government was in uniting all parties in the House in favour of this measure, its only effect would be to hasten the revolution. The hon. member, in the course of his speech, vaunted very close upon treason, declaring that he was not for repeal, but separation.

Sir R. PEEL was prepared to give his unqualified support to the Government. He trusted in the very city of the Ministers when they stated that the conspiracy was wide-spread and extensive, and he was ready to take his part with the Crown against those black Kings of Munster of whom they had heard, and against those conspirators who were working to substitute for the mild sway of her Majesty a cruel and despotic power. He would be at the expense of no further delay in coping with the Irish traitors, and he for one was prepared to consent to the suspension of all the forms of the House in order to the speedy passing of this Bill; and if additional powers should be required, he trusted the Government would not hesitate a moment in bringing them forward. Having referred to the results of revolution on the Continent, the right hon. gentleman concluded by reiterating his confidence that the throne of this country was firmer than ever fixed in the hearts and affections of the people

Mr. B. OSBORNE would vote for the introduction of the Bill; but before the close of the session he would bring forward a motion which would call the attention of the House to the whole state of the political and social condition of Ireland

Mr. SADLIER thought that, in the present state of Ireland, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was absolutely necessary.

Mr. S CRAWFORD was confident that remedial measures alone would give peace and tranquility to Ireland; and, in accordance with that opinion, he moved as an amendment, "That the present distressed state of Ireland arose from misgovernment and want of remedial measures for acknowledged grievances, without which no measures of coercion could restore content and order in that country."

Mr FAGAN seconded the amendment, and contended that the people of Ireland never would be satisfied until they were permitted to manage their own affairs.

Mr DISRAELI said the movement in Ireland was neither more nor less than Jacobinical, having for its objects the annihilation of property. He could therefore see no possible objection to arming the Government with the powers it asked for.

Mr. CALLAGHAN opposed the Bill; which was supported by Sir D. NORREYS and Mr H. DRUMMOND.

Mr. HUME felt himself bound, though with great reluctance, to support the measure of the noble Lord, believing it necessary in order to preserve peace in Ireland. He must at the same time say that the Government was responsible for all the evils which now afflicted Ireland. They had over and over again promised measures of relief for that country, but nothing whatever of that kind had been done. He was of opinion that Parliament ought not to be prorogued while Ireland continued in its present distracted state.

Mr. NEWDEGATE gave his fullest support to the measure of the Government.

Mr. GROGAN thought that before suspending the constitutional principles of Ireland, the necessity should be dire and urgent; but he believed such was the case at the present moment in that country.

Mr. REYNOLDS contended that no act has taken place in Ireland to justify a measure like that before them. There was nothing to complain of beyond a few seditious speeches and inflammatory articles in some newspapers, and surely these were not sufficient reasons for suspending the great principles and benefits of the constitution.

After a few words from Mr. MUNTZ, Sir H. W. BARRON, and Colonel DUNNE,

The House divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 271 to 8.

The Bill was then brought in, and read a first time; and LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that, as the opinion of the House had been so unequivocally expressed, and as, if the Bill were to pass, it should pass at once, he would ask the House to give it a second reading. The noble Lord moved accordingly.

Mr LUCIUS O'BRIEN remarked, that he had at first thought of abstaining from voting on this Bill, because, in all probability, his near relative would be the first person affected by it, but the consideration that his conduct might be misconstrued, and the conviction that the measure would be most beneficial to Ireland, had induced him to record his vote for the Bill.

After a few observations, the Bill was read a second time.

The House then went into committee on the Bill; and Lord J. RUSSELL stated that the Bill was identical with the Act of 1822, with one exception—the omission of the clause which required that, in case of the arrest of a member of Parliament, leave of the House should be first obtained.

Mr. B. OSBORNE objected to the continuance of the Bill to March next, and moved an amendment to limit its operation to the 1st September next.

This amendment was withdrawn.

The Bill passed through committee, was reported, and read a third time and passed—all the standing orders having been previously suspended to allow it to go at once through all its stages.

The House adjourned at seven o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS ACT IN IRELAND.

The Bill to empower the Lord-Lieutenant or the Chief Governor of Ireland to apprehend and detain in custody persons suspected of treasonable designs was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE, in moving the suspension of the standing orders, for the purpose of allowing the Bill to pass through all its stages in one day, stated that, since the indefatigable exertions of Lord Campbell's motion, additional and overwhelming evidence of the nature of the exigency under which their lordships were obliged to leg slate had come to light. From information obtained up to Saturday evening, it appeared that the system of clubs—that machinery out of which the rebellion had grown—was advancing at an accelerated pace. In the counties of Meath, Cork, Waterford, Tipperary, and Kilkenny, the clubs were now attaining the practical possession of the country. The acknowledged leaders of the rebellion were going from town to town, and from county to county, with the purpose of reviewing their forces, &c.; and these proceedings were carried on with great caution. The noble Marquis then quoted extracts from a letter signed "Brennan," and from an address signed "J. F. L.," and from "Political Instructions," this last conveying suggestions with respect to the casting of balls, the construction of pikes, and the making of window grenades. Having referred to an Act passed in 1803, as a precedent for suspending the standing orders, the noble Marquis asked their Lordships to pass the Bill without delay, intimating that within a few hours her Majesty's Royal Assent would be given to it.

Lord BROUGHAM remarked that some of the incendiary addressed published in the rebel papers were dated from Newgate, and asked how it was that persons in prison were allowed to publish their rebellious writings? Such a thing would not be permitted in England.

The Earl of WICKLOW also dwelt upon that fact, which he thought required explanation.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that there was every reason to suppose that the letters purporting to come from Newgate were not written in the prison at all

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH had great apprehensions that the sanguine expectations entertained of the result of this measure would be disappointed; for he did not believe it would put down the rebellion in Ireland, although it might be temporarily suspended in England.

If adopted six weeks ago, it might have prevented that organization of clubs which the Government had seen growing up from day to day without check.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE assured the Noble Earl that the Government had deliberated incessantly on, and had weighed the arguments for and against, every measure; and there had been a perfect concert on all their measures. At the proper time he would be prepared to defend them.

After a few words from the Earl of CARNDALE, the standing orders were suspended, and the Bill was read a second time; the committee on it was negatived; the Bill was read a third time and passed

The Administration of Justice Bill, and the Protection of Justices against Vexatious Actions Bill, were read a third time and passed.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Public Health Bill passed through committee. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr CARDWELL presented a petition, signed by the Mayor and the principal merchants and traders of Liverpool, praying that grateful acknowledg that the Kaffir war had cost up to the last return, and reviewed the whole course of those hostilities, blaming the conduct of Sir T. Maitland in causing a war for the sake of two goats, which would ultimately entail upon this country an outlay of £3,000,000 sterling. The annual expense for maintaining the colonies was £8,000,000, one half of which was defrayed by this country, and this enormous expense was, in a great measure, created by the money being uselessly frittered away, and, as he was informed, in many instances by peculation. The honourable gentleman then went very minutely into the disposition of our naval and military forces, together with their expenses, and stated the various places where those forces might be very safely reduced or altogether removed, and their places supplied at the expense of the colonies. By these means the Government would effect a very considerable saving in the colonial expenditure. There were some places, too, that would thrive much better if handed over to the East India Company, and would save us a great expense, while they would be more available to us than they were at present, to the interests of the empire. The powers to be reserved by Great Britain should be only a free admission for our surplus population, and a free market for the produce of our industry. By adopting this course the mother country would retain all the advantages they could hope for from our colonies, while the expense of legislation would be greatly reduced, and would be borne by themselves. He did not propose to abandon any portion of the colonies, but to reduce the expenditure to a very considerable extent, and threw the necessary charges of supporting them on themselves, by giving them local governments, and the money that would be saved by this plan would enable the Government to transfer to Australia 100,000 persons annually, and double that number to North America. The hon. Baronet concluded a very lengthened speech, by stating that if large sums of money were to be spent on the colonies they might be much more advantageously applied in promoting the emigration of all classes of society, so as to make the colonies as much like the mother country as possible. The hon. gentleman then moved "That it is the opinion of this House that the colonial expenditure of the British empire demands inquiry, with a view to its reduction; and that to accomplish this object, and to secure greater contentment and prosperity to the colonists, they ought to be invested with large powers for the administration of their local affairs;" and added, that if the House agreed to it, he should, in the early part of next session, move for a select Committee on the subject.

Mr HUTT, in seconding the motion, concurred in all that had fallen from the hon. Baronet, in his censures on the proceedings of the Colonial Office, and contended that the unanimous feeling of the country was opposed to the Colonial Office assuming to perform duties for which it was incompetent.

Mr HAWES, after defending the Colonial Office against the charges of ignorance and economy, and vindicating the colonial policy of England as on the whole the most successful that the world had ever seen, assented to the motion as tending to strengthen the bands of the Colonial Secretary in his further carrying out the principles of self-government and economy with regard to the colonies.

Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr Hume, Mr. Stafford, and Mr. Mangles severally addressed the House; after which Lord J. RUSSELL said that he would not object to the adjournment; but the only difficulty was as to fixing a day on which it could be resumed.

The debate was then adjourned to Tuesday week.

Mr. ANSTEY rose to "move for the papers relating to the charges brought by Governor Macdonald against Thomas O'Brien, Esq., late Colonial Secretary of Sierra Leone, and the counter-charges brought by the latter gentleman against the former, and the decision of the Colonial office upon the same." The hongentleman was proceeding to call the attention of the House to the conduct of this Colonial Government with respect to the transaction to which his motion referred, when Sir hon. member moved that the House be counted, and only thirty-members being present, the House adjourned at a quarter-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock

REPEAL OF THE UNION.

Mr R. M. FOX withdrew his motion for a Parliament in Ireland, which stood amongst the orders of the day as an adjourned debate. He took that opportunity of deprecating the commotion which appeared to have recently taken place between Orangemen and Repealers in the county of Tipperary.

Mr. ANSTEY denied all participation with the wicked men who were stirring up rebellion in Ireland.

After discussion, in which Sir B. Hall, Mr. R. Reynolds, Mr. H. Gratton, and other hon. members took part, Lord J. RUSSELL thought the advocates for a repeal of the union had shown a wise discretion in postponing the discussion of the question at the present moment; and whatever might be their views of the course to be pursued for improving the social condition of Ireland, he hoped they would join with Parliament and the constituted authorities in averting the evils which would follow the traitorous designs of certain parties to overthrow the institutions of the country.

WASTE LANDS (IRELAND).—On the motion for going into committee on the Waste Lands (Ireland) Bill, Sir J. WALSH opposed the Bill, as novel in principle, and calculated to increase the present poverty of the people of Ireland. He therefore moved that the House should resolve itself into committee on the Bill that day six months.—Mr. P. SCROPE strongly supported the Bill.

After which, Sir G. GREY objected to the measure, as it would lead to a large expenditure of public money, and as being only a partial measure in the manner in which its object was proposed to be attained, for it was evident from the interpretation clause that something more than reclaiming waste lands was contemplated by the Bill. He felt himself called upon, therefore, to oppose its further progress. After some further conversation, the Bill was withdrawn

LIFE POLICIES OF ASSURANCE BILL. Mr. W. FAGAN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated the object of it to be to make policies of assurance assignable at law, which they were not at present, though they were assignable in equity. The principle of the Bill was assented to by the leading insurance companies of the country.—The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed that day week.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL. This Bill was also read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

SALE OF BEER BILL. The HOUSE went into Committee on this Bill, and, having passed the several clauses, the report was fixed for Wednesday next.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met shortly after five o'clock

The Ecclesiastical Patronage Suits Compromise (Ireland) Bill went through Committee.

The Prisons Bill also went through Committee.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. Lord CAMPBELL moved the third reading of the Public Health Bill, with amendments The Bishop of LONDON thought that the Select Committee which had been appointed had improved the Bill by making the amendments it is, and therefore he gave his cordial support to it.—The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

STATE OF IRELAND.

Lord BROUGHAM put a question to the noble lord (Lord Lansdowne) relative to the alarming news which had been received from Ireland. For himself, he thought they were grossly exaggerated, if they were not altogether pure inventions.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that with respect to the rumour which had been circulated in the City, of the commencement of rebellion in Ireland, he had the satisfaction of being enabled to state that there was every probability of its being altogether unfounded. Letters had subsequently been received, dated at six o'clock on the same day, which had come by the mail, but they were equally void of the slightest reference to such an occurrence. He therefore did not think there was the slightest grounds for the circulation of such a rumour. At the same time he begged to add that there was the greatest probability of an outbreak in that particular quarter of Ireland in which it was rumoured disturbances had already commenced.

The Marquis of LONDONDERRY blamed the Government for the way in which they had acted with the Irish people, to go another week until they had arrived at the very verge of rebellion; but he trusted now that they would exercise ever possible power with which they were invested, to prevent these deluded people proceeding any further

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that that moment received additional intelligence up to seven o'clock yesterday evening, which was equally devoid of any foundation as to the re-al outbreak of the people in Ireland. (Hear, hear.)—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

PECULIAR UNION CHARGES. The adjourned debate on this Bill was resumed, and, after some hon. members had spoken, it was again adjourned to Friday.

ECCLESIASTICAL UNIONS AND DIVISIONS OF PARISHES (IRELAND).—This Bill was read a third time. The House then adjourned until five o'clock. The Speaker resumed the Chair at five o'clock, when there was an unusually full attendance of members.

FALSE RUMOURS.—STATE OF IRELAND

Mr. MONSELL rose amidst almost breathless silence, and said—Sir, seeing the Right Hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department in his place, I wish to put a question to him with reference to the rumours that have reached this city to-day with regard to the state of Ireland. I am happy to know that a great many of these rumours are entirely false. (Cheers.) And I am sure I only express the feeling of the House, when I say that a more heartless or disgraceful rumour was never perpetrated than that which has been circulated to-day. (Loud cheers.) I do not know whether there is any means that the right hon. Baronet could make use of to prevent the electric telegraph from being used for such disgraceful purposes, but I am sure if the right hon. Baronet has the power to do so he will take care to prevent a recurrence of these disgraceful practices. (Cheers.) The question I wish to ask him first is, what accounts he has received from Ireland. And, secondly, do those accounts confirm the statement that the whole of the south of Ireland is in open insurrection?

Sir GEORGE GREY: I have great satisfaction in stating that I have every reason to believe that the alarming accounts which have appeared in the later editions of the morning papers, and which were transmitted this morning from Liverpool by the electric telegraph, to the effect that insurrection had actually broken out in the south of Ireland, are totally destitute of truth. (Loud cheers.) Sir, on receiving the first copy of the paper transmitted to me containing the intelligence, said to have been sent from Liverpool this morning, I despatched a letter on the subject to the noble member for Lincolnshire, to forward the information by a communication by the electric telegraph to the Mayor of Liverpool, requesting to know from him what information had been received in Liverpool from Ireland, and I received a despatch from that functionary, by the electric telegraph, stating that the information published this morning was accompanied from Ireland by a letter, dated Dublin, Wednesday evening, which represented that Mr. Cotton, of the Dublin Evening Post, had received from the Castle a most dreadful rumour, which he was about to publish in a second edition of that paper. The writer then went on to say, that he took advantage of our Queen's messenger going off at the moment for London, to forward the intelligence in a parcel to Messrs. Willmer and Smith, of Liverpool, who, no doubt, would transmit it to London by the electric telegraph. The Mayor of Liverpool, about an hour after this, further communicated to me that he had perfectly satisfied the Irish intelligence, contained in the paragraph published in the morning papers. Is utterly untrue, unless Government have received a dispatch from Lord Clarendon, confirming it. He also stated that a Queen's messenger actually had arrived from Dublin by a steamer this morning, and he left Liverpool by the half-past six express train. Now, it is perfectly true that a Queen's messenger was despatched from Dublin last night. I had sent him over with a despatch, stating that the bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act had received the Royal Assent, and he left Dublin with a despatch from the Lord Lieutenant yesterday evening, and arrived in London in express time this morning at half-past one o'clock. This despatch certainly describes the state of the country in the neighbourhood of Clonmel, Carrick, and Thurles to be dreadful, but in relation to any actual outbreak it is comparatively easy, and makes no mention whatever (Hear.) I have seen the messenger, and he states that he left Dublin at three o'clock yesterday afternoon, but he assures me that he brought no parcel or letter for any private person. The messenger is stated to have been over by a special steamer from Kingston yesterday; that he started at three o'clock by the steamer which was reported to have had the Queen's messenger on board. Now, no Queen's messenger came over in that steamer; but I have received letters from the Lord Lieutenant, written after the departure of the Queen's messenger yesterday afternoon, which contain no allusion to these frightful counts. I am also assured by an hon. member that the hon. gentleman the member for Totnes left Dublin yesterday by the steamer which leaves at 7 o'clock, and that everything was tranquil when he left—that no report of this kind had reached his ears when he came up from the port. I will only add that I certainly shall endeavour to trace the wilful originator of the report. (Hear, hear, cheers.) I have now given all the information in my power; and it enables me to concur with the honourable gentleman that these reports were fabricated for a wicked and malicious purpose. With respect to the state of Ireland, I may only add, that by the letters which I have received from the Lord-Lieutenant, it appears that Sir Charles Napier had arrived at Cork with his squadron —(hear, hear) —with an able and ample body of troops, who, I am sure, are always ready to discharge their duty with unflinching bravery, and who are, therefore, entirely free from the imputations which the reports circulated this day have most unfoundedly cast upon them. (Cheers).

After some remarks from Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. A. BROOK, and other honourable members, the subject dropped.

The rest of the evening was passed in discussing the clauses of the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill.—Adjourned.

EXTENSION OF THE APHIS VASTATOR, THE CAUSE OF THE POTATO DISEASE.

(To the Editor.)

The present year has been most favourable for the observation of the cause of the potato disease, as the rationale which I have developed in my treatise on the subject has been shown in the most extraordinary manner.

Up to a recent period, the plants exhibited a most healthy appearance, being free from disease in every respect till the destructive insect settled upon the illfated plant and infested the first injury

Wherever the insect pierces the tissue is damaged: and the baneful effect is more readily produced in dark weather, when there is not sufficient light to cause the leaves to perform their functions. The injured tissue then dies, and becomes covered by a coating of little dots, which have been well described by Berkely; and subsequently the tuber and haulm become infested by those other fungi which years ago have been elaborately figured by the distinguished Martius. The drop of yeast scarce causes less wonderful changes in the vat of wort, than the puncture of the aphis inflicts upon the economy of the potato plant; and whilst a sufficiency of the insect will destroy the plant under every circumstance, a very few will effect the same injury where darkness favours the result

At the present time, although considerable damage has been done to certain kinds of potatoes, the injury is not intended to kill crops; and therefore, if the insect speedily leaves the plant, no considerable loss will be sustained

CONCERT.

MRS. HAMPTON'S SOIREE MUSICALE.—On Monday evening, this accomplished vocalist gave a concert, at the residence of C. R. Mansell Talbot, Esq., M.P., No. 40, Belgrave-square, which was fully and fashionably attended. Mrs. Hampton is a skilful instructor of singing, and a very clever vocalist; but her specialty is the singing of Irish melodies, which she invests with a charm, grace, and feeling that powerfully command the sympathies of her auditory. Her "Mother's Lament," a MS ballad, "Good Night," and "Little Nell," were much applauded. Mrs. Hampton also sang a scenic ballad, "Lord of the Castle," composed by her brother, Mr. Osborne, with good effect. Mdlle. Antonia de Meodi gave the "Q i la vuoe," from Bellini's "Puritani," beautifully; and Alboni's "Non piu mesta" was as brilliantly effective as ever. Tagliafico sang with Alboni the duo, "Dunque to son," and, with Madame Tagliafico, another duo, capitally. Mr. Roger's beautiful tenor voice was heard to the best advantage in Boreldey's song, "Quel plaisir d'être soldat," from the opera of "La Dame Blanche." Osborne and Benedict performed a pianoforte duo, composed by the former, in the best possible style.

HERR DRECHSLER'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—This clever violinist's concert, at 40, Lower street, on Monday, was well attended. He was assisted by Herr Goldberg, Herr Hausmann, Madame Schuster, Miss S. Flowers, Herr Goldsmith, Signor Favio, and John Parry. The Duke of Cambridge was present

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE. The Gazette de Guernsey publishes accounts of the concerts given at that island by Mr. Templeton, assisted by the veteran composer, Bierwitt. The talents of these professors have produced the most impressions on the amateurs and critics of Guernsey.—The Théâtre de la Nation, in Paris, re-opened on Friday with Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable." Gueymard being the Robert, and Allaird Bertram; Mdlle. Nau, Isabelle; and Mdlle Grimm, from the Opéra Comique, made her début as Alice. Maria, formerly a tenor of the Académie, but who has returned a baritone, is engaged at the Théâtre de la Nation. The ballet of the "Amazones" is in active rehearsal, as also a new opera by Scribe, the music by Clapisson, entitled "Jeanne la Folle." The Opéra Comique re-opened the same evening with "L'Eau Merveilleuse" and "La Fille du Régiment." Ole Bull has invented an improved model for making violins. Panofka, the violinist and composer, has quitted New York. Bishop, Covent Garden, the celebrated horn-player, created a great sensation at the Concert Hall, Manchester, on the 19th inst. Madame D'Okolski (an English contralto, married to a Pole), Madame Dorus Gras, M. Dorus (the flautist), and M. Massol were also engaged. Mr. Seymour was leader of the orchestra.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE MEETING AT LINCOLN.

THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the Archæological Institute commenced on Tuesday, the 25th inst, at Lincoln, under the presidency of Earl Brownlow, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county, the Right Reverend the Bishop of the Diocese being the patron. The City of Lincoln is full of architectural remains of all ages, from the time of the Romans; and, besides the magnificent Cathedral, which is perhaps the finest in England, and its situation on the edge of a hill the noblest that can be imagined, there are some of the most perfect remains of the domestic architecture of the middle ages that now exist in this country, particularly of Norman work. The Hall of St. Mary's Guild, (commonly known as John of Gaunt's Stables,) is one of the most perfect pieces of Norman domestic architecture in England. The neighbourhood, too, is particularly rich in its churches, especially along the cliff which runs from Grantham to Newark, containing some of the most beautiful specimens of ecclesiastica. architecture in this country.

Among those who have assembled to take part in the proceedings of the week are Lord and Lady Brownlow, the Duke of St. Albans, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Yarborough, Lord and Lady Alford, Lord and Lady Monson, Lord Braybrooke, the Bishops of Norwich and Lincoln; the Deans of Lincoln, Ely, Westminster, Hereford, and Chichester; the Archdeacon of Lincoln, the Precentor of Lincoln, Sir John Boileau, Sir Charles Anderson, Mr. Hallam (the historian); Mr. Cockerell, R.A; Professor Wilkins; Mr. Britton, F.S.A., the well-known author of "Cathedral Antiquities;" Mr. Kemble, the Anglo-Saxon scholar; Mr. Hawkins, of the British Museum; Messrs. Bloxam, J. H. Parker, Buckler, and very many others. The total number of members and subscribers for the present meeting is about 250, including many ladies.

TUESDAY.

The reception room on Tuesday was at the Great Northern Hotel, a new building, only opened last week, and beautifully arranged; and, in a very short time, every bed there was occupied.

The proceedings on Tuesday commenced at twelve o'clock, the introductory meeting being held in the County Assembly Rooms, near the Cathedral, when the Bishop of Norwich, who was elected President last year at that city, rose and said: "Before I resign the high honour of President in favour of the noble President elect (Earl Brownlow), I shall take advantage of the chair, and make some remarks relative to this Society. The science of Astronomy, to some, is the mere sparkling firmament; but to the scientific astronomer the science touches that these sparkling stars are immense worlds, and give further proof of a great and good being—the Ruler of the Universe. Take the science of Geology: we dive into the mine, and ascend the mountain, and it tells us how many ages—almost countless—the Creator has been forming the earth; and we are lost in astonishment at his works. Painting, again, in a way to be more astonishing than these. By its aid we are accustomed to behold things brighter and truer. Archæology, however —as he more—it awakens our eyes, it opens our ears, and produces unalloyed satisfaction in what we behold. Do we see the castle, with its dungeons—we can picture to ourselves the prison where the poor captive pined away. Do we see the noble remains of a baronial residence—we can picture to ourselves the knights and ladies dressed as on one of their holyday feasts. Do we see the handsome alter-tomb by the aid of archæology, it reminds us of what our ancestors have done amid these scenes, and to some of which deeds we are indebted for the bulwarks of our liberty. Archæology teaches us to admire the greatness of those who designed such noble structures as the adjoining Cathedral—an edifice which modern architects cannot equal; and this science leads us to venerate the skill of our pious ancestors. Some jealous persons have said that archæologists wish to bring back to our age the barbarisms of the middle ages. I say, we repudiate so false an accusation. What we do wish, is to be able to appreciate our ancestors, in erecting temples to Him to whom we cannot do too much homage. For my part, I am so much a Tractarian, that I would bring in the aid of sculpture and painting in adorning our churches. I am glad to say that we have something improved during the last twenty-five years; we have learnt to wish for something more than the mere bricks and mortar, and we can safely say that Archæology has done so much—we have abolished the style of brickbats. I must say one word in favour of whitewash; it has saved us many of the beauties of our old churches; let the spirit of improvement progress in restoring what we have left to us, and we possess beauties in our churches which other countries cannot boast." The Bishop of Norwich then went on to say, his numerous avocations had prevented him from attending and doing so much as he desired; but he was glad he was to be succeeded by Earl Brownlow, who had the leisure and the means of doing much. The right rev. Bishop then resigned the chair to Lord Brownlow.

Earl Brownlow then took the chair, and stated that his best wishes were for the welfare of the Society, and said they were one means of producing churches in good taste, by the study of Archæology.

The Marquis of Northampton next rose to propose the thanks of the meeting to the late President, the talented Bishop of Norwich; he did so with mingled feelings of satisfaction and pain—pain, in having to lose the services of their late chairman, who had in his able speech of this day secured their unanimous applause, and which speech alone was quite sufficient to secure to the Bishop of Norwich the vote of thanks, without him (the Marquis of Northampton) saying more. The Marquis of Northampton then stated the pleasure he had in having now for their President Earl Brownlow, who had built several churches at his own expense; adding that the noble earl's family had imitated his example, and had subscribed largely to the building of new churches.

The Lord Bishop of Lincoln rose to second the motion, and stated the several benefits to be derived from the study of Archæology. Moralists knew that by directing our thoughts to the past or the future, we were less likely to think of things of the present. The Bishop of Lincoln complimented the Bishop of Norwich on his speech of that day, and cordially seconded the motion of thanks to the late President, which was carried by acclamation.

Lord Monson was very glad indeed to meet the learned gentlemen who had visited Lincoln, and in the name of the citizens and inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Lincoln begged to express their pleasure at the honour of the visit of the Archæological Institute; and stated that every facility would be given to their learned enquiries.

The Mayor of Lincoln then invited the meeting to a soirée, given by the Corporation, to be held on Friday.

Some other business of a formal nature was transacted. Mr. E. J. Willson, the local secretary, was then called upon to read the first paper upon the plans of the Bishop's Palace, at half-past three o'clock accompanied a very large party to view these interesting ruins. The building appears to have been principally of the time of Stephen; and large remains still exist. Near the entrance is a square tower, built by Bishop Alnwick: the doorway is very good, with exceedingly elegant tracing, and the original door of the 14th is decorated style. A very fine oriel window over the doorway has been destroyed, and nothing remains but part of the Banqueting-hall, which leads out of the lower part of the tower, a very finely-proportioned room, 50ft. by 26ft.; but it is quite in ruins. The remains of some corbels show where the line of columns supporting the roof was placed. The windows are not supposed to have been glazed, but merely closed by shutters; the upper part has, perhaps, had glass in it. There are stone seats under the windows; and Mr. J. H. Parker, of Oxford, took occasion to explain that one of the most characteristic differences between the windows of domestic and ecclesiastical buildings was the fact of stone seats never being found in the latter class of structures at all. At the end of the Banqueting-hall there is a kind of antechamber, separating it from the kitchens, which are in a large rude tower, where remains of five fire-places may be traced. Below the kitchens has been a chamber, supposed to have been the brewhouse; and at one corner of the ante-room there is a small turret, containing a staircase, by which the servants had access to the Banqueting-hall from their chambers, which are large vaulted apartments on the opposite side of the court. There are several of these chambers, which are formed under all parts of the upper rooms. One gateway, below the ante-chamber, is curious: the moulding is a variety of that known as the billet-moulding, but the stones are very nice, and the whole of the under part, which extends partly down the cliff on which the Cathedral stands, is now converted into gardens. At the bottom of one of these terraces, at the north end of the Palace Gardens, is a very fine fragment of the old Roman wall of the city of Lindum, exhibiting herring-bone work, and pieces of tiles introduced. From the party afterwards accompanied Mr. Willson to the Jews' House, on the Steep Hill, a very rich specimen of late Norman work. But the lecture and the visit having occupied nearly all the afternoon, there was not sufficient time left to make up parties for visits to the other objects of interest of which the city is so full. A few gentlemen, however, took the opportunity of examining some excavations which are still being carried on of the course of an old Roman sewer, at the top of the hill, which has now been explored for about 300 feet.

In the evening the Museum was opened at the County Assembly Rooms; and we were much pleased to see the very beautiful collection of exceedingly interesting objects which have been got together on the present occasion. Among those of the chief importance are the following (some of which we hope to be able to present our readers with in a future Number):—1. A magnificent silver gilt monstrance, about 2½ feet high, of exceedingly beautiful workmanship, from the Jesuits' College at Lucerne, recently brought to England by Mr. Farrer, by whom it was exhibited. A gold torque or band for the neck, the property of her Majesty, by whose gracious permission it was allowed to be exhibited. It is of twisted plaits of gold wire, with massive gold ends for clasps. It was found in Needwood Forest, having been turned up by a fox when burrowing. It is supposed to be of Romano-British date. A silver gilt car, which was given by Queen Elizabeth to the Corporation of Boston, and was used by them on state occasions; but, on the new town-council coming into power in 1832, they actually sold this car to one of the aldermen, by whose widow it was presented to Lord Brownlow, in whose possession it now is, and by whom it was lent for exhibition. An indurated mass of chain mail, found with a skull and javelin head, &c., about 4 or 5 feet below the surface in peat, near Stixwould, on the banks of the river Witham: some of the rings are quite loose, and a gold button is visible on one side. This object is particularly interesting, from the fact of a similar mass having been exhihibited, and also a series of daggers, and some varieties of spurs. A curious head-piece is also exhibited, by Col. Jarvis, of Doddington, which has been used as a cure for scolding wives. It consists of an iron mask, with a tube projecting four or five inches from the mouth. How far this was successful in curing the scolding wives, no documents were exhibited to show.

Some beautiful chalices are also exhibited; one of silver gilt, Florentine workmanship of the fifteenth century, by H. P. Oakes, Esq.; others by Bishop Gravesend, and an unknown ecclesiastic, by the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln. A very large and interesting collection of Roman and Mediæval pottery, as well as of a great variety of Roman fibulæ, keys, and other things, found in the numerous excavations in Lincoln of late years, for the railways and waterworks in and near the town, are exhibited by Arthur Trollope, Esq.

The keys of Fothergay Castle, exhibited by the Archdeacon of Lincoln. An interesting series of keys, from Colchester, London, &c., by W. Whincopp, Esq.

In the evening, a public dinner took place at the Corn Exchange; Earl Brownlow in the chair. The company numbered upwards of 200. After the cloth was drawn, the usual loyal toasts were proposed, and received with acclamation. The Mayor then proposed "Prosperity to the Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, with thanks for their visit to the ancient city of Lincoln." Several other toasts were given, and the dinner was enlivened by the choristers of the Cathedral.

Amongst the company were most of the noblemen and gentry of the neighbourhood. Among the speakers was the Duke of St. Albans, who strongly urged the necessity of every man promoting and encouraging societies such as the Archæological. The meeting was also addressed by Sir C. Anderson, and the Dean of Westminster; and by Mr. Hallam and Mr. Kemble.

WEDNESDAY.

This morning the Sectional Committee on Architecture met in the County Assembly-Room, when Mr. W. Winston read a paper upon the stained glass of Lincoln Cathedral.

Professor Cockerell then read a paper upon the sculpture in the Cathedral; on which ensued an interesting discussion, led by the Marquis of Northampton, as to the relative merits of the English-Gothic and contemporaneous Italian sculpture.

Mr. Penrose next read a paper upon the numerical proportions of height, length, and breadth observable in the principal dimensions of the Cathedral.

Mr. Nicholson then read a paper upon Tattershall Castle, and the circumstances attending its erection by Cromwell, Treasurer to King Henry VI., between the years 1433 and 1443.

Professor Willis next gave a viva voce description of the history of the construction of the Cathedral, tracing its peculiarities under different architects; and after the conclusion of the evening service, the Professor led a large party round the Cathedral, and pointed out the details in the transitions of the several periods of architecture. Dr. Bonney, Archdeacon of Lincoln, subsequently read a very curious paper illustrative of certain monuments in the Cathedral which have no dates nor inscription of any kind; but from the armorial bearings upon them the Archdeacon has, with much labour and ingenuity, ascertained to whose memory they were erected. They are called the Burghersh monuments. After a vote of thanks, proposed by Lord Brownlow, the sitting terminated.

EAST END OF THE CHANCEL OF ST. MARY LE WIGFORD CHURCH.

Wigford, one of the most interesting churches in Lincoln; this portion, having been barbarously covered with lath and plaster, was opened for the inspection of the Archæological Institute. It is a fine specimen of early English, of particularly good, simple design; it contains two lancet windows, but the hood mouldings, bosses, and capitals are much

HOSPITIUM, OR MONK'S BARN.

OLD FREE SCHOOL, NOW THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

Some curious relics of the Pretender are exhibited by Mr. Hamilton Grey. Two pistols set in silver, which belonged to Charles Edward. The beretto, or red skull-cap, and the mitre of Cardinal York, the Pretender's brother.

The iron arm of De Clephane (the ancestor of the late Marchioness of Northampton), and an engraved ivory horn of De Clephane, described in Sir Walter Scott's "Border Antiquities," both exhibited by the Marquis of Northampton.

The Regalia now used by the Corporation of Lincoln, as well as two of the old swords and a cap of maintenance, which had formerly been used. The Lincoln copy of Magna Charta, one of the most perfect, and an original: the writing is exceedingly distinct, and the letters beautifully formed: exhibited by R. Swan, Esq.—A processional cross, silver gilt, probably Flemish workmanship, of the fifteenth century, deposited by E. J. Willson, Esq., who also contributed several magnificently-embroidered chasubles, and other portions of the vestments of the Romish Church.—An antependium of the time of Edward I., exhibited by Bruno Bowden, Esq.

Italian applique embroidery, of sixteenth century, exhibited by Digby Wyatt, Esq.

The Honourable Board of Ordnance have kindly allowed a series of 15 helmets of different dates, all from the Tower Armoury, to be exhibited, and also a series of daggers, and some varieties of spurs. A curious head-piece is also exhibited, by Col. Jarvis, of Doddington, which has been used as a cure for scolding wives. It consists of an iron mask, with a tube projecting four or five inches from the mouth. How far this was successful in curing the scolding wives, no documents were exhibited to show.

mutilated: some ancient painting, of floriated pattern, was discovered above the windows; and in the gable is a quatrefoiled opening.

Next is the Hospitium, commonly called "the Monk's Barn," about a mile and a half south-east of Lincoln, the remains of a small monastic establishment, said to have been a cell to St. Mary's Abbey, at York. The ruins consist chiefly of the walls of the Chapel, which are late Norman work, with perpendicular windows inserted.

A large old monastic structure, formerly the Free School, and now occupied by the Mechanics' Institute, is next illustrated: it is a good example of the Domestic Architecture of the Middle Ages, which is unusually abundant at Lincoln.

Remains of the Bishop's Palace.—These fine vestiges have already been noticed.

The Newport Gate, the most perfect specimen of a Roman Gate remaining in Britain, is next engraved.

And lastly, the ruined Keep Tower of Lincoln Castle, which in general character resembled the keeps of Arundel, Carisbrook, Tunbridge, and other Norman castles.

Next week we shall resume our Illustrations of this very important and interesting meeting. The Institute has never before had so congenial a place for assembling; since now, as in Gough's time, "there are more remains of old buildings in the city of Lincoln than any other place in England."

KEEP TOWER OF THE CASTLE.

THE FREE EXHIBITION GALLERY, AT KNIGHTSBRIDGE.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

THE little company at this theatre are gaining ground in public favour. The entertainments are of that light style suited to the droppers-in at a theatre, as well as to summer weather; and there is evidence of great care in the different departments of the management.

Mr. A. Wigan's Monsieur Jacques has been the chief attraction. We spoke in detail, a fortnight ago, of this gentleman's admirable impersonation of the character, and we can only add, that it improves upon repetition.

A half allegorical domestic sketch called "Emigration! the Remedy," apparently suggested by the late agitations in favour of emigration, was produced on Monday, with entire success. It is very short, and slight in construction, but fills up a pleasant half-hour, and terminates with a rustic dance at an Australian harvest home, which brings down the curtain to great applause.

Vining was the husband, and Mr. Butler and Mr. Turner made great fun as the two servants. We can conscientiously recommend the "Law for Ladies" to the notice of either sex. A new farce, called "Founded on Facts," is in rehearsal.

THE INSTITUTION OF THE FREE EXHIBITION OF MODERN ART GALLERY, HYDE-PARK-CORNER.

THIS body of Artists exhibited last year in the Egyptian Hall, in Piccadilly. It now tenants the Gallery which was some years since built by the proprietor of the Chinese Exhibition; and does so with a marked and very evident advance in the quality and proportion of excellence observable on the part of its members. As regards light, the Gallery is admirably adapted for the purposes it has been selected for, and the Exhibition may now challenge severe criticism with advantage to itself. In its address to the public, the Committee of Management state that the three objects sought by this Institution are "Freedom for the artist; certainty of exhibition for his works; and the improvement of public taste." The two first are practical objects enough, and the honesty of their announcement deserves all praise. Of the latter, the less said the better. Every rational observer of the politics of English art knows that the only improvement in public taste recognised by the exhibitor at the Royal Academy in the Suffolk-street Gallery, or in this institution, is the sale of his own works. An attempt is also made to apologise for some oddities shown in the hanging of the gallery, on the score that each artist pays for his place, and hangs his picture as he chooses. This is scarcely a sufficient excuse. The Society might reserve for themselves the right of selecting the best work of each individual for

MR. WIGAN AS "MONSIEUR JACQUES."

"Law for Ladies," also a new piece, is by Mr. A. Wigan, and affords that gentleman another opportunity of showing his versatility as an actor. He is one of the very few performers who contrive to make us see an intention in all they do—not the result of conventional stage tuition, but much reflection and observation of actual life. Hence we never detect him in such traditional pronunciations as "gyarden," "skyies," or "umble:" he speaks according to the well-bred parlance of the day. This little piece is founded on the mutual jealousy of a husband and wife, commencing on their wedding-day, but of course ultimately cleared up. The plot is exceedingly ingenious, but would not tell well on paper, from the elaboration of its delicate intrigue. Mr. Wigan plays Mr. Percy Pennicton, a barrister; and the amusing manner in which he tries to bring about a separation, getting up false grounds for the suit, addressing his intended witnesses, and every minute throwing in some absurd scrap of legal reference, kept the audience in roars of laughter. Mrs. Wigan, as the wife (Mrs. Alfred Howard), was equally effective. The aggravating nonchalance of a woman anxious to annoy was excellently assumed. Mr. F.

the best place in his own hired number of square feet. Painters are curious judges of their own merits.

He more prominent members of the committee are Messrs. R. S. Lander, Oliver, Nieman, M'Ian, Peel, Duke, Middleton, A. and E. Corbould, and G. A. Williams.

Mr. Corbould exhibits the largest, and, in point of manual dexterity and colour, the finest work in the Gallery. This is No. 203. It is the subject he last year exhibited in Westminster Hall, under the auspices of the Committee for the Encouragement of the Fine Arts "A Yorkist Minstrel Pub lishing the News of the Defeat of the Lancastrians at Tarton Field:" in those days printing-presses were unknown. A large breadth of chiaroscuro is arranged to clear up the ground plan of this picture, but its general ability and power are unmistakeable.

218 is from the pencil of the same painter, and is redu ed from his cartoon of "The Spirit of Chivalry," exhibited in 1844 or 1845, at Westminster Hall. It is a single figure of a mounted knight in armour, and is a good and ver study 104 is the best picture Mr. R. S. Lander exhibits. He calls it "Amina on the Raft." Its most conspicuous merit is its originality, and the fine and poetic colour of the sky. Nothing can be simpler and less obtrusive than the general character of this composition.

No. 89 is the "Scene from the Gentle Shepherd" last year hung at the Academy by Mr. Dukes. It has undergone a good deal of re-painting, and is greatly improved. It is, clear and manner, a very charming painting 78, "The Temptation of St. Anthony," by the same painter, though careful and judicious, is scarcely so complete a picture.

83, "A Scene from the Novel of 'Woodstock,'" is painted well by J. G. Middleton, but wants vitality. The attitude of the man bearing the child on his shoulder is good, and more living than the rest of the picture.

88 is a large "Portrait of Viscount Neville," also by Mr. Middleton It is of the usual average interest of full-length portraits.

Mr. Peel's landscapes are, with one or two exceptions, very unpretending and very excellent. Some peculiarity of manner is visible, more especially in the touch, but not sufficiently so to subject their painter to the reproach of oddity. 130, "Richmond in Yorkshire," is his largest painting. The distance is very aerial, and exquisitely modest in point of colour; the touch throughout clear and firm, although perhaps a little too formal in the larger foliage to the left of the picture. Greater vigour might also have been beneficial in the foreground.

90. "Highland Cearnich Defending a Pass," is painted by R. R. M'Ian. He displays considerable vigour and intention, more careful and almost good drawing, and one or two solid and fine passages of colour.

122, "The Little Sick Scholar," by Mr. M'Ian, is a charming bit of sentiment.

96, "The Belated Peasant," by David Scott, is a Fuseliesque piece of tone and composition, which rather arrests than detains the eye.

309, "Peter the Hermit Preaching the Crusade," sins upon the same error of colour, which is heated and unpleasant; but gives promise that the painter may do more

124, "The Virgin Mary," by Mrs. Robertson, would have been a clever canvas for a child's first subject. This lady paints well; but was is vigour and aplomb to deal with the sacred in Art, even if she possessed a sufficiently thoughtful idea elevation of style

18, when examined closely, shows a firm and easy hand, great crispness of colour, and a fine capacity for detail. It is by Mr. Oliver

31, by the same painter, is brilliantly and cleverly painted

13 is a very clever animal painting, called "The Trespassers," by A. Corbould. The background is especially broad, and fine in colour, being one annoying bit of yellow to the left of the canvas

309 comes from the studio of the same artist. It is modestly called the "Portrait of a Gentleman," and is the cleverest of the small pictures in the Gallery.

Niemann's best landscape is 429, "The Thames near Maidenhead." It is skilfully composed, and the manner and colour are alike fine. The distance is distinguished by his usual aerial and filmy beauty. It is a capital work of landscape art.

3, "Waterloo Still, Nature," shows him in the pursuit of singularity in effect. The sky is undeniably original and powerful, and the distance admirably painted; but a scarcely similar excellence is observable in the foliage of the right of the road.

135 is a very careful and finely-painted subject, by J. I. Under, called "Toilet," with a look of portraiture about it

In addition to these pictures there are some careful little specimens of Kuhl; some too chalky canvasses by Bass; some good colour by Pasmore and A. W. Williams; a very charming little flower painting, by J. Robin (61); a very clear and daylight piece of "Female Costume," by Mrs. Duncan (74); and one by Mrs. Dickser, painted softly and firmly; some good sculpture, by Mr. Earle; which will well repay the time devoted to their examination.

As a whole, the exhibition is a promising one, as regards the future of the Institution, which possesses, in addition to its other merits, the great one in the eyes of a large proportion of the public, that of gratuitous admission to its gallery

PARIS FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.

The apparent calm which Paris at this moment enjoys permits it to resume its natural physiognomy: the several visages bear still an expression of grief, but no promenaderies venture at certain hours of the day to walk on the Boulevards, visit the nouvelle bâtiste, and display their gracefull costumes in the Champs Elysées. The toilettes during the warm weather are excessively light, and the dresses the most generally worn are robes peignoirs (dressing-gowns) of jaconot or Scotch cambric, figured on a white ground. These peignoirs have large capes to match, which are trimmed like the gown. The simplest trimmings are the prettiest; they consist usually of little flounces, an inch and a half broad, goffered. They make the interior of the peignoir very full. Some peignoirs are trimmed almost with two rows of flounces, embroidered and open-worked. It has a blouse bodice drawn in at the waist by a string case. With this new and light attire coarse cream-coloured shoes, with a Mexican heel, are worn, and no stockings. This kind of ornament, extremely simple, is very fashionable. At home, a peignoir of Indian muslin embroidered is often worn, over a transparent slip For going out en négligé, Nankin dresses in fashion. The peignoirs have large capes to match, white muslin embroidered capes, are worn. Square muslin shawls, with a richly embroidered border and elaborate corners, are also a novelty of elegant simplicity

For demi-toilettes may be seen a number of dresses in Indian foulard, French blue, or chesnut colour, with large white spots, or some Persian design. Or, Nankin dresses braided with green or garter; the skirts very full and tucked, short enough to let you perceive a little shoe à gutteres; the bodice tight, very high, with a little band to sustain the collar; the sleeves half full, buttoned at the wrist, terminated by garemma fendus, from under which escape large pointed cuffs.

For demi-toilettes, I passes a revers or an échelle are much worn, with silk or velvet ribbons, or Gothic, and under-sleeves. A great many barèges, figured with white flowers, green and white, French blue crumbs, are also worn.

On plain poplins we have remarked narrow ribbon velvet used, in patterns similar to braiding. Lace flounces are sometimes surmounted with several rows of velvet.

Among other Parisian novelties we have seen a dress of bright green silk, ornamented with montenets of ribbon the same colour, terminated on each side by narrow black lace. Another dress is of white muslin, figured in the front with wide ribbon, from the bodice to the bottom of the skirt. To this ribbon was attached a row of little steel buckles, very narrow, and placed half an inch apart.

We have also observed delightful toilettes worn by two merveilleuses. The first was composed of a silk dress with thousands of stripes, white and rose de Chine, ornamented with little buttons of mother pearl, with a cape like it, very full, and frills pinked; a nice straw bonnet, trimmed with a tenffe d'aurore. The other was a la, with a thousand stripes, white and dove-colour, with an over-skirt entumée in the same material, trimmed with broad lace; a full body, made in puffings, ornamented with cuvérures (bunches of fruit or flowers). These two novel toilettes are in distinguished favour.

The accompanying Engraving displays them perfectly. The toilette of the lady placed on the left consists of an Indian muslin dress, with two flounces headed with puffings, over a white silk slip; and a white taffeta mantle trimmed with a deep fall of muslin, figured à cette de coq: the bonnet of white crape in puffings. On the left is seated a lady with a light nut-brown silk dress, the front is ornamented with Polish brandebourgs bouillonnés, the whole length: a Tuscan bonnet of a small shape and dome-crown, a silk curtain trimmed with straw; to ornament it, two rows of straw placed flat on two pieces of silk, the edges of which project, and a bouquet, whence escape the long white feathers curled. A white China crape shawl; gutrement-sur-brown color. The lady in the background has on a peach-coloured silk dress, low à la Raphaël, and short sleeves. The bodice is much imprisoned by a ruche à la manite on the front; a tucker of thin muslin is placed inside the dress, and it reaches the throat; and muslin sleeves in puffings descend to the wrist. The cap en Anglieterre glaneuse style, with light decorations of lace and pink rosettes at the side. The gentleman at the back is in a visiting costume. The coat nearly meets; and though it has two rows of buttons, it ought never to be closed or crossed: they scarcely join the two sides with the help of an elegant jabe. For visiting they wear a gilet rond and a pantalon habillé, that is to say, half-tight. As we have mentioned gentlemen's visiting toilettes, we may describe those for the promenade. Thus, a summer gilet habillé, a waistcoat à échelle, rather tight trousers, and a hat à la Franklin, form their toilette—equally suitable for town or country. As for mises de fantaisie for the country, adopted by certain élégants, it consists of a coat sack, a waistcoat à échelle, striped trousers, and a cap. At the first glance this dress appears slovenly; but, worn by a man of taste, it becomes tolerable in the country or in a garden.

NEW CHURCH AT SOUTH LAMBETH.—On Thursday, the foundation-stone of a new church was laid by the Rova. Hignness the Duke of Cambridge, near Lansdow ne-road, South Lambeth. A very large and respectable assemblage witnessed the ceremony. His Royal Highness was accompanied to the ground by the Rev. Evan Nepean, chaplain to the Duchess of Gloucester; and the whole of the clergy of Lambeth were present. At the close of the ceremony "God save the Queen" was sung. The new church will be a good specimen of the early English style, and will accommodate 1200 persons, the majority of the sittings being free.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

REMOVAL OF THE COURT TO OSBORNE.—On Saturday last the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, left Buckingham Palace in a carriage and four, at twenty-five minutes before three o'clock in the afternoon, for her Majesty's marine residence, Osborne, Isle of Wight, which they reached some time after six o'clock. Four Royal carriages and four followed, containing the Royal children and their attendants. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were conducted to their carriage by the Lord Steward, the Master of the Horse, the Groom of the Stole, the Vice-Chamberlain, Lord Canopy, Viscount Clifden, Sir Edward Bowater, Captain Francis Seymour, and Sir James Clark. The august party was escorted from the Palace to the Nine Elms station by a party of the Prince Albert's Own Hussars, and left for Gosport by a special train on the London and South-Western Railway. There was no addition to the Royal dinner party.

On Sunday her Majesty and his Royal Highness took their usual early walk in the grounds at Osborne, and the Royal Children were taken their accustomed airing. Divine service was performed by the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, at eleven o'clock.

On Monday morning the Queen and Prince Albert took an early walk, accompanied by the Royal Children, who rode and walked in the grounds at Osborne Lord and Lady Cowley had the honour of dining with the Royal party.

On Tuesday, the unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Albert from taking their usual early walk, and the Royal children from taking their accustomed walk and ride in the pleasure-grounds of Osborne

On Wednesday her Majesty and the Prince walked in the grounds of Osborne, accompanied by the Royal children. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Caroline Murray and Lieut.-Colonel the Hon. A. Liddell, arrived at Osborne in the afternoon, on a visit to her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Augusta Bruce, left Clarence House, St. James's, at nine o'clock in the morning, for her residence, Frogmore House, near Windsor.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Apprehensions regarding the sufficiency of the approaching harvest, added to the appearances of disease in the potatoes, have considerably influenced the Money Market during the week. It is understood that the Bank of England has been selling Exchequer Bills for some days past, and several leading banking firms have also realised; while the discount houses now limit business to short-dated paper. Such a sudden change in financial policy is a striking indication of anticipated scarcity, and the public money, resulting from the monthly purchasing foreign corn. The troubled state of the Continent renders an exchange, in the shape of foreign trade, highly improbable; and paying for it in gold, limits our circulating medium, rendering money scarce. Preparations for such a contingency being so generally adopted in quarters usually the best informed, inspires a belief that the fulness, under the late panic, will be considerably exceeded. Such a prospect, in the present absence of employment at home, and the universal cessation of trade abroad, cannot be regarded without the most intense alarm. At present, however, it may be reasonably hoped, that the dread of such a probability has created more than usual caution. In that case the measures adopted by the monied interest can only be regarded as prudent preparations, and not the result of any positive apprehension of the future.

Inaction was the principal characteristic of Monday's market. A general inclination to avoid business until the arrival of accounts from Ireland, descriptive of the feelings which led to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was observed prevailed. Consols opened at 85¾, advanced to 87¼, and closed at 87; for Money, and 87¼ ⅜ for Time. But on Tuesday a decline of 1¾ per cent was registered. The unfavourable state of the weather for the harvest, the probability of the interference of France in Italy, and the anxiety regard[illegible] Mrs. agitated the market during the day. At opening the marke[illegible] ⅝, gradually declined to 85¾, afterwards improving to 86 ⅜ ⅝, and, just previously to the close of business, a sudden fall to 86¾ ⅜ occurred. A partial recovery succeeded on Wednesday, Consols opening at 86¾ to 86, and advancing progressively to 87 for Money, and 87⅛ for the Account. This price, however, declined, and 86¾ ⅜ was the last quotation. Thursday's market displayed some buoyancy; at opening, Consols quoting 86¾ to ⅞ for August, and gradually advancing to 86¾ ⅞. Upon the receipt of the Irish unfavourable state of the weather for the harvest, the probability of the interference of France in Italy, and the anxiety regard[illegible] ⅛, gradually declined, and 86¾ was the last quotation. Exchequer Bills have greatly declined, and on Thursday 98 a, upon a large sale made by the gentleman who usually acts for the Bank of England. India Bonds have no materially varied. The market at closing was heavy, at the following rates:

Bank Stock, 196; Reduced, 87¼ ⅜; New 3¼ per Cent. Annuities, 85¾; Long Annuities (to expire Jan., 1860), 8 13 16ths; Ditto, 30 years (Jan. 5, 1860), 8 11-16ths; Ditto, 30 Years (1880), 16¼; India Stock, 240; India Bonds, — Ditto under £1000, pr. c. Consols for Account, 86¾; Exchequer Bills £1000, June, 2s pr. £1000, March, 34 pr.; £500, June, 24 pr.; Small, June, 34 pr.

There has been a very limited business transacted in Foreign Securities, and generally at a decline. Dutch Stock has not maintained the value of the preceding week, but Mexican has been more in demand, although not sufficient to create any advance in prices. Turkey's new loan goods, and is generally neglected, and no change of importance afterwards occurred, as the closing prices will display:—Brazilian Bonds, 80½; Buenos Ayres Account, 17½; Russian Bonds, 99¾; Spanish Five per Cent., 1840, 11¼; Belgian Four-and-a-half per Cent., 66; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 44½; Ditto Four per Cent. Certificates, 70.

The events of the week operated unfavourably on the Share Market, as the following prices will best show:—Australasian, 27½; Oxford, 4; Oxford Junction, 2¾; Bristol and Exeter, 54½; Caledonian, 26⅜; Eastern Counties, 14; Ditto, Five per Cent., 5; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 38; Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee, 41; Great Northern, 84; Great Western, 61; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 18; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 71; Ditto, Fifths, 7⅜; Ditto, New, Guaranteed, 5 per Cent., 103; Ditto, Newcastle and Berwick, 36; Leeds and Thirsk, 23; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 81; Do., Consol., 40; Do., New 4 per Cent. Stock, 103; Cent., 52; Lond. and N.-West., 126; Do., New, 8; Lond. and S.-Western, 47½; London and Blackwall, 10; Manchester, 94; North Staffordshire, 9½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 37; South-Eastern, 2, 1; Ditto, No. 4, Thirds, 9½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 32; Ditto, Original New and Berwick, 36½; Ditto, Extension, No. 4, 7¼; Ditto, ditto, No. 3, 11¾; Ditto, Great Northern and Eastern Preference, 8½; York and North Midland, 67; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 31. Boulogne and Amiens, 6⅞; Sambre and Meuse, 2¼

SATURDAY MORNING.—The market opened yesterday, with a fractional improvement upon the closing prices of the preceding day. Consols scarcely reflect after the first quotation, until the appearance of the second edition of the morning papers, when they rallied to Money, Consols closing at 86¾ for Money and Time.—The Foreign Market was heavy, and the Shareholders was little attended to: neither varied materially.

THE MARKETS.

[CORN EXCHANGE (Friday). The quantity of English wheat on sale to-day was limited nevertheless the demand for that article, owing to the favourable change in the weather was in a sluggish state, at fully Wednesday's advance in the quotations. The top prices for foreign wheat have been supported. Selected samples received off steadily, at full prices. In the middling and inferior kinds scarcely any business was transacted. Barley and grinding sorts were neglected. We were scantily supplied with barley Most descriptions were, also in sale, but we have no change to notice. Very little malt was offered for sale on the spot, and for forward delivery, were a slow inquiry, at late rates The best parcels of oats were quite as dear. Generally speaking, the oat trade was dull. Beans, peas, Indian corn and flour are not altered.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d to 7½d; of household do, 6d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Liverpool Wool Average.—Wheat, 48s 11d; barley, 30s 1d; oats, 19s 2d; rye, 28s 3d; beans, 33s 11d; peas, 36s 3d

The Seven Weeks' Average Wheat, 41s 2d; barley, 30s 3d; oats, 20s 6d; rye, 30s 3d beans, 36s 9d; peas, 37s 7d

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 9s; barley, 4s 1d; oats, 2s 6d; rye, 6s; beans, 4s 6d; peas, 5s 6d

TEA.—A very steady business is doing in all kinds of tea, and late prices are well supported in every instance. The deliveries continue good

SUGAR.—On the whole the market is firm, but we have no improvement to notice in value Brown lumps are selling at 42s 6d, and grocery ditto at 43s 6d.

COFFEE.—Higher rates have been obtained for most kinds of coffee, with a steady demand

SPICE.—A considerable business has taken place in pepper, at the value of rice. The upward movement, however, is now checked, from the large supplies now on the way

PROVISIONS.—Dutch butter is in good request, at an improvement in the quotations of from 2s to 3s per cwt. Fine Friesland is selling at 90s to 96s, other fine sorts, 78s to 84s; inferior and middling, 64s to 84s per cwt. Irish butter moves off steadily, at very full prices 77s to 81s, Cork, 82s to 84s; Limerick, 76s to 81s; and Tralee, 74s to 78s per cwt. For forward delivery a good house was in demand, at extreme rates. English butter has advanced 1s to 2s per cwt. Fine Devon, 86s to 92s per cwt., and fresh [illegible] Fine bacon is the turn higher [illegible] other qualities at [illegible] Waterford steady, to 56s per cwt. [illegible] Limerick, [illegible] and heavy, 44s to 48s per cwt. Really prime pork is dull at 82s 6d to 87s 6d; all other kinds of provisions support late rates

Tallow.—The market is heavy, and prices are not supported. Now P.C. on the spot is selling at 43s 6d; and old, 43s 3d per cwt. Home make is dull at 43s 6d to 44s per cwt. or 18s 6d.

Oils.—Very little business is doing in the oil market. In prices, however, we have no alteration to notice.

Hay and Straw.—Old meadow hay, £3 to £4; new ditto, £3 5s to £3 10s; old clover, £4 to £5; new ditto, £3 10s to £4 10s; and straw, £1 4s to £1 15s per load

Spirits.—Rum moves off slowly, at last week's prices. In brandy and corn spirits, next to nothing doing

Wool.—There is a better demand for most kinds of wool, at full rates of currency.

Leeds (Friday).—Cloth.—Yesterday, 15s 3d; Stewart's, 15s 3d, Adelaide Penn, 15s 6d, Dudjeon, 15s; Hartley, 15s per yard.

Hops, Friday).—As the holders of hops generally are anxious sellers, and as the dealers purchase with extreme caution, the trade is extremely dull, at further depression of rates The duty is called from £360,000 to £2,0 000. Sussex packets, £2 —s to —s; Kent, ditto, £3 10s to £4 10s; Mid and East Kent, ditto, £3 5s to £3 15s

Smithfield (Friday).—Our market to-day was somewhat heavily supplied with beasts as to number, but their generally quality was by no means first-rate. The primest beasts, consequently, steady sale at Monday's quotations, viz., from 3s 8d to 4s 4d per 8lb. otherwise, the best trade was but a sluggish state, at barely stationary prices. There were on sale about from Lincolnshire, Leicestershire, and other parts of the midland counties, and 316 calves from Essex, Suffolk, &c., also 200 sheets from Scotland. The supply of sheep was somewhat [illegible] of the Rev Nicholas Thales, of Sandhurst, Berks, to Isabella, [illegible] to Mr. John Greenwood, and clearance was effected. The sale for lambs was heavy, at [illegible] in value of 2s per 8 lb. Calves—the supply of which was good—met a dull inquiry, at nearly 4s rates. In pigs—next to nothing was doing. Milch cows sold slowly, at from £15 to £18 each, inferior shelf ditto, calf

Beasts, to rank the offals.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; second quality ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; prime large ones, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 2d to 4s 4d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; second quality ditto, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; prime coarse woolled ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime South Downs, ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 2d; large coarse calves, 3s 8d to 4s; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d [illegible] 3s 10d to 4s 8d; [illegible] pork, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; prime ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 2d; [illegible] 4s 4d to 4s 8d; [illegible] 4s 4d to 4s 8d; [illegible] 4s 4d to 4s 8

REMOVAL OF A DWELLING-HOUSE AT IPSWICH.

ALTHOUGH the economy, under certain circumstances, of removing entire buildings, either of brick or stone, has been fully and repeatedly demonstrated by our Transatlantic brethren, the example has not been extensively followed in this country. The greatest undertaking of the kind was, we believe, performed some years since; this was the removal of the Sunderland lighthouse, a stone building, 69 ft. high, and 15 ft. in diameter at the base, to the end of the New Pier, where it now stands, being 447 ft. 4 in. from its original position.

Our Engraving represents a similar experiment that has lately been successfully carried out upon a brick-built dwelling-house on Messrs. Ransome and May's Orwell Works, at Ipswich

These gentlemen, having added upwards of an acre of ground to this already extensive establishment, found that the house in question stood in the way of the proposed additions to the machinery and workshops employed in the general manufacture of railway appliances and agricultural implements; accordingly it was at once decided to remove the opposing house to the new boundary line, a distance of 70 ft.

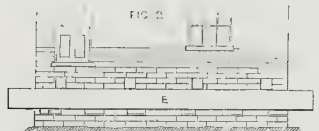
A series of holes, 6 in. square and 3 ft. apart, were first cut through the back-end wall, near the ground; through these holes were inserted timbers (A, Fig. 1), about 6 inches square and 4 or 5 feet long, resting on blocks (B B), between these blocks and the timbers were inserted a pair of folding wedges (C C). These being set up tight, part of the foundation (D) was taken away, and in its place a timber (E) was laid, with folding wedges (F) between it and the remains of the foundation. Holes were then cut in the side walls, opposite the chimney H (Fig. 3), to admit the timbers I I. After these had been placed, the front end was supported in the same manner as the back (E, Fig. 2). These four timbers being blocked up under the two ends and chimney, holes were cut along the sides (K K), between the cross timbers, the same as over E, Fig. 2; and supported as A, Fig. 1. The side foundations were then removed, and the timbers M (Fig. 4), with a joint of mortar to bed the brickwork upon, were inserted under the cross timbers (I I) and end timbers E J, Fig. 3), and, with the timber L, carried the entire weight of the building.

REMOVAL OF A HOUSE AT IPSWICH.



Under these timbers a series of Lattie jack screws (about 12) were placed, and the whole raised about 2 feet 6 inches; when the larger timbers (G), being well greased on their upper surface, were placed underneath K K, and L, Fig. 3, or M, Fig. 4. The screws being then removed, the timbers G received the weight, and the house was propelled to its destination by means of screw-jacks, as shown in our large Engraving.

THE CHOLERA.—In St. Petersburgh, on the 7th of July, there were 3571 persons ill of the cholera, to these 1017 were added during the day of these 222 recovered, 576 died; on the 8th there were 3790 sick, 853 were attacked during the day—574 died, 172 recovered. On the 9th there were 3817 patients in the hospitals.

TO MDLLE. JENNY LIND.

["JENNY LIND.—We cannot refuse ourselves the pleasure of recording a generous and truly characteristic act of this exquisite singer and noble-hearted woman, which has just come to our knowledge. Madame Solari, the well known seconda donna of Her Majesty's Theatre, has recently been suffering under a pulmonary complaint, of so serious a nature that her physicians have announced the necessity of her immediately relinquishing her profession, and returning to her native land. Yesterday, when on the point of departure, the afflicted artiste received a note, signed 'Jenny Lind.' The gifted writer, after expressing in terms of delicate kindness her lively sympathy with her sister vocalist, adds, that she cannot allow her to depart without some token of remembrance and regard—that Madame Solari must not deprive herself of any comfort which her state requires—and that if at any time she should feel the need of a friend, she must write to 'Jenny Lind.' The letter contained a bank note for £100. We are sure there is not one among the multitudes that have been entranced by this lady's genius who will not feel that, even the genius of 'the Lind' must yield the palm of genuine nobleness to the virtues of the woman."—Morning Chronicle, July 24, 1848.]

OH, Jenny, charming Jenny!
What is that you do?
Will plaudits not suffice you,
From all the crowds that prize you,
But you must act thus kindly,
And make us love you blindly,
And win not plaudits merely,
Which you deserve so dearly,
But our affections too?

Oh, Jenny, gentle Jenny!
You keep our fervour warm;
Sweet singer, fair cajoler,
Kind-hearted grief-consoler,
For charms we bend before you,
For goodness we adore you,
We hear your voice enraptured,
But by your worth we're captured,
You take our hearts by storm.

NEW LANTERN FOR THE EDDYSTONE LIGHTHOUSE.

This new Lantern has just been manufactured by Mr. W. Wilkins, of 24 and 25, Long Acre, by order of the Honourable Corporation of the Trinity House, for the Eddystone Lighthouse, off the port of Plymouth.

This Lantern is of very large dimensions. The frame is of gun-metal, and, exclusive of the light apparatus, it weighs about 7 tons. The extreme external diameter is 11 feet 4 inches; the height of the glass (nearly three-fourths of an inch thick, best English manufacture) is 8 feet; the height of the roof is 6 feet 6 inches; height of ball and vane, 6 feet; and the total height from the floor to the summit of the vane is 30 feet; it is lighted by a fixed dioptric light apparatus of the second order, on the most improved construction, having refractors and zones of polished glass, illuminating the whole of the horizon, and burning at about 90 feet above the level of the sea.

To explain the improved points of construction in this new Lantern, we add a sectional Illustration: A is the Lantern; B, the pedestal; C, the cupola; and D, the ventilating ball. E E are upright supports, which, instead of being 6inches wide, as in the old lantern, are only 1½ inches wide; thus a larger body of light is gained, for the old supports obstructed the light to the effect of 7 degrees when a ship was at some distance off. The new supports are fixed into the granite pedestal by means of the long iron shafts, F F, and secured to the base by the bolts G G; the supports terminating in a graceful scroll. The roof or cupola is sustained by the rafters, and has external and internal support, by means of which much additional strength is gained. An elegant vane surmounts the cupola, and is as useful as well as ornamental finish.

Another novelty is I I, a gully to carry off the water, which flows into a pipe passing down one side of the Lantern.

What a marvel of construction has been this famed Eddystone Lighthouse of Smeaton, which has now withstood the storms of three-quarters of a century!

RE-INTERMENT OF GUNDREDA'S REMAINS.—Our readers will remember the excitement caused in the antiquarian world by the discovery of the coffins of the Norman Gundreda and William de Warenne in the Priory ruins at Lewes, last year. On Tuesday, the 10th instant, these remains were interred in Southover Church, where the very interesting carved Norman slab which formerly covered Gundreda's grave in the Priory has been placed for some years. A mausoleum, of Caen stone, has been erected on the south side of the church.—The Builder.

The export of silk from China to England from July, 1847, to May, 1848, amounted to 21,843 bales, against 17,077 bales in 1846-7.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SYMPATHY WITH REBELLION.—LIVERPOOL.—There being reason to apprehend a movement in Liverpool, to act as a diversion in favour of the insurgents, should a rising take place in Ireland, preparations are accordingly being made by our local authorities to guard against a surprise. From the Liverpool papers of Tuesday we learn that 20,000 special constables have been sworn in in the several wards of that town. Steps have also been taken to organise the corps and to appoint leaders. A place of rendezvous has been taken in each ward, and there a guard is placed night and day, to give the alarm, should the necessity for so doing arise. About 1000 men belonging to the dock works have been sworn in and amply provided with formidable weapons, and all the public buildings in the town are guarded day and night. There can be no doubt, it is stated, that Confederate Clubs are being formed in Liverpool, for the avowed purpose of aiding the people of Ireland in any insurrectionary movement which may be originated. The idea is, that by rising in Liverpool, Glasgow, and other places, whenever a rebellion breaks out in Ireland, troops, instead of being sent across the water, will be kept at home to put down disturbances, and thus the forces of the Government in Ireland will be considerably weakened. It is stated that Clubs to the number of fifty have been established in the former town; that they number 100 men each. The subscription of each member is is a week. The money is spent in the purchase of fire-arms, the general price being about 12s. 6d. a piece. Every night for the payment of subscriptions a raffle takes place for the muskets which the members are enabled to procure with the subscriptions. Several arrests have taken place; and it is hoped that the bold front displayed by the authorities will have the effect of preventing the contemplated outbreak. It may be stated here, as a circumstance showing how much on the alert are those who are endeavouring to repress the rebellious movements of the disaffected, that information was received yesterday morning by the authorities, that two sons of Hyland, the notorious pike-maker of Dublin, arrived from that city in Liverpool on Monday last.

THE magistrates of Birkenhead have requested the inhabitants of that town "to act as special constables for six months." A summons, signed by four magistrates, Colonel Glegg, Mr. W. Hall, Mr. J. W. Harden, and Mr. J. S. Jackson, was served on Sunday to every householder, requiring them to attend on Monday at the Town-Hall and take the necessary oath; and by half past ten every respectable inhabitant was sworn. Accompanying the summons was a notice, signed by Messrs. Townsend and Kent, clerks to the magistrates, informing the parties that "by disobedience to the precept a penalty of £5 would be incurred."

CONFEDERATE CLUB IN MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday evening the members of the several Confederate Clubs met in their respective club-rooms, and proceeded thence, about nine o'clock, in military order, to a large space of vacant ground adjoining the new Roman Catholic Chapel on the Cheetham Hill-road. The number present was very great. No speech was delivered, but three cheers were given for "the cause," immediately after which the assembly dispersed. The intention of holding the meeting having been made known to the authorities, steps were taken to prevent any disorder.

EMIGRATION FROM SCOTLAND.—During the first six months of this year the emigrants sailing from the Clyde alone amounted to 3165. Most of the number were from the Western Highlands, and generally in easy circumstances, and their destinations, for the most part, Canada

THE DUBLIN MAIL.—On Monday next the night mail for Ireland will leave London at eight o'clock as usual, and proceed by Holyhead to Dublin, where it will be due at twelve o'clock the following day. After some time it is expected that this mail will reach Dublin much earlier. On the morning of the same day the London mail which is at present despatched from the Dublin Post-office at twenty minutes after six o'clock, and forwarded via Liverpool, will be detained till twenty minutes after nine o'clock, and then sent off via Holyhead, where it will be considered due at two o'clock the same day, and in London at five o'clock the following morning. The evening mail from Dublin to Liverpool remains as at present.

JUVENILE CRIME AND EMIGRATION.

The conviction has gained ground rapidly within the last few months, that systematic colonisation is at once the most interesting and the most important question of our age; and that, in neglecting to avail ourselves more fully of the magnificent resources of our colonial possessions, we have retarded their prosperity, and very seriously injured our own. So much, however, must be done, if we would effectually relieve our overburdened population at home, and as effectually serve our scantily-peopled dependencies abroad, that we need not indulge the hope that any large plan of colonisation can be speedily matured and carried into operation. Although opinions are all but unanimous that something must be done, opinions are very far from being agreed, either as to the extent of the task, or as to the means of its accomplishment. We may therefore expect, amid all our troubles and perplexities, that a considerable time will elapse before such general agreement is attained, as will justify the hope that Parliament will undertake the matter, or even understand it in all its comprehensiveness. Every one knows that we have immense and highly productive possessions, requiring nothing but labour to make them prosperous and happy, and that we have large bodies of men at home who offer their labour and skill for hire, and find no purchasers who need them; but the problem is, how to bring the two sets of circumstances together, for the mutual advantage of those who starve at home because no one will employ them, and those who suffer abroad because they cannot get hands to do their necessary work? To that problem no sufficient answer has yet been given. Many minds are, however, at work upon it. The more it is discussed, the greater probability there will be of a satisfactory solution; and we therefore hold it of good augury that the question is considered of such importance as it is, and that we hear of Emigration and Colonisation in quarters that used seldom or never to allow such subjects to interfere with their quietude or their meditations. In the meantime, a light is breaking upon the public. Those who cannot see how a plan large enough for the national urgency of the case can be adopted in the aggregate, can yet see how much may be done in detail to relieve us of a burden and to benefit the colonies. It begins to be recognised as a truth, that, with the enormous demands upon our resources which must be met, it is a foolish, if not a suicidal policy to waste our money. It is, at the same time, recognised that we do waste our money abroad by sending too many soldiers and too few labourers to our colonies; and that we still more perniciously waste it at home, by allowing young paupers to become criminals, and by suffering them to be trained up for the penitentiaries, the hulks, or the gallows, at a large cost, instead of being sent abroad, at a small cost, to increase the wealth of the world, and consequently our own.

Upon the first item of our national extravagance the speech of Sir William Molesworth, alluded to in our last, gave some instructive details, which will not, we venture to predict, be lost upon the mind of the community or upon the Government. Upon the second point we intend to offer a few observations to-day, as the subject is before the public. Lord Ashley's speech upon the juvenile destitution and crime of the metropolis, upon moving that an annual grant should be made for aiding Emigration from the Ragged Schools of London, showed to some extent the enormity of the mischief existing at home, and the immensity of the good that might be done in the colonies, by the voluntary expatriation of the young outcasts of society. The subject has since been brought forward more generally by Lord Kinnaird, in a letter to Mr. Wylie, of Liverpool, who had transmitted to his Lordship the petition of the magistrates of that town relative to juvenile delinquency and its cost. The petition contained a statement of the actual cost attending the prosecution of fourteen juvenile offenders. Out of these fourteen children it appeared there was but one of whom there was any hope of reformation. Ten had been transported. One, under ten years of age, had been committed eleven times in five years, and had already cost the country £64 6s. 6½d. Another, aged nine years, had been committed four times, and discharged twelve. The cost of his prosecutions amounted to £64 18s. The aggregate cost of apprehension, maintenance, prosecution, and punishment of these fourteen children amounted to £889. "There would be every chance," says Lord Kinnaird, "that, if these children, instead of being committed to prison, were sent to a reformatory school, at an expenditure varying from £5 to £7 per annum, or a total cost of under £25 or £30, they might have become useful members of society, either at home or abroad." In his Lordship's opinion every one will agree. The experience of London and Liverpool thus coincide; and, in fact, we have but to examine the records of all the prisons of the Empire, to find ample corroboration. In the 29th Report of the Warwickshire County Asylum, just published, it is affirmed that every year's experience renders more clear the duty and expediency, as well as the economy, of making public provision for the reformation of juvenile offenders. The report contains tables showing the actual cost of reformations, and the comparatively small loss there is upon failures. The Committee remark upon the miserable policy of pursuing boys to transportation or to death at a cost of £63 8s. per head, when they might be restored, and become useful members of society, at less than half that amount. In a letter which is appended to the report, signed by the Rev. H. T. Townsend, that gentleman says:—

"I do think that no man could have gone over the gaol with me last week, in its crowded state, without coming to the conclusion that a serious expense must fall on the public from the idleness and contamination to which the juvenile offenders were subjected in the gaol. Let any one reflect upon the fact that, when a juvenile offender becomes a confirmed thief, he lives for ever after at other people's expense. If he is prosecuted, it is at other people's charges; if he is in gaol, he is supported there at the public cost; if he is at large, he lives upon other people's property; if he is transported, he neither pays his own passage nor the cost of his maintenance in the penal colony. Let him reflect upon this, and he will see that the expenses incident to keeping up Warwick Gaol, so as almost to render it a nursery and school for crime, cannot be rightly estimated by any calculation of expenses incurred within its walls. Let him reflect upon the vast expenditure thus attaching to the present system; let him think upon the heavy responsibility, I should rather say the curse, of confirming the young in wickedness, and he will, I should imagine, become an advocate for the adoption of some better system, which, in providing for the reformation of juvenile offenders, will combine the fulfilment of a religious duty with a measure of political expediency and of true economy."

While these are fair samples of the state of a large proportion of the destitute youth of our over-peopled country, and fair estimates at the same time of the amount they cost us to transform them, by means of our prisons, from young thieves into old ones, the Colonies daily cry out for want of hands. A destitute boy too often becomes a thief in England when left to our usual training; but when sent to New South Wales, or Australia, he has no such temptations to evil courses as beset him here, and honesty is both more easy and more profitable than roguery, however much he may be contaminated. A settler in New South Wales, whose letter is quoted by Lord Kinnaird, says:—"Works, both public and private, which should have been performed in past years, have been indefinitely postponed. The members of the Legislative Council of the colony are nearly all large employers of labour, and for the last three years it has been the policy of that body, on private as well as public grounds, steadily to oppose all outlay of money on any public works which could possibly be avoided. Hence gaols, court-houses, bridges, roads, &c., have been left either unfinished or not commenced at all. The same policy has naturally influenced private individuals, and, consequently, I feel I am justified in stating that there is in the colony a large accumulation of labour, the execution or performance of which cannot be much longer deferred."

"The wealthiest," adds Lord Kinnaird, "are frequently obliged to perform for themselves and their friends the most menial offices; and instances are given in the same letter of sheep being folded under the drawingroom windows, and watched by the owners all night, a substitute not being forthcoming at any price to replace those of whose services they have been deprived by death or otherwise. A very trifling addition has been made since February, 1846, to the labouring classes of the colony by means of emigration; but the flocks have increased in nearly ten millions of sheep. For want of people to look after them, the wool is wasted, and thousands of sheep are boiled down for tallow."

Of course there can be no dispute that Emigration is the remedy both for us and the Colonies. It should, however, be fairly adopted, so as to do justice to the unhappy children who are destitute and not criminal, as well as to those who are unfortunately both. It should not be delayed in its application until the recipient of the national relief should have qualified himself by his dishonesty.

Lord Kinnaird proposes, in the first place, that an association for the promotion of emigration in the British colonies, with branches, &c., should be established on the most extended scale—with such a committee, for instance, as was formed for the relief of Irish distress; and, secondly, that corresponding associations should be established in our colonies, by which means the most correct information might be furnished to those wishing to emigrate. Thirdly, he proposes that half the cost of transit should be borne by this country, and half by the colonies—an arrangement which some might consider fair enough, if the colonies were in a condition to accede to it. To us, however, it seems that, as regards juvenile criminals alone, we should not ask the colonies to contribute a farthing. It is not only more philanthropic, more just, more Christian, more desirable in every way, to reform our criminals than to punish them, but it is cheaper. We do not ask our colonies to bear a portion of the large expense of punishment, neither should we expect them to bear any portion of the smaller and more agreeable expense of reforming them by means of emigration, seeing that however much we may benefit the colonies by the scheme, we benefit ourselves still more largely and satisfactorily, both as individuals and as a nation. If for one pound spent in emigration we save three or four in the maintenance of our prisons, we are gainers in every way—gainers in good deeds, gainers in mere money, and benefactors of our colonies. As regards, however, the general subject of emigration and colonisation, there can, we think, be no doubt that the colonies ought to be called upon, and would willingly contribute to the funds for sending them competent adults in sufficient numbers. As regards juvenile criminals, it should be our business, and ours alone, to bear the cost of putting them in the way of becoming useful members of society. They are our children, and upon us the duty devolves in justice of doing something better for them than we have hitherto done. Fortunately the subject is so far a practical one. It is not hampered with the difficulties that attend the larger question of systematic colonisation by adults. There is every probability that while the greater subject is maturing in the mind of the nation, much good may be done in the smaller but vastly important branch of it, to which we have now alluded. It is with this hope that we have dwelt upon and shall again return to it.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

PATRICK ALEXANDER VANS-AGNEW, ESQ., F.I.C.S.

THE cruel murder of this gentleman in India was announced in the recent Overland despatches. His death occurred on the 20th April, in the 26th year of his age.

MR. PATRICK VANS AGNEW was second son of the late Colonel Vans-Agnew, of Barnbarroch, county Wigton, C.B., one of the East India Directors, and great grandson of John Vans, Esq., of Barnbarroch, who, as was usual, on marrying Margaret, only child and heiress of Robert Agnew, Esq., of Sheuchan, the additional surname of Agnew. The family of Vans claims to be a branch of the chivalrous house of Vans, so celebrated in every part of Europe.

THE HON. FREDERICK DRUMMOND

THIS gentleman, a Civil Servant of the Hon. East India Company, died at Penaah, of fever, on the 15th May, aged 26. He was the youngest son of the present Viscount Strathallan, by Amelia Sophia, his wife, daughter of John, fourth Duke of Atholl. This paternally and maternally, the deceased sprang from the most illustrious houses of Scotland and England—the Drummonds, the Murrays, the Hamiltons, the Stanleys, the Brandons, the Tudors, and the Plantagenets. His great grandfather, William Drummond, fourth Viscount Strathallan, was a devoted adherent of the Chevalier in the memorable '45, and fell, gallantly fighting, at the decisive battle of Culloden.

JOHN FITZGERALD PENNIE

THIS distinguished poet, the author of the "Royal Minstrel," was born at East Linton, Dunbartonshire, about the year 1792. His family had long resided in that county, and, though ancient and respectable, had been of a very humble rank. Young Pennie, when only fifteen, composed a tragedy. Led by the private admiration of his friends as to his profession, he went to London and sought fame and employment there, but, for want of patronage, was unsuccessful. His subsequent career was one of much vicissitude; now a clerk in a solicitor's office; then a tutor; and afterwards, for some time, a player. The publication of the "Royal Minstrel," at last, established him in better circumstances. Of this work, that celebrated professor, the Rev. H. Milman, says, "There is in the poem of the 'Royal Minstrel' great power, and still greater promise. An author capable of writing such a work should hereafter be a writer of great eminence. The versification pleases me much." Pennie's second poem was "Reginald," brought out in 1820. It had much merited success. His other productions were exceedingly numerous, and his admirers took much interest in his welfare, that they subscribed together, and presented him with a cottage near Wareham, where the poet and his wife subsequently lived and died. The last years of Pennie's life were embittered by the conduct of his son, for whom he incurred many liabilities. Pennie died on the 13th ultimo, two days after the decease of his wife. He has left several valuable unpublished manuscripts behind him.

THE JOB AND POSTMASTERS', &c., PROVIDENT FUND.—The sixth annual meeting of this society took place at Messrs. Tattersall's, last Monday, evening, Mr. W. D. Dickinson in the chair. It appeared from the report read that the receipts and payments of the society from July 1, 1847, to June 30, 1848, it appeared that on July 1, 1848, the society's investments in Consols amounted to £7691 8s. 6d., and that there was a cash balance of £284 14s. 8d. in the hands of the treasurer.

ASYLUMS, MODEL LODGING-HOUSE.—The Society for Improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes have taken an extensive range of premises at the back of the London and St. Katherine's Dock Hotel, East Smithfield, which they intend to open as one of their model lodging-houses, on Saturday (this day). The building is sufficiently capacious to afford accommodation for 100 persons.

The report from the Select Committee appointed to prepare the militia estimates for the year ending the 31st March, 1849, has been printed, states that the entirety of the charge of the disembodied militia for Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st April, 1848, to the 31st March, 1849, is £122,800. The estimate for the year 1847-8 was £141,910, a decrease on the current year of £21,110.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

There is no news of particular interest this week from France. The Bishop of Digne, the newly-appointed Archbishop of Paris, had arrived in the capital for the purpose of paying a short visit to General Cavaignac. He proposes to return to St. Esprit, his paternal residence, where he will remain until the last possible moment necessary to be said at Rome, when his election will be confirmed.

Opinion respecting the fate of the prisoners arrested for taking part in the insurrection was divided. While it was certain that several of them would be sent to Senegal, and a much larger number to Algeria, it was also understood that some capital executions would take place on Saturday, charged with murder in cold blood. The conviction that Government would act with severity was inducing many to abscond, who might possibly have escaped detection. Very many arrests took place daily, and every manner of denunciations of parties who figured in the conspiracy and the outbreak were made to Government. To these facts were attributed the continued suspension of La Presse and other journals, and the maintenance of the state of siege.

Paris remained tranquil, but the search for arms in the neighbourhood of Paris, and particularly in the villages of Belleville and Menilmontant, every day, continued with unceasing activity. On Saturday a number of muskets were found in houses which had been already searched. Several other weapons were found concealed in the gardens and walls. A loaded musket was found in the cemetery of Père la Chaise, hanging from a cypress near a tomb. On Friday the commune of Bercy was completely disarmed. Several officers of the National Guards of Charenne and Belleville have been arrested and lodged in the Fort of St. Denis.

On Monday, in the National Assembly, M. Maugnin brought forward his motion on the relations of France with the other powers of Europe, notwithstanding an appeal made to him by Bastide against the raising of such a question at the present eventful period, who declared that although he could not prevent M. Maugnin from making his speech, he could, and was in duty bound to avoid answering it. M. Maugnin's speech was a very long and very rambling one. Some charges of a personal nature, which he brought against the members of the administration, brought M Bastide and General Cavaignac into the tribune; but ultimately the Assembly passed to the order of the day, which was the exclusion on M. Thiers' report on M. Prudhon's proposition relative to the seizure of one-third of all sorts of revenues. The hon. deputy developed his motion in an elaborate speech, contending that his proposition was the natural sequence of the Revolution. He considered that property will either destroy the Republic, or the Republic will destroy property. The revolution of February was, in his opinion, the winding up of the old state of society. Of Saturday a number of muskets were seized by force. If the tax he proposed on property was a spoliation, the tax on labour was an assassination.

The Minister of the Interior, M. Senard, after the close of M. Prudhon's address, ascended the tribune, and declared that the Government had never imagined that the tribune of that House should ever have been so disgraced, or France so insulted, as by the speech they had just heard. The Government, in the excitement to revolt and to every bad passion, which had just been uttered. It was proposed by another member, that the speech of M. Prudhon should be excluded from the Moniteur, and that all journals reporting it should be prosecuted. This, however, was opposed by M. Dupin. M. Thiers said. "I am of opinion that an order of the day motivé will best respond to the indignation of the Assembly. I therefore propose the following paragraph of the report:—'Indignation.' (No, no, nobody.) If the Assembly should deem such a course necessary, I am ready to reply to the statement which has just been laid before it, but—(Cries of 'No, no: it is useless.') I desire it to be formally stated that if the Assembly considered no reply to be necessary, it was because it thought better to reply by an order of the day motivé."

At length, it was agreed that the members of the Assembly would be best expressed by the following resolution: "The National Assembly, considering that the proposition of the citizen Prudhon is an odious attack on the principles of public morality; that it is a flagrant violation of the right of property, which is the basis of social order; that it encourages delation, and appeals to the vilest passions; considering, further, that the author of it has calumniated the revolution of February, in wishing to render it an accomplice of the theories which he has developed in the tribune, passes to the order of the day." Upon which the House divided. The total number of representatives voting was 693, and the result of the division was—For the resolution, 691; against it, 2. Of these two, of course, one was M. Prudhon himself; the other, some friend of his, whose name has not transpired. The Assembly has ordered that the names of the members voting, and the members absent, on the division on M. Prudhon's proposition, shall be published in the Moniteur.

General Lamoricière has been attacked with an intermittent fever which he caught in Africa. M. Bedeau was in an alarming state.

It was said that M. Prudhon would send in his resignation as a representative.

The Government has already commenced arrangements for the early removal of 6000 insurgents ordered to be transported.

On Tuesday, in the National Assembly, the much-expected questions were put to the Government respecting the suppression of the journal La Presse, when M Marie, Minister of Justice, declared that the measures taken against that and other journals must be maintained until the laws respecting the journals now in progress of discussion should be passed. He was mainly intimated that if the Assembly should decide to intervene in the matter, he should be compelled to decline the further responsibility of the Government. This cut the debate short, and the Assembly passed to the order of the day. It was then put to the question of the project of a tax on mortgages. It was strongly opposed by M. Jules de Lasteyrie. The discussion had little interest.

The Bank of France has consented to lend 4,000,000 francs (£400,000) to the city of Paris, at four per cent., on certain conditions which are specified.

The Committee of Finance have issued an unfavourable report on the treaty between the Minister of Finance and the Paris Rothschilds. The committee proposed the following combination:—The company would only Lave to complete the railroad as far as Montereau, and would immediately work that portion of the line. Government would take the line from Montereau to Dijon as far as Lyons, and rent that portion of the railway to the company for the whole duration of the treaty coincided when the privileges was granted.

The Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has published the return of the corn trade in the different markets of France, during the first fortnight of July, from which it appears that the hectolitre of wheat sold, on an average, for 17f. 18c., at Toulouse, Gray, Lyons, and Marseilles; 16f. 7c., at Mans; 16f. 6c., at Amiens and Strasburg; 14f. 17c., at Bergues, Arras, Roye, Soissons, Paris, and Rouen; 14f. 12c., at Saumur and Nantes; 16f. 83c., at Metz, Verdun, and Charleville; and 16f. 94c., at St. Lo, Palmpol, Quimper, and Hennebon.

The Chevalier Paiva Pereira was received on Sunday by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to whom he delivered letters of the Queen of Portugal, accrediting him as her Minister to the French Republic.

It is said that the Emperor of Russia has commanded a considerable number of waggons and carriages to be constructed in Paris for the Russian railroads

The Moniteur contains the following decree:—

"The Minister of Finance, considering that the payments in anticipation of the instalments of the new loan have assumed a very great extension, and that it is necessary to maintain the receipts proceeding from that loan in a just proportion with the wants of the service, and not to withdraw abruptly from the movement of affairs too considerable a portion of capital, decrees as follows: The power of paying in anticipation, at a discount of four per cent., the instalments of the loan granted by the 11th article of the decree of the 29th instant, is suspended. (Signed) "GOUDCHAUX.

"Paris, July 31, 1848."

The object of the decree was to check the fall in the funds which resulted from the scarcity of stock thrown on the market, but which has not succeeded, for we find that a still further depression took place on Tuesday

On Wednesday, in the National Assembly, the adjourned debate was resumed on the question of a tax on mortgages derived from landed property. M. Gouin, in the name of the Finance Committee, proceeded to oppose the bill in question, which he denounced as likely to be calculated to promote labour or to encourage the circulation of capital. M. Thiers was the next speaker, who, after a long speech, expressed his own private opinion to the effect that the tax in question, as a permanent impost, was moral, unjust, and radically opposed to all principles of finance. As an expedient he thought it would be insufficient, and would not compensate for the shock which it might give the public credit. M. Thiers observed that he should greatly prefer an income tax, which had already been levied in France before the Revolution. M. Goudchaux, Minister of Finance, defended the measure, at the same time declaiming all connexion with the "revolting doctrines developed since the Revolution." The hon. Minister, after insisting on the fact that the tax was only a temporary one, declared that the Government had determined to make its adoption a Cabinet question. The debate was then adjourned, in accordance with the sense of the Chamber. After a speech from M. Berryer, the general discussion was closed. The Finance Committee, to which the project of decree had been referred, had come to a resolution adopting it. The proposition having been put from the chair, was negatived by a very small majority, and the assembly proceeded to discuss the first article, to the effect of authorising the establishment of a tax on mortgages. The bill, of 1848 only, on the revenues derived from mortgages existing previous to the 16th April last.

The Committee on the Constitution is proceeding rapidly to the conclusion of its labours, in conjunction with the delegates from the standing committees of the National Assembly. They commenced the 6th chapter, which treats of the Judicial functions, on Wednesday. Ten committees out of fifteen have declared against the election of the President of the Republic by the Assembly. They determined that the appointment should be decided by universal suffrage. There was a considerable difference of opinion among the delegates relative to the Council of State. A new project was adopted, by a majority of 18 votes to 17, constitution, with some trifling modifications. MM. Thiers and Cremieux, the delegates from the 3rd and 10th Committees, warmly supported the Constitution of the existing Council of State, which, however, is opposed by its own members. It is believed that the Commission will have concluded with the delegates after two or three sittings.

The standing committees of the National Assembly met on Tuesday, to elect their monthly organization. This operation gave a party lately formed in the assembly an opportunity of trying its strength. Some time after the opening of the Assembly, two ballot-boxes were formed. One established its seat close to the Rue de Poitiers, the other in the Palais National. The latter shortly attracted the greatest part, detached Ballard, and held its sittings in the Palace of the Institute, having adopted the title of the conciliatory party. The other fraction continued to sit at the Palais-National, under the Presidency of M. Glais-Bizoin.

They had determined to vote together. It appears, however, that discord has again arisen amongst its members, and the advanced party has formed a body apart, styled pure or absolute democrats. This club has appointed a committee of direction. M. Audry de Puyraveau has been elected honorary president; M. Guinard, effective president; M. David d'Angers, Vice-President; and MM. Auguste Mie and Chaffour, Secretaries. The committee is composed of MM. Caussidière, Joly, Demosthène Ollivier, Bac, and Germain Sarrut. The number of this club does not exceed forty or fifty. The committee had determined that the members of the club should vote against M. Prudhon's proposition; but M. Greppo, one of them, voted for it. On Tuesday the meeting named its candidates as Presidents and Secretaries of the committees. The other fractions offered no opposition. The late Presidents and Secretaries were re-elected except in the ninth committee, where the absentists denounced were elected. With the aid of their former allies of the club Glais-Bizoin, to appoint M. Latrade President, in place of M. Dupin the elder.

SPAIN

Accounts from Madrid to the 27th ult have come to hand

The Queen was still at La Granja, and was to hold, on the 29th, the grand levee, commemorative of the 25th, on the occasion of her mother's birthday

The political chiefs of the provinces of Valladolid, Burgos, Alava, and Guipuzcoa had informed the Government by telegraph on the 26th that the most perfect tranquility prevailed in them.

PORTUGAL

Advices from Lisbon to the 29th ult. have been received. They contain no intelligence of interest. The Queen and Court were at Cintra. Her Majesty's husband, the Prince of Saxe Coburg, had met with an accident there a few days previously, having been thrown from his horse; falling on his face, he was slightly disfigured, but no injury of consequence resulted. A Spanish steamer of war had been sent to cruise on the coast as far as Bilboa, to intercept an English steamer expected with arms

ITALIAN STATES

PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY.—The accounts from the seat of war this week have been most conflicting. As well as we can disentangle the confused statements that have reached us, they present in brief the following state of affairs. The Austrians swept the whole country before them on the 23d ult., and were beaten on the 24th. On the 25th a pitched battle raged between them and the Piedmontese until night, when the latter retreated, carrying with them, however, 2000 prisoners they had made on the 24th. The details may be understood from what follows. On Sunday, the 23d, a part of the Piedmontese army, being suddenly attacked, was forced to fall back. On Monday, the 24th, Charles Albert, having learned from Marshal de Villa Franca, re-took the positions which had been captured the day before, re-established his entire line, and, after eight hours' combat, caused the Austrians such considerable losses as to open to him the prospects of a complete victory on the morrow

On Tuesday, the 25th, whilst the Piedmontese artillery thundered from the heights of Somma Compagna on the already shattered Austrian army, a new corps of the latter, which had come down from Verona, where Radetzky had concentrated all his forces from Legnano and Vicenza, attacked the rear of the Piedmontese army. This movement had been only rendered possible by the defection, or rather the want of courage of the new Lombard levies and the treason of the Modenese, who, on the approach of the Austrians being signalled at Sallonze and Monzambano, abandoned all their positions, and the roads conducting to their rear. The Piedmontese were therefore obliged, after a meritorious resistance, to retire on Villa Franca; after nightfall it was found necessary to continue this movement of retreat and to fall back on Goito, which they did in good order, carrying with them 2500 prisoners, living proofs of the bright success which marked the 24th. This movement of Charles Albert is explained by the necessity he was under of rejoining his reserves on the line of the Mincio. Peschiera is defended by the left wing of the army, commanded by General de Sonnaz.

ROME.—The neutral attitude which the Pope wishes to hold respecting the Austrians, against whom his subjects and the Italians formally to declare, has shorn him of much of his popularity, particularly as his Prime Minister, Mamiani, and his colleagues, are said to be in favour of war against Austria. This state of matters has led to the most unfounded rumours in the French journals, about a "Provisional Government" having been formed, and other revolutionary steps taken by the people of the "Eternal City." Letters from Rome of the 24th ult. give the most positive contradiction to these reports, and mention that there had been an idea entertained of appointing a Committee of War, which had given rise to the report of a "Provisional Government." The Ministry of Mamiani, however, retained their portfolios. The Chamber of Deputies had suspended its sittings until the formation of a new Cabinet. It was reported that the Pope had requested M. Rossi, the late French Ambassador, to compose a Ministry, but he had declined the honour from ill health.

On Wednesday, the 26th, another great battle was fought between the Austrians and the Piedmontese, which ended in the total defeat of the latter, after a heroic struggle for victory. From their retreat beyond the Mincio to Asola, and their partial disorganisation. The following particulars of the battle are interesting:—The principal attack was directed against Cittora, Somma Campagna, and Sona, where the Austrian reserve was in force, well provided with artillery, and a large body of Hussars, ready to profit by any occasion that presented itself. The attack was impetuous, and the resistance great, but the valour of the Piedmontese prevailed, and at one period, before a moment in their ranks; but the Austrians were reinforced by drafts from their battalions on Vinello, and the Piedmontese were driven back. Not undaunted by this reverse, the gallant leader of the Italian Albert re-formed at the foot of the heights, and again advanced, carrying everything before them; but on the hills they were again met by increased forces, and the battle hung for some time in the balance. The troops had now fought five in the morning till five in the evening. They were left without refreshment, and no care had been taken to provide for a reserve. At this moment Radetzky, who seemed to have thrown all his forces into the struggle, everything, advanced from Verona at the head of 20,000 men he had called in from Venice, Vicenza, Padua, and the whole of the Venetia, and falling with these fresh troops on the flank of the gallant Sardinians, whilst Appel renewed his attack in front, Charles Albert was compelled to yield victory for the first time in a pitched battle, and to retire on Villafranca. During the hottest of the fight at Custoza, the King and two young princes, and the regiment of guards who now accompany him, were surrounded, but the brigade of Savoy made a dash at the moment of active peril, and gallantly liberated Charles Albert and the Princes. Charles Albert is said to have applied to France for the aid of 60,000 troops FRANKFORT.—Advices to the 31st ult. have reached us. The National Assembly had received an address from a political club in Wurtemberg, thanking it for the energy it displayed with reference to the retrograde declaration of the King of Hanover. A congress of working men, now being held in Frankfort, was making considerable progress in its interesting and important labours. It had decided that every German ought to settle in any town of the Confederation upon certain easy conditions; and that every employer should be empowered to deduct one silbergroschen per week (about five farthings) from the wages of his men, in order to provide a general fund for pensioning off disabled journeymen after they have attained their fiftieth year.

PRUSSIA.

The Berlin papers of the 26th ult contain important declarations made by the Minister Von Auerswald in the National Assembly. First, with regard to the affairs of Denmark, and secondly with regard to the oath of allegiance to be taken to Archduke John, as Vicar of the Empire. Herr Von Auerswald says:—

"I have made known that the negotiations for an armistice between the chiefs in command of the German and Danish armies in the Duchy of Schleswig-Holstein have commenced. I find it necessary to add that the temporary failure of our endeavours in this affair, to which our unceasing efforts have been directed, has been caused by the hostile feeling which has been the support from the object desired. All that was possible to be done in reference to the affair has been done. This state of matters does not allow me to communicate immediately to you the negotiations which ensued, and the conduct of the Government. But I hope that the time is near at hand when this can be done. I hope you will be convinced that the Government of the King has not for a moment ceased to be mindful of the honour and the numerous interests of the eastern sea, and its consequence to a large portion of the Monarchy, and the maintenance of the honour of Prussia and Germany."

The Minister having made the above declaration respecting Schleswig-Holstein, then proceeded to remark on the question of the oath of allegiance to Archduke John, as Vicar of the Empire. He said:—"I do not see in the invitation of the German Minister to take the oath any difficulty as has been sought to be attached to it. It is, perhaps, an unusual demand; but I do not feel myself in a position to state my view to be any other than that I hope this domestic affair will easily be brought to a peaceful conclusion. Amongst them go so far as to assert that even if a complete victory were gained over Denmark, it would not be any advantage to trade and commerce.

According to latest accounts, a despatch had arrived in Berlin, with the intelligence that the Vicar of the Empire would not require the Prussian troops to take the oath of allegiance to him. Thus one subject of dissension, if not of serious misunderstanding, has been removed

Amongst the illustrious men who have been invited to attend the grand festival which will take place in Berlin on the 18th inst., in order to celebrate the anniversary of the laying of the foundation-stone of the cathedral, are the following:—The Emperor of Russia, Queen Victoria, the Kings of Hanover, Holland, and of the Belgians, and the Grand Duke of Baden. The Vicar of the Empire has expressed his intention to be present.

AUSTRIA.

Accounts from Vienna, to the 27th ult., represent the Doblhoff Ministry as proceeding rapidly towards the annihilation of the bureaucratik of the Austrian Empire, scarcely one obnoxious employé being left in office. Amongst the removals was that of the Count Von Brandis, the Governor of Tyrol and Vorarberg, who had received notice to quit, on a retiring pension. His Imperial Majesty has submitted with tolerable good grace to the deposition of the Count, one of his especial favourites. Archduke Stephen had arrived from Hungary, and the Diet of Croatia had arrived in Vienna. The departure of Archduke John to Inspruck had been supposed until the Hungaro Croatian question was settled. The return of the Emperor was again delayed this time on account of the illness of the Empress, which was surmised to be merely the same redisposition which had hitherto prevented her imperial spouse from returning to his Austrian capital.

According to one of the Vienna journals, the present Ministry and made the return of the Emperor to the capital the conditio sine qua non of their continuance in office. In fact they appeared resolved to carry things with a high hand, and in the thoroughly democratic spirit. Meantime the committee of safety and the democratic club were as active and influential as ever, and were more than ever in request by the people.

Amongst the propositions which were to be discussed by the Austrian Diet were the following:—The non-application of the future constitution for Austrian Germany to the other portions of the Austrian Empire; the separation of Galicia and Dalmatia from Austria Proper; and the abolition of all hereditary privileges, as and feudal regulations. The Diet would thus have to decide on questions of great importance in a national and international point of view.

SWITZERLAND.

Advices from Berne of the 27th ult. state that the Diet has resolved to make a demand on the French Republic for the restoration of that portion of the territory denominated the Valley of the Dappes, which the treaty of Vienna had formally assigned to the Helvetic Republic, but which the French Government had united to the department of the Ain, in consideration of its importance in a strategic point of view. The deputy of Vaud, in supporting the resolution, said, that it was to be hoped the Republican régime which had been inaugurated in a neighbouring state would repudiate the faults of which two dynasties have been guilty towards a state which it was bound to treat with courtesy. In acting thus, the French Government would not only repair an act of great injustice, but it would moreover accomplish an act of good policy.

HUNGARY.

In the sitting of the Lower House, on the 20th ult., Kossuth (the popular Minister) invited the Assembly to support the proposal for sending troops to assist the Austrian Government in the prosecution of the war with Italy. This proposal at first met with opposition, but Kossuth declared the question a Cabinet one, and gave it to be understood that the only point he wished to impress upon them was, that his object was to assist Austria in obtaining an honourable peace, but not strike any blow to the liberty of the Italians. The war was against Charles Albert, not against the Italians. The most significant part of Kossuth's speech was, however, that in which he said—"The desire is expressed that we should remove our troops from Italy, but, if we do so, 50,000 Croats would also return to their country, and they would give us fine work to do." This threat seems to have had the best effect, for Kossuth's proposal was adopted, and it was decided to send 50,000 men to Italy to assist Austria.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN

The negotiations for a pacific arrangement of the questions at issue between the belligerent parties had been broken off, and both have resumed their former hostile attitude.

The following is the text of a proclamation issued by the Provisional Government of the Duchies:

"Fellow-citizens,—The negotiations which it was expected would lead to peace with Denmark have been terminated. Again hostilities have commenced—arms now decide between us. Germany has proved that she desired peace. The most moderate demands have been refused by Denmark. Dishonourable conditions have been rejected by the will of Germany, by the firmness of the brave general who watches over our frontiers at the head of an army of Germany. People of Sleswig Holstein, we owe to our German country all our gratitude. Prussia and the 10th Corps d'Armée have taken up arms for our cause. The German ports have submitted for months to great losses for our rights. Let us show ourselves deserving of their good wishes. Deeds and union lead to success. Our youth hasten joyfully to arms, that we may join our German brothers. We will be ready to comply with every claim that shall hereafter be made for the energetic prosecution of the war. Fellow-citizens, we doubt not the success of our just cause. We will not attack the rights of others. But what belongs to us, what has been decided to us from our ancestors, that we will defend and maintain. The Duchies are a part of our German country. For our country we have had recourse to arms—for her the blood of our German brothers has flowed. With them we will unite for victory or death. (Signed) BESELER, F. REVENTLOW, J. BREMER, TH. OLSHAUSEN.—Rendsburg, July 25."

The temporary armistice continued in force till the 27th, when it expired.

It is affirmed that it has been decided to recall General Wrangel for disobedience of orders, and to appoint Prince Radziwill in his place.

PRINCIPALITIES OF THE DANUBE.

At Bucharest affairs have again become serious. The Provisional Government have a second time got the power into their own hands. Colonels Odobesco and Solomon have, with their men, joined the people. Notwithstanding the announcement of the Russian Consul, nothing positive has yet been ascertained respecting the advance of the Russian troops. In fact, it almost seems as if the whole were a false report. In Galatz a Turkish steamer is said to have landed 2000 Turkish troops, who immediately proceeded to Moldavia.

RUSSIA.

Count Von Nesselrode, Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has addressed a circular to all the Russian diplomatic agents at the Courts of Germany, relative to the situation of Prussia and matters in general, but respecting the affairs of Schleswig-Holstein and the Polish question.

Count Nesselrode declares, although the Muscovite Government might justly make the war with Denmark a casus belli, and transport its troops into the territory of those Poles who wish to raise an insurrection in the country the Russian Cabinet, from a spirit of peace and love for war, it nevertheless persists in its resolution of maintaining peace, and of continuing to contribute by its favourable relations with all the powers, and especially with Germany, that consolidation of the Russian troops destined on the frontiers have no aggressive intention whatsoever, but only to be in a state of readiness in case of need.

The accounts respecting the cholera mention that on the 19th ult. 304 persons sickened, 203 recovered, and 98 died. On the 20th there were 3339 cases under treatment. Several persons of rank and holding high official appointments have fallen victims to this fatal malady.

UNITED STATES.

Accounts from New York to the 19th July have been received this week. The intelligence of the renewed insurrection in Paris had reached New York, and caused the greatest excitement there.

The session of Congress of the United States presented no prospect of adjournment. The great difficulty which arrested all progress was the proper disposition to be made of the newly-acquired territories of New Mexico and California, as also of the territory of Oregon. The question of slavery was the stumbling-block. The slave-holding states insist that territory acquired by the common treasure and effort must be for the common use and enjoyment, and that to exclude from any portion of that territory the citizens of the slave-holding states grown products the employment of slaves, is virtually to exclude therefrom the citizens of the slave-holding states. On the other hand, it is contended that it would be a great crime in a free republic to establish slavery where the laws forbid its existence; and, therefore, that inasmuch as the new territories acquired from Mexico are free from slavery, it can never be borne that the republic, in becoming masters of these territories, should introduce slavery.

A compromise had been attempted in the senate, with what success remains to be seen. Two propositions are before that body: the one to adopt the line of the Missouri compromise, which would guarantee all the territory north of 36.30 to free-soil, and surrender all south of it to slavery. Another proposition is to make all north of the Missouri compromise free, and to leave all south of it open to the decision of the future inhabitants whether slavery shall or shall not exist there. Until this knotty and difficult question is disposed of, none of the bills for the government of the new territory will be passed; and, as it is now late in the session, and Congress have been together seven months and a half, it seems quite probable the whole matter will go over to another Congress, leaving the territories to be governed meanwhile under the general power of the executive and such laws as actually exist therein.

After the executive session at Washington, on the 18th, and before the adjournment, Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, from the Select Committee, reported a bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon, New Mexico, and California, which was read twice. The bill leaves out the slavery question altogether. Mr. Clayton said that the Committee adopted the Bill with great unanimity, only two members dissenting.

MEXICO.

From Mexico the latest intelligence is to the 27th of June, according to which Paredes had thrown himself with a strong force into the town of Guanajuato. That movement seemed to be regarded on all hands as a serious one.

The common wealth was fast recovering from the panic in the city of Mexico on the night of the 25th, had been deserted in consequence of the arrest of five of the leaders of it, and of a discovery made by the police of 250 muskets and 12 cartridges concealed in a house. The peace party were in the full tide of the occupation of the city by American troops. These muskets, as well as some subsequent ones, and clothing, were all of American manufacture.

The Mexican Government had appropriated 300,000 dollars for the immediate relief of Yucatan.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Accounts to the 31st of May have reached us from the Cape. The colony was at that time quite quiet, and, with the exception of a little manifestation of discontent on the part of some emigrant Boers, which had been in a considerable degree allayed by a manifesto issued by Sir Harry Smith, the Governor, all was going on smoothly and satisfactorily.

INDIA

Advices have been received this week, in anticipation of the Overland Mail of June 19. The dates are from Calcutta to the 8th, Madras to the 9th, and Bombay to the 11th of June.

We owe to the means the satisfactory intelligence that decided success had been achieved on two separate occasions, by the Sikh troops and irregulars under the British district officers, over large bodies of the Moolan rebels. The corps under the British officers now hold possession of the forts of the Dera and the line of the Indus. The enemy's force in the field at present consists of about 8000 men and eight guns; while our corps comprise three mixed Sikh regiments, 1600 irregular horse, eight guns, and 20 swivel pieces. A small body of Belochees, under one of their chiefs, had joined the English standard and done excellent service.

From Lahore we learn, that since the removal of the Ranee, our authorities in that capital continued to employ the most active efforts for securing its safe occupation, and in tracing out the late conspiracy and frustrating further hostile intentions. The accomplices in the recent plot, who had been tried on the condition that he should point out the parties engaged, had performed his promises. Some 22 or 24 of our sepoys were thereby implicated, of whom two had been executed, and 11 had escaped at the capture of the troops on their mutiny. The design of the conspirators was to have admitted 5000 men into Lahore, who were to have fallen upon and massacred the Europeans. Parties had been concentrated in the neighbouring villages for that purpose. Extraordinary exertions meanwhile continued to be made in the repairs and additions required for the fortifications at Lahore, and the works are said to have proceeded in a most satisfactory manner. Additional reinforcements had been ordered up. Another large magazine of native powder, which was in our possession, had been accidentally attacked, had been drenched. Secret stores of bullet-cartridge to a great amount are said to have been discovered in the [illegible] the city.

The Dewan Moira was understood to have [illegible] at 10,000 men around him in Mooltan, and all accounts describe him as one actually employed in organising his troops and strengthening the fortifications.

Smart shocks of earthquake are mentioned as having occurred on the 26th of May in Western India, felt chiefly from Mount Aboo to Deesa. The shocks appear to have been more or less felt across the whole of the peninsula. The north-west monsoon had set in favourably on the coast, but seemed likely to be late in the Deccan.

STATE OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

(From the Quarterly Return.)

The quarterly returns are drawn from 117 districts, sub-divided into 582 sub-districts; 36 districts are in the metropolis, and the remaining 81 comprise, with some agricultural districts, the principal towns and cities of England. The population was 6,519,963 in 1841.

It is gratifying to observe a very remarkable improvement in the state of the public health. The number of deaths registered in the three months ending June 30, was 45,552; which is less by 11,158 than were registered in the winter quarter of the present year, and less by 5033 than were registered in the corresponding quarter ending the last day of June, 1847. The mortality in the country, after having been excessively high during the latter half of the year 1846, the whole of 1847, and the first quarter of 1848, is now little above the average of the nine years 1838—47. The mortality, however, is still much higher than it was in the spring quarter (April, May, and June) of 1844, when the number of deaths was only 38,577; which, taking the increase of population into account, implies a lower rate of mortality than has been experienced in the spring season of any other year.

In London the deaths in the quarter were 12,945. The deaths in the preceding quarter were 16,455; in the quarter ending December, 1847, when influenza prevailed, 19,505. Influenza has almost entirely disappeared; it was the cause of death in only 50 cases during the 13 weeks ending in June. Small-pox was fatal to 381 persons in London; measles, to 206; scarlatina, to 816; hooping-cough, to 449; puerpura and scurvy, to 12; typhus, to 882; erysipelas, to 79. Small-pox, scarlatina, and typhus were prevailing epidemics in London; scarlatina in one week destroyed 107 lives. Typhus was at a maximum [illegible] 279) in the last quarter of the year 1847; it is now declining; but it is invariably longer in the epidemic form than other diseases of the class. The diseases of the tubercular class, namely, scrofula, tabes, consumption, and hydrocephalus, fluctuate very little: to them, 2640 deaths were ascribed in the June quarter of 1841, and 2463 in the June quarter of 1848; which were the highest and lowest numbers returned in the eight years 1841–8. Diseases of the lungs declined rapidly: they were the cause of 176 deaths in the first week, of 76 deaths in the last week of the quarter.

The improvement in the health of Liverpool is remarkable; while there were 1800 deaths in the June quarter, 1847, there were only 1907 deaths in the June quarter of 1848. In Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds there has also been some improvement. Small-pox and scarlatina have been the prevailing epidemics throughout the country.

The deaths in London from diarrhœa, dysentery, and cholera were 11, 23, 13, and 14, in the first four weeks; 27, 31, 37, and 51, in the last four weeks of the quarter. The mortality from these diseases is somewhat higher than it was in the corresponding weeks of 1847. The deaths ascribed to cholera in the June quarters of the eight years, 1841–8, were, 1, 7, 8, 9, 3, 9, 4, 17: in the last year, therefore, though the deaths are not numerous, there is a slight excess.

These three diseases are always most common in the three months of July, August, and September, when the temperature is highest. The popular error that fruit has been to fruit was the cause of last year. That is not [illegible] established by the fatality of these diseases to infants at the breast, to the aged, to persons in prison and public institutions who procure no fruit, and by many other ascertained facts.

Fruit, potatoes, and green vegetables are essential parts of the food [illegible] and it is only when taken to excess that, like other articles of diet, they disorder the stomach.

There is as yet in England no trace of the epidemic of cholera which is raging in Russia from Moscow to St. Petersburgh and Cronstadt. The disease first raged in the summer of 1831, seventeen years ago, at St. Petersburgh, reached Sunderland in October, London in February, 1832, Paris in March of the same year. Whether it will pursue the same course now, remains to be seen. That disease is not less or more fatal, must depend on a variety of circumstances. If the visitation cannot be arrested it is greatly to be wished that it should be deferred, for though enlightened communities have been recommended by the medical profession to postponing sanitary arrangements, and only commencing them when the plague is actually destroying them which is very like admitting the enemy within the city walls and then putting the fortifications in order, it is well known that the great capitals of the Continent were never in a worse condition to withstand an epidemic than they are at the present time.

The [illegible] remains to be done in English towns is evident from what is observed in London. It is one of the best established truths in medical science confirmed by the experience of the army, the navy, the prisons, the town and country districts of England—that pure water and pure air are necessaries of life; and in the supply of these, London, the [illegible] in a much better position than other places, is still deficient.

A part of the mortality which men experience in early life is perhaps inevitable; but this natural mortality cannot exceed a mortality in some of the districts of England comparatively healthy, where parts of the population are exposed to privation and injuries of various kinds. Now, in parts of Surrey and Hampshire not three or four [illegible] children under five years of age die annually; in Lewisham, the healthiest district of London, the mortality is four and five in 10 annually; in nearly every district of London the mortality at those ages is double the mortality in the country. In many districts the mortality is triple the mortality which some persons may consider natural to mankind. Of 1000 men between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five living in a healthy district of England, about 15 die annually; in some districts of London the annual deaths among the same number of men at the same ages varies from 30 to 35.

DISEASED FOREIGN CATTLE.—In consequence of disease having shown itself in the [illegible] cription of live stock in this country, especially in two of the [illegible] counties, and it being apprehended that the disease or distemper alluded to was caused by the importation of sheep or an infected state from the Continent of Europe, express orders were a few days since issued by the Commissioners of Customs for the precautionary regulations which had been adopted on two several previous occasions of similar circumstances and results being apprehended, to be again enforced with respect to cattle of various descriptions brought to this country from the Continent.

ETONIAN SATURDAY AT ETON.—On Saturday last the commemoration of "Election Saturday" took place. The Rev. Dr. Thackeray, the Provost of King's College, Cambridge, being unable to attend in his official capacity in consequence of indisposition, the Master speech, in Latin (which referred to the prosperity of the college, and the events of the past year), was delivered "with due emphasis and discretion" (and much applauded), by Wayte, B.A., the captain of the school. The Rev. Mr. Hodgson afterwards gave a splendid banquet at the Provost's Lodge to upwards of 40 distinguished guests. Shortly after five o'clock the whole of the party proceeded to the Upper school, where several of the election speeches were delivered by the pupils. The election regatta took place in the evening, the boys rushing to the Brocas, on the banks of the Thames, immediately after "absence" had been called by the Head-Master at six o'clock. The river, at this time, was crowded with boats and its banks, and every available point to view the aquatic procession of the Etonians. Old Eton, being also lined with thousands of spectators. The Etonians started from the Brocas for Surly Hall, preceded by the band of the Royal Horse Guards, in two large shallops, amidst the cheers of the public. Upon the boats arriving at Surly Hall, the crews and their respective friends, who were invited by the "Captain of the boats," partook of an elegant cold collation in the grounds on the bank of the river. There was a plentiful supply of wines, including champagne and claret, to which ample justice was done by the whole party. After drinking the health of her Majesty, the Royal Family, and other loyal toasts, the crews embarked on their return to Windsor, arriving at the bridge shortly before nine o'clock. There was then a display of fireworks from the eyot above the bridge, which lasted for near an hour.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been dull, the sky has been mostly covered by clouds, and rain has fallen frequently. Thursday the sky was nearly cloudless before 6 A.M., and after 8 P.M., and it was overcast between these times, some showers of rain fell during the evening. The direction of the wind was [illegible] the former part of the day, and it was S.W. at the latter [illegible] average temperature of the air for the day was 63°. Friday the sky was chiefly covered by cloud till the evening, and it was overcast [illegible] terwards; the direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the average temperature was 64°. Saturday the sky was alternately clear and cloudy during the day; the direction of the wind was variable between the N.W. and the S.S.W. [illegible] the average temperature was 65°. Sunday, the sky was overcast, [illegible] during the morning, the direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the average temperature was 61½°. Monday, some heavy rain fell in the morning, and the sky was for the most part cloudy; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 59°. Tuesday, August 1, rain was falling frequently in heavy showers; several heavy claps of thunder were heard during the afternoon; the [illegible] was for the most part overcast, but at times large portions were clear; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 60½°. Wednesday, the sky was for the most part cloudy, and rain was falling occasionally in the morning; the direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the average temperature for the day was 61½°; during the night of this day was 53° nearly.

NEW ROUTE FOR THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS THROUGH TORRES STRAITS.

A SHORT time since there was published, by order of Parliament, the Report of the Hydrographer of the Admiralty, on the proposed route through Torres Straits, for steamers conveying the American mails. This document states:—

"It is now acknowledged by every one that a direct intercourse by steam between England and that group of colonies, of which Sydney is the centre, would in a short time double the capital, her population, and her produce, and the only questions are, which will be the best line to carry it, and how it can be most economically maintained? Three-fourths of the whole distance are already performed by the Hong-Kong mail to Singapore; and if the Sydney mails were to branch off from that port, and take the eastern line by Batavia and Torres Straits, they would traverse smooth water seas, where a passage is certain at all seasons, they would at once save the steamer which the Dutch now run from Java to meet our packets; and they would likewise produce direct communication between Australia and China, as well as the three presidences of India, which would be as beneficial to all those places as lucrative to the carriers. From Sydney the mails would be forwarded to the neighbouring settlements without delay, as there is a regular overland post to Melbourne, and another thence to Adelaide. Steamers now ply regularly between Sydney and Port Phillip and Launceston, and easy contracts might be made for the furtherance of the mails to Swan River and New Zealand."

The Report then urges the Lords of the Admiralty to recommend this improved, rapid communication of the above thriving and important settlements with the mother country; and this to be effected by a sufficient number of steam-vessels, of competent power, and by the Singapore and Batavian route.

The survey of Torres Straits has been a labour of very considerable interest; and we have, accordingly, availed ourselves of a few of its incidents for illustration in our pages, from sketches made by the draftsman to the Expedition. It will be sufficient to premise that Torres Straits are situated between the most north-eastern part of Australia and the south-east coast of Papua, or New Guinea. The latter country had hitherto only been seen from a distance, and not been visited by navigators, on account of the numerous dangers with which it is beset.

Her Majesty's surveying schooner Bramble, as tender to her Majesty's ship Fly, left England in May, 1843, under the command of Captain F. P. Blackwood, R.N., and a narrative of the Fly's voyage has been published by Mr. Jukes. The Fly returned to England, and was paid off in June, 1846; the Bramble remaining, after the survey, until her Majesty's ship Rattlesnake under the command of Captain Stanley, R.N., arrived at Sydney, when the former was paid off, commissioned, and attached to the latter (her former commander, Lieutenant Yule, still remaining); and they are at the present moment employed, prosecuting their important and arduous duties.

As our Engravings illustrate certain adventures with the wild people of New Guinea, we shall pass at once to the party of natives which first boarded the Bramble, which proved to be from 10,000 to 11,000 feet in elevation. The coast—which, off to the eastward, had been found very flat and swampy was here moderately high, and backed by mountains of still greater elevation; and there were many villages, embowered in cocoa-nut trees, scattered along the shore. This discovery is thus described by one of the officers:—"At daybreak, as the sun was rising, I heard a very much struck with the grandeur of some very distant mountains, in a south-eastern direction—one in particular, the outline of a flat-topped mountain was only visible above the intervening clouds. Immense ranges of mountains were also distinctly visible on this side of it, extending in a N.W. and S.E. direction. It is seldom the sun has discovered to my sight so splendid a scene as here presented itself, but in a few minutes, when the sun's disc appeared, the spectacle vanished, leaving only inferior cloud-topped mountains visible, together with the rich undulating foreground."

Shortly afterwards was seen the strange sail we have figured. This, on [illegible] within gun-shot, proved to be a gigantic double canoe, from [illegible] in length, kept apart and together by a platform, from 16 to 20 feet broad, which extended nearly the whole length of the canoes, the after end being open with the sides of the hons; and six or eight feet of this being left clear for the three steersmen, who guided the vessels with three long paddles over the stern. With the exception of this part of the platform, the whole was covered by a strong, well-built house, made of cane; the roof being flat, and about five or six feet above the platform. This roof also answered the purpose of an upper deck. The extraordinary craft was propelled by large mat sails, which hoisted between two bamboo masts, supported by diagonal poles fore and aft, on either side; the mast heads being from 30 to 35 feet asunder. Besides these two large sails, the canoe had other smaller square-sails, suspended from the principal masts; and these were likewise a spanker sail, and forward. The spars and rigging were ornamented with flags and streamers. There were about 40 natives upon the roof, several of whom were stringing their bows, but this was the only indication of hostility. Wherever the canoe came, and whither bound, was not ascertained.

On the evening of the 16th, the Bramble anchored under a bluff headland, to which was given the name of Cape Possession; from whence Mr. Yule commenced his triangulation; and this brings us to the adventure depicted in the third Illustration.

At 10 A.M. a party proceeded towards the shore (to obtain astronomical observations), consisting of Lieutenant Yule, Mr. Wright, five seamen, and one marine (of the first gig), Mr. Campbell, five seamen, five seamen, and one marine, in the second gig, both boats being well armed, and perfectly equipped to meet the natives. On approaching the shore, they found their landing opposed by a party of natives, the first gig was then anchored, and the second gig veered in from her through the surf; and with great difficulty Lieutenant Yule, Mr. Campbell, three seamen, and one marine, landed, keeping the instruments dry by the assistance rendered by the sailors; and here Lieutenant Yule next proceeded to point the union jack, and take possession of the country (in the name of her Majesty Queen Victoria), which was acknowledged with three hearty cheers. The party then proceeded to re-embark; but, in the attempt, the second gig was swamped, and everything in her, including the arms, lost, except the ammunition and chronometer; the boat itself being with difficulty saved by being towed out to the offing by the other gig, which had succeeded in getting to the rear of the Castlereagh, the Bramble's tender. Meanwhile, her commander, Lieutenant Aplin, seeing all was not right, anchored about a mile and a half off, and sent her gig and cutter, under the command of Mr. Andrews, to assist.

The party on shore having now collected as much of the boat's gear as was washed in, concealed themselves among the bush, in case their forlorn condition should be discovered by the natives; and here Lieutenant Yule remained remaining until the surf should decrease, thinking that it would be fatal to any boat venturing through it. The Castlereagh's boats having at length come within the Bramble's, the second gig was soon hauled out, when all four boats pulled up abreast of the party on shore (outside the surf, which continued to increase); the Castlereagh at the same time weighed, with only four hands on board, and soon anchored again abreast of the party. By this time the natives discovered Mr. Yule's party, and came pouring round the cliff as Cape Possession, in strong numbers; when Mr. Andrews immediately prepared to push his boat through the surf. Lieut. Yule waved him back, knowing that his gallant attempt to relieve them would fail; he, however, pushed through the surf, his boat was upset, and the arms, ammunition, &c., all lost: thus five more were added to the slave party, making in all fifteen, a helpless, and without arms.

Lieutenant Yule now advanced, waving a branch of green leaves, with conciliatory gestures, towards the savages, who were increasing their numbers, and were armed with spears, clubs, and stone axes. All retreat was cut off, and Mr. Andrews and several times attempted to launch his boat, but was unfortunately dashed to pieces on the rocks. Lieutenant Yule's own words will best describe the [illegible] commander of their adventure:

"One man pointed a spear at me, but the others stared at me with more wonder than ferocity. I then offered them some bits of tobacco, which they would not approach near enough to take. This shyness, unfortunately, did not continue long; for when the main body came up, amounting to eighty or ninety men, armed they grew troublesome, and laid their hands on everything they could get hold of that was lying on the beach. To these robberies I endeavoured to put a stop, and made them some presents instead; but the savages must have known our helpless condition, and became every moment more daring and rapacious; and, to add to our tribulation, we observed two large canoes, each containing thirty or forty men, come round Possession Point, and heave to between the Castlereagh and the boats, as if with the intention of cutting off the latter. The Castlereagh could not, unfortunately, take advantage of her guns by firing grape or canister, as we were completely intermixed with the natives. At this critical stage of our anxiety, the second gig, at all hazards, was veered through the surf; and, to our great joy, four or five men were drawn off in safety.

"A second attempt was made, and succeeded. Then came the awful moment for us who awaited the last trip, since only a few moments before I balked a native when taking a deliberate aim at one of our last men who embarked. The natives now seeing our numbers decrease, laid hands on us in the most violent manner. My quintant was first wrested from my coxswain, who in a tone of grief made known the circumstance. I immediately turned round and exclaimed, 'Oh, don't part with that!' but it was too late; and when I endeavoured to recover it, I found a club wielded over my head. In making my escape from this wretch, I was secured by four others, who first took my Government micrometer, which was slung round my neck. I then endeavoured to struggle out of their clutches, and escape with the pocket chronometer and note-book; but these, as well as every article of clothing I had about my body, were stripped off; when the second gig was opportunely again backed in, and in this forlorn state Mr. Pollard, the two marines, and I, warded off, and were dragged into the boat."

The most extraordinary part of this adventure is that they were allowed to escape; for Lieut. Yule says: "From the account I heard of the ferocity of the natives when the Fly had been surveying last year on this coast, I confess I fully expected death would be my fate in a few minutes, and thought of the similar position poor Captain Skeying was in when murdered at Cape Roso." It was Lieut. Yule's opinion that if the party had not lost their firearms, they might have made good their retreat without loss of any kind. Still, the hostility of the natives may have been caused by their fear and horror at seeing white people, as it is very probable that the Fly and Bramble are the only vessels that have visited these parts of the coast.

GIGANTIC CANOE OF NEW GUINEA.

It is difficult to say to what race of people those of Guinea may pertain. Lieut. Yule's account of them very much resembles the character of the islanders of Torres Straits. Mr. Swearman describes them to be of a very mixed race, some light as Malays in colour, with high foreheads and thin lips; whilst others are perfectly black, with features more like the negroes than even the Australians, though far superior in stature and build to the latter; the former were often far from ill-looking, and in general appeared to hold a superior rank to the blacks, as was particularly noticed at Cape Possession, where all the chiefs were of this caste.

They wear only waist-cloths, but a profusion of ornaments, principally shells, probably procured from the islands to the southward, in exchange for emu feathers, so highly prized there, and so common among the New Guinea men. Their arms consist of bows and arrows, spears, clubs, stone axes, and daggers.

Mr. Sweatman then adds:—"Treacherous they are not, for they always came out and met us boldly, sometimes even unarmed; and when provided with weapons they willingly sold them. Ferocious they are not either, or they would not have spared our lives at Cape Possession. As to their civilisation, their huts, canoes, and cultivated grounds prove how advanced they are already, and should Europeans ever effect a permanent communication with them, I have no doubt they would become as far so as any of the Eastern Islanders. Of their domestic matters we could learn little. They do not use tobacco, but many chew betel, carrying their lime in an elegant little gourd, a circumstance which seems to show their connexion with Malays."

AFFRAY WITH THE NATIVES ON THE COAST OF NEW GUINEA.

ENCAMPMENT OF TROOPS AT EVERTON, NEAR LIVERPOOL.

EVERTON MILITARY CAMP, NEAR LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

August 2, 1848

Being at Liverpool—proceeding by your special instructions to depict and report the current events of Ireland—your Artist and I have occupied a day and a night of our time in this town and the suburb of Everton, where has been established a Military Camp. Did nothing more pressing address itself by rumour from Ireland, we might fill much space, and probably excite some interest with the rumours which come with the visitors to Liverpool. But from the inhabitants—the authorities on one hand, the uneasy sympathizers with rebellion on the other—or from the neutral population, little is to be ascertained that is worth relating. The Camp, consisting, at present, of the 46th Regiment of Infantry, and to be augmented this week by a battery of artillery and the 81st Infantry, has its interest, as a scene to look upon; yet, compared with the events occurring or reported from Ireland, it is without incident. So that it will be easily understood that, beyond the making of a few sketches by the Artist, and some inquiries by me, there was no necessity to linger here. We leave for Ireland to-night (Wednesday).

There are more reasons than one why an encampment is formed at Liverpool. Troops are drawn hither, because it is the nearest port of embarkation to Ireland, at which vessels of transport may be instantly found, if an emergency arises.

Liverpool holds within it a dense population, many of them Irish. Where there are most Irish the population is most dense; where it is most dense it is within the easiest reach of the mightiest mischief—the firing of the warehouses and docks. It is said, and the magistrates here believe the saying, as do the principal commercial men of all shades of politics, that there is now no doubt that a conspiracy existed last week—the head conspirators giving directions from Ireland—to burn the warehouses and docks of Liverpool, and by so doing appal the empire of Britain. This is a second, and a conclusive reason, for accumulating a military force here.

THE KNAPSACK.

A secondary cause of the encampment at Everton is, that there is not sufficient barrack room for even an ordinary regiment here. And it is said that no sufficient barracking has been provided at Liverpool for a military force of magnitude, as at other large towns, because trade has usually employed the people so well, that they have not felt an inclination to indulge in destructiveness, as at some other large towns. But, again, it is said, the fluctuations of trade would not be sufficient to account for the uneasy politics of Liverpool, were this not a port at which the unemployed inhabitants of Ireland accumulate.

Dealing with these suppositions according to their worth or worthlessness, as they may appear to deserve, it is a fact to be recorded in the history of Liverpool, that on the high sandstone rocks, in a field of ten acres, where green pasture covers the rocks, on the north side of Liverpool, commanding the town, a military encampment is formed: the graphic hand of your Artist has depicted it. The view, taken from the south (the observer's back to Liverpool), is perfect, if we suppose the time to be when a few bands of recruits are at drill. When all the forces are on parade, the columns or lines are of grander proportions. When all the men are seen in groups cleaning their accoutrements, their firelocks piled, belts spread to dry, some brushing shoes, some sewing on buttons, some darning their stockings, some squatted around a speaker, some reading, others holding argument, all telling all what the news is from Ireland, the scene from the front is singularly picturesque.

In the rear, by the side of a stone wall, the camp kettles are arranged, five or six to a company, each company averaging a hundred men; and their cooks in their shirt-sleeves, the men in their great-coats, who have been on guard all night, coming in the morning, to light their short pipes, make the scene an unusual one for Everton, an interesting one for any place.

On Wednesday afternoon the parade and field exercise attracted many visitors; while the precision with which the well-disciplined force went through its movements elicited the admiring approval of every person who understood the evolutions.

IRELAND.

THE ATTEMPTED REBELLION.

The accounts which reached town on this subject in the early part of the week were of the vaguest and most unsatisfactory kind. One thing, however, appeared to be perfectly certain, viz. that the disloyal or rebellious sentiment which the Young Ireland journals—the "Felon Press," as they very appropriately designated themselves would have led the public to believe was generally diffused throughout the masses of the population of Ireland, has been shown to have been confined to a comparatively small section of the community, and, even amongst these, it had taken such slight hold, that the very first exhortation of the Roman Catholic clergy to the violently-disposed to withdraw from the further prosecution of their crude and absurd insurrectionary schemes, and resume their daily occupations of peace and order, was attended with success; and that silly dupe of his own vanity—poor self-deluded Smith O'Brien found himself deserted by his "forces" on the very first ground he had chosen for making a stand against the authorities. The wise and humane exertions of the Catholic priesthood in dissuading their flocks from embarking in his mad enterprise with the would-be patriot O'Brien were, no doubt, seconded considerably by the people's observance of the puerile conduct of the poor gentleman himself, who seems to have thought it sufficient to play at civil war, in order to accomplish whatever revolutionary projects he had had in contemplation.

The Freeman's Journal of Monday gives the following from their correspondent at Kilkenny:

Early on Saturday morning, Sub-Inspector Trant, of the Callan station, county Kilkenny, with between 40 and 50 men under his command, proceeded to the neighbourhood of Ballingarry, on the borders of the county of Tipperary, and twelve miles from the city of Kilkenny, to assist in arresting Mr Smith O'Brien, who was reported to be in the mountains of that locality, surrounded by a large body of armed peasantry.

Some time afterwards, a mounted police-constable, named Carroll, was sent from Kilkenny, with a despatch for Sub-Inspector Trant; but on arriving at a part of the county between Ballingarry and a place called Commons, he heard several shots fired, and was soon afterwards taken prisoner by some armed country people, several of whom were for shooting him, saying, "If this man gets back he will hang us all." The others, however, declared they would not take Carroll's life. The constable was in coloured clothes. He was taken into the presence of Mr. Smith O'Brien, who wore a cap with a peak and silver band, and carried a stick in his hand. Mr. O'Brien, addressing Carroll, formally said, "You are one of the mounted police?" The constable at once said he was, being aware that he was known to persons in the neighbourhood. Mr O'Brien then turned round and asked the people whether he should give himself up, but they advised him not to take such a step, upon which he walked about for some time, and then, mounting the constable's horse, rode away. Carroll was detained in the custody of four men.

During this time Sub-Inspector [illegible] and his men were shut up in a house to which they had retreated, surrounded by the country people, upon whom they fired from the windows.

After a lapse of two or three hours, Carroll was left in the charge of one man, who allowed him to escape.

On his road back Carroll encountered Mr. Smith O'Brien, who had changed his dress, and now wore a hat. Mr. O'Brien, who was on horseback, stopped the constable, but the latter remonstrated with him, and told him it was foolish to think of holding out against the force that would be brought against him, especially as the priests were exhorting the people not to join in resisting the authorities. Mr. O'Brien appeared to think deeply on what Carroll said, and observed that twenty years he had been [illegible] he was convinced that if the people did not stand by him [illegible] he should afterwards gave Carroll his stick, and rode off.

On the constable's return to Kilkenny, orders were given to the military to march to Mr. Trant's assistance, and at half-past [illegible] o'clock a formidable military force set out towards Ballingarry. These were followed by a large body of police, and then came 300 infantry, headed by the [illegible] Green, Esq. The rear was brought up by another body of police, making in all about 150 constables, and between 300 and 400 soldiers. A guard of the 83rd Regiment kept watch on the Thicket, and a large number of noblemen were in arms in the Assembly Rooms, it being generally expected that Smith O'Brien would be brought in a prisoner during the night.

Shortly after the departure of the military and police, the news of the [illegible] treat of Mr. Trant and his party was conveyed to Kilkenny, and the cavalry police were despatched to recall the soldiers who were on their way out, and they returned at an early hour this morning.

Mr. Trant and his party got safe off; but several of the people were killed and wounded. Mr. Dillon, one of the leaders from Dublin, is thought to be amongst the latter.

There were about 300 armed men around Smith O'Brien at the time Carroll was taken. Several Catholic clergymen were seen in vain exhorting the people to retire, whilst shots were whizzing around them.

The last accounts from Ballingarry state that the military were concentrating on that point from all the surrounding districts.

A correspondent of the Morning Chronicle, writing from the scene of action on Sunday, gives the following graphic sketch, which, though containing some details that don't exactly belong to "the affair" on Ballingarry Common, presents, nevertheless, such characteristic features, that we do not hesitate to insert it at length.

"The swelling district on whose summit I now stood is the colliery district, and immediately below me, at the foot of the hill, distant about half a mile, a collection of scattered houses in the neighbourhood of [illegible] engine chimneys, is the village of Commons, where Smith O'Brien slept the night before the outbreak. About a mile and a half to the east is seen the chapel tower of Ballingarry, to which there is a straight level road leading from Commons. Without having its height, I sought out a collier's cabin. The owner, a Vincent, more than six feet high, left his wife and children, saying, with ready courtesy, 'If your honour will send your car down to Shanrue, at the Commons, to-night, I'll take you ready out across the fields to Tim Carwick's, at Farrenroy, where the way lies between the Peelers and the black-coated men; and we can meet the car afterwards below.'

"We listened now to a slated farmhouse that I had observed from the car standing by itself on the summit of the hill—a remarkable object for miles around.

"The same scene I have described as held in front. It stands in an oblong enclosure, made by a low wall about four and a half feet high, which leaves room for a small patch of green in front, and a yard of some still larger extent in the rear. It stands, as it were, across the enclosure, leaving about six feet free at each side of the house. There is a wicket gate in front, and in the yard behind there is exit by a common field gate, stopping a disordered [illegible] which makes the end of the yard. On the east side, outside the wall, is a cabbage garden, and at the south, behind the barn, in three cocks of [illegible].

"The way in which this house became the scene of conflict was as follows:

"On the night of Friday last, Smith O'Brien, who on the Thursday before had been seen safe by 800 armed men out of their county of Tipperary, towards Waterford county, returned unexpectedly to Commons, having taken that journey in three jaunting cars full of gentlemen. The neighbourhood turned out, armed, and [illegible] the arms of "two streets of palatines," as my collier guide called the Protestants [illegible], descendants of Germans, settled in the neighbourhood. Pikes [illegible] by O'Brien and his party reviewing and marshalling them, [illegible] in a cabin, round which thirty two men stood guard [illegible] morning. Having notice by their spies of the advance of the Dublin police force, which formed part of four or five different bodies which were to concentre at Ballingarry, he assembled and addressed his men on two great plateaux of culm, and about half-past twelve o'clock they saw the police force, about thirty-seven men, under Inspector Trant, advancing from Ballingarry to meet them. The police had advanced as far as a cross road that crosses down the hill past Mrs. M'Cormack's house, when, suddenly, a number of men were seen under Smith O'Brien, they turned up the cross road with a view of gaining a post of defence. Smith O'Brien's body then broke, and rushed up the hill to anticipate their design, or, as my informant phrased it, to 'cross-cut them.' But the police got in first, running neck and [illegible].

"The Widow M'Cormack, who some minutes before had gone down from her house to the national school, on hearing the firing commence and the hurrying, for the safety of two of her children at school there, found herself mingled with the crowd rushing up. She ran with them, for she had left two children in the house, and reached the yard gate as the police had secured the house door. Outside the wall were hundreds shouting, while within in front and in rear were a few.

"At the gate they stopped her, and cried 'Why did you let them in?' But she rushed, and standing up on the parlour window-stool, begged in vain that her children might be given out.

"She then said to the police, 'I will send for the priest to make peace.' And she offered to put a boy on Mr. Trant's grey horse that was loose within the enclosure in front. But the inspector advised her to send a boy on foot. She then went to Smith O'Brien, who was sitting under the wall in the yard garden, and asked him what it was he wanted? He said, 'Tell the police it is their arms I want.' She returned to him with a refusal, and putting her hand on his coat collar, she said, 'Sir, sir, and spoke to them yourself; but he refused unless she went with him, which she did, and she saw him parley with them through the parlour window and shake hands with them. She had previously seen some of the black-coated men carrying rag to the back-door, and heard O'Brien hurrying them.

"Just about this time some of the men outside the wall flung stones at the windows, fired a few shots, and she ran out, hearing the police bid her clear away, and, before she was many steps, the volley was given from the house. She ran to her father's, three fields off, and, returning in a quarter of an hour, found the firing over, the priest there, and the police coming out of reach of shot. At the wicket one lay dead, at the adjacent corner under the wall another badly wounded, a man the priest was preparing, and another lay badly wounded near the yard-gate.

"A hundred and twenty yards down a slope, a third, west of the house, was a [illegible] of men, amongst whom Smith O'Brien was walking up and down quickly. There was a young man there, 'a party young gentleman,' and now and down I [illegible] his face pale and sweaty, and he said, 'Oh, lads, lay me down; lay me down anywhere.' She advised them to [illegible] boots, which they were doing when she left them. Shortly after she saw Smith O'Brien ride off alone, the Kilkenny way.

"It is believed that the wounded man was O'Brien Dillon, whom they call Dillon Browne."

Another Correspondent says:—

"There are some details not directly connected with this narrative which will interest the public, and which I propose to mention. I left Kilkenny on the route taken by Mr. Blake, and, having passed into Tipperary, am now in the immediate neighbourhood of Mullinahone, Ballingary, and the collieries. It will hardly be believed that there was nothing in the appearance of the district through which I passed which indicated the slightest disturbance, or apprehension of it. The live stock of the farmers were grazing on the fields as usual; the peasantry were seen hanging about their cabin doors; even the carriers of culm coal for burning lime-stone piled their daily occupation as usual. There was no excitement—no hurrying to and fro of armed bands—no flocking of bills or lighting of bonfires. In fact, the whole country appeared profoundly tranquil. No [illegible] pasture lands and luxuriant crops met the eye wherever it turned; [illegible] the summit of Slievenamon reared a canopy of mist, as lazy-looking and innocuous as the [illegible] lover of peaceful scenery could desire. Such was the external appearance of that part of Tipperary through which I travelled, when the long-promised and much-feared rebellion of 1848 broke out in [illegible].

"No outrages on property—at least none of a very serious character—have been committed by the insurgents. They have contented themselves with temporary possession of horses for their own use. They have also made a descent on some [illegible] fields; but these are all the charges I have heard against them on the [illegible].

"The clubs of Kilkenny have dissolved."

In Dublin, on Monday morning, ten assistants in the house of Pim and Co., haberdashers, were arrested, and taken before the police magistrate, on the complaints to commissions in the rebellious army were found in their persons. They were to have left [illegible].

The members killed in the late affray near Ballingarry, it has been ascertained, amount to six, and five more were so severely wounded that they were not expected to live.

General M'Donnell had fixed his quarters at Ballingarry.

Nine counties were proclaimed on Monday under the provisions of the Prevention of Crime and Outrage Act; viz. Kerry, Westmeath, South Wexford, Carlow, Queen's County, Kildare, Limerick, and various other baronies of Cork, King's County, Cavan, and Monaghan. Frank Morgan, one of the solicitors to the Corporation, had been arrested, together with Hyland, the placard-writer, and others.

Lord Lieutenant has issued a proclamation cautioning all persons against harbouring the rebel leaders, or aiding their escape, under the penalty of high treason.

Lord Hardinge arrived in Dublin on Tuesday, to take the command of the army in the disturbed districts.

According to the latest accounts received from disturbed districts, all was quiet. The whereabouts of Smith O'Brien was not known. Lord Hardinge was to leave Dublin for Tipperary on Friday morning.

[illegible]day, two more arrests took place in Dublin, viz. C. Taffe, Esq., barrister-at-law, President of the Sixth Confederation Club, and T. Walter Meagher, President of the Citizen Club, both of whom were committed to Newgate. Dublin never was more [illegible].

[illegible] arrests have taken place in Galway. C. Rochford, attorney, John Blake, editor of the Galway Vindicator; and George Hagan, gunsmith: and at Kilkenny, Dr. Kane had been arrested on Tuesday.

Our own Artist's letter [illegible] reports as to the movements of the Rebels. On Monday there was in Cork a rumour that Kossuth Barracks were [illegible] the night before, but on reaching there, he [illegible] only found the barracks in the [illegible] Mayor and representatives, but there was not a single being opposed either to [illegible] of it, for that the threatened failure of the potato crop this year [illegible] sufficient reminder for all parties to [illegible]. [illegible] have been [illegible] Limerick [illegible] the Mayor [illegible] were allowed to be converted into barracks, when, at this moment, three hundred troops and seventy policemen are stationed. He then proceeds to state the [illegible] localities; and adds, by way of postscript, "A friend, an officer in the 70th, has just called, and he tells me that the three detachments from Limerick, Waterford, and Dublin have received orders to spread themselves out in [illegible] the use of Slievenamon (of which I hope to send you a Sketch); so that if the rebels have taken refuge on it, they have evidence of being turned out. I forgot to say that in my letter [illegible] yesterday I stated that a single public man, which bespoke the general state of the country, which the Government can leave with safety to the people."

THE IRISH COMMAND.—Viscount Hardinge, accompanied by his sons and by Lieutenant-Colonel Wood, C.B. (his Lordship's military secretary when in India), left town on Monday night for Liverpool, en route for Dublin, whence his Lordship proceeded to the south of Ireland on a "special command," having, according to the present arrangements, his head-quarters at Kilkenny.

THE ARMY IN IRELAND.—As a matter of interest at the present moment, we subjoin the official return of the troops in Ireland for the month commencing August 1st:—1st Dragoon Guards, Cahir; 6th Dragoon Guards, Dundalk; 2d Dragoons, Athlone; 4th Light Dragoons, Newbridge; 6th Light Dragoons, Dublin; 7th Hussars, Dublin; and upwards in Tipperary; 8th Royal Irish, Newbridge; [illegible] Cork; 13th Light Dragoons, Longford; 17th Lancers, Dublin making, in all, a force of [illegible] Cavalry. 1st Foot (2d battalion), Newbridge; 2d Foot, Dublin; 3d Foot (encamped at) Piltown, county Waterford; 8th Foot (1st battalion), Youghal; 9th Foot, Dublin; 13th Foot, Belfast; 26th Foot, Cork; 31st Foot, Athlone; 35th Foot, Dublin; 40th Foot, Gosport; 41st Foot, Buttevant; 43d Foot, Templemore; 47th Foot, Templemore; 50th Foot (2d battalion), Dublin; 64th Foot, Limerick; 66th Foot, Mullingar; 70th Foot, Cork; 71st Foot (1st battalion), Naas; 74th Foot, Dublin; 75th Foot (one company), Phœnix-park; 83d Foot, Kilkenny; 85th Foot, Dublin; 88th Foot, Limerick; 89th Foot, Tipperary; 3 companies Royal Sappers and Miners, 1 company, Newbridge; 1 detachment Royal Artillery in out districts. Royal Marines, Out-Pensioners, Royal Engineers, and armed police making, in all, a force of about [illegible]. The garrison of Dublin may now be estimated as follows:—Cavalry, 1200 N. C. O and rank and file; Horse Artillery, 60 ditto ditto; Foot Artillery, 160 ditto ditto; Royal Marines, 90 ditto ditto; Infantry, 6700 ditto ditto; Pensioners, 650 ditto ditto; Police, 800 ditto ditto; 480, and composed of the following regiments: 6th Dragoons, 6 troops; 7th Hussars, 6 troops; 8th Hussars, 4 troops; 17th Lancers, 4 troops; Royal Horse Artillery, 1 troop; Royal Artillery, 2 companies; 3d Buffs, 10 companies; 48th Regiment, 9 companies; [illegible], 10 companies; 86th, 10 companies; 60th Rifles, 6 companies; [illegible], 10 companies; 71st Highland, 10 companies; 88th Connaught Rangers, 10 companies; Royal Sappers and Miners, 1 company. The establishment is daily confined to barrack, and ready to turn out at a minute's warning. The best spirit animates the troops.

THE FLEET OFF IRELAND.—The naval force off the coast of Ireland consists of the following ships and vessels:—Excellent, 74, Captain Austen; Prince Regent, 72, Captain Martin; Belleropion, 80, Captain Baynes; Hindostan, 50; and [illegible] Amphion, 32, Captain Wilkinson; Daphne, Cuckoo, Sidmouth, and Andromache, 44-gun frigates, mounting only two guns each, as store-ships; the Tweed, 18, Commander Russell; the Hecate, 16, Commander G. Smith; the Pilot, 16, Commander [illegible]; the Erebus, 16, Commander Venables; the Crocodile, 4, Commander [illegible]; the Dragon, Birkenhead, Cyclops, Arrow, and Stromboli, steamers; Scourge, Keenan, Rhadamanthus, Shearwater, Alban, Bloodhound, Avon, and Zephyr, steamers [illegible]. The Vindictive and Cruiser are also on the Irish coasts, left the Downs on Tuesday, against a strong south-west wind, for the same destination. The Leander and Trident had not then joined Lord Clarence, but were anxiously looked for. The Albion, having landed the Marines of that ship at Waterford, returned to Cove on Sunday. The St. Vincent, Prince Regent, Belleropion, Amphion, Cruiser, and Albion remained in Cork harbour on Monday. The Admiralty have very justly approved (by minute in the Admiralty Board-room) of the [illegible] and commended [illegible] made by the officers of the various departments of that arsenal, [illegible] to equip the vessels selected from the squadron stationed on the Cork station for service in Ireland (Dragon, Scourge, Driver, Virago, Birkenhead, &c.)

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1848.

THE Rebellion in Ireland, of which at the end of last week there seemed to be an unhappy prospect before the country, has been tried, and failed. Never was failure more signal. The wicked, if not insane, men who for so many months have been goading, or have been goaded by their countrymen into the vortex of civil warfare, were allowed apparently to carry things in their own way. They arranged their measures, perfected their organisation, chose their time, fixed their ground—in fact, did all that seemed good in their own eyes. Nevertheless, they have been miserably—not to say ludicrously—foiled. A more comical, yet more humiliating, spectacle history does not offer than the Irish Rebellion of 1848, under the guidance of Mr. Smith O'Brien of the Pike (nine feet long), and Mr. Meagher of the Sword. The Government, which had from the very commencement been watchful and determined, was prepared to crush effectually any movement—even were it as large as a general rising of the people. But there was no rising. The people, however well inclined for disturbance, had no faith in their leaders. They cheered their speeches vociferously, for the fun of the thing apparently, but did not allow themselves to be cajoled into insurrection. The great and overpowering reason seems to have been their conviction that such were not leaders, and with such a Government to cope with, rebellion would have been a failure, which would have entailed the most unhappy consequences upon all who participated in it. We have no wish to join with some of our daily contemporaries in the unseasonable mirth with which they narrate the circumstances. We can but rejoice that the Irish people, whether from prudence, priestly persuasion, or a knowledge of the utter insanity of the Repeal cry, have held aloof from Messrs. O'Brien and Meagher; and that, instead of a large rebellion, we have had but a small riot. This much, however, we think to be certain, namely, that the vigour of the Government is more to be praised for this result than the loyalty of the Irish people; and that the overwhelming display of power which has been made has happily saved the country from the sad necessity of exerting it.

The lull in French affairs that succeeded the terrible storms of June has been hitherto unbroken. General Cavaignac has not abused his high powers, nor exhibited any of the personal ambition which might have been expected from a successful soldier, so suddenly raised to so splendid a pre-eminence. There is a general confidence in him amongst men of all parties amongst the Monarchists, because he is known to be the friend of order, and both determined and able to maintain it; and amongst Republicans, because he is known to be an honest and sincere Republican, acting from the conviction that order is the only true basis of a Republican or any other form of Government. Though the state of siege has not yet been raised in Paris, there seems reason to believe that General Cavaignac and his Ministry will not now continue it for many days; and the Prefect of Paris has just published a statement which may be looked upon as preparatory to the re-establishment of the civil régime in that capital. In this document the Prefect shows that the operatives of the provinces, who had been enticed in large numbers into Paris by the prospect of small or no work and large pay at the Ateliers Nationaux, have been gradually withdrawing from Paris since the defeat of the Red Republican insurrection, and that scarcely any of them now remain, except those who are detained by the Government in the prisons of the state, for their participation in that event. The number of these, which includes, of course, all the Parisian operatives who were made prisoners in those unhappy days, amounts to 9240. This is a fearful number; too large both to punish or to set at liberty; but not so enormous large as to be unmanageable, with due severity towards the most guilty, and leniency towards those who have least offended. One of the most alarming and embarrassing circumstances that succeeded the Revolution of February was the emigration from Paris of the wealthy classes. Not only has this emigration ceased since the defeat of Red Republicanism, but great numbers of those who had quitted Paris have since returned to it. While the domestic affairs of the Republic thus manifest signs of improvement consequent upon the restoration of order and confidence, its foreign relations require all the prudence of its governors to prevent mischief. The circumstances of Italy are grave, and a demand, it is said, has been addressed to General Cavaignac by the King of Sardinia for direct intervention to aid in the expulsion of the Austrians. It does not yet appear that this demand has been either acceded to or refused; but either alternative will severely try the French Government.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

OSBORNE.

On Sunday morning the Queen and the Prince and younger branches of the Royal family walked in the grounds. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness, and the Royal household, attended divine service at Whippenham Church at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. The sermon was preached by the Rev. T. Protheroe. The Royal dinner party in the evening included the Marchioness of Ormond and Admiral Sir George Seymour.

On Monday morning the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal family took the usual walks. No additional was made to the Royal dinner party in the evening.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, took an early walk in the park at Osborne. The younger members of the Royal family also walked and rode in the grounds. The Royal dinner party, this day, included Colonel and Lady Catherine Harcourt, the Hon. Mrs. Phipps, and the Reverend Lord Lyttelton.

On Wednesday, Lieutenant-Colonel Seymour left Osborne, and was succeeded in his duties, as Equerry to the Prince, by Colonel Wylde. Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps has succeeded General Wemyss as Equerry to the Queen. The Royal dinner-party included Colonel and Lady Catherine Harcourt and Mr. Granville Vernon, the Hon. Mrs. Phipps, and Lady Lyttelton.

Several Cabinet Councils have been held during the week.

PARLOUR ESSAYS.—No. I.

TYRANNIS IN A FREE COUNTRY.

LET not the reader be startled by the words at the heading of this Chapter. We are not about to enter into a political disquisition; we are not about to declaim in the style of the hustings, the platform, the House of Commons, or in any style or way whatsoever, upon political grievances. We are not about to express any satisfaction or dissatisfaction with Whig or Tory, Liberal or Conservative. On the contrary, we are about to confess at the outset—and perhaps politics after the confession—that all things considered, and comparing ourselves with our neighbours on the continents of Europe and America, we are about as free a people as any that exist upon the earth. We are theoretically free by the law—free to think, free to speak, free to write, almost free to trade; and are, besides, in a tolerably fair way of removing most of the impediments to the more perfect practical freedom in these and other respects that has been imagined for humanity by the earnest and enthusiastic spirits of this and of a former time. But we with all this freedom —great or little as it may be—are we free of ourselves? Do we not, in fact, create tyrannies for one another? Do we not forge chains, and fasten them upon our own wrists and ancles, and walk about in the custody of tyrannical task-masters, whom we hug to our bosoms, and love as affectionately as we love ourselves? It is the opinion of the writer of this article that we do; and he will endeavour to point out the most prominent, oppressive, and fondly cherished of these various tyrannies to the consideration of all who would not only be politically but morally free.

First and foremost stands PREJUDICE. This is a tyranny that afflicts individuals as well as communities—a tyranny for which, without being aware of the extreme love and affection they bear it in their own case, most people have a very strong aversion when they see it in others. In its national form, Prejudice is not a little detrimental to the progress of humanity. It rules with an iron rod. It impels nations into bitter disputes of words, and into the still more bitter and fearful disputes of the sword and the cannon. "We hate the French," said the free Englishman of the days of Marlborough, "because they are all slaves, and wear wooden shoes"—never thinking that French slavery, if it existed, was a cause for pity and assistance, not for hatred; and that, after all, wooden shoes might be as comfortable to the wearer as leather ones, and that, whether they were or not, it was a matter of no consequence to any one. "We are the cream of the earth," said the Englishman of a later date; "whatever is not English is foreign—whatever is foreign is bad." The French, who were and are ambitious of vieing with us in everything, neither were nor are behind us in prejudice. The result has been the mutual exasperation and damage of both parties. The Frenchman remains in the eye of English prejudice a lean, frog-eating, mancere, vain-glorious boaster, destined by Providence to be the natural enemy of an Englishman, and to be ingloriously beaten whenever the question comes to the test of fisticuffs. The Englishman, on the other hand, remains in the eye of French prejudice a hard, rich, pudding-headed, sombre, fat obstruction in the way of France; a boaster who pretends to have won the battle of Waterloo, when in fact it was won by the other side; and one who is destined to be driven from the rank of a first-rate power in Europe to the third-rate position that the size of his country would seem naturally to designate him for him. The most remarkable form of this kind of prejudice is to be found among the Chinese and Japanese. Both of these flatter their darling tyranny to such an extent, as to make it perfectly majestic in its absurdity. They have such a confirmed habit not only of looking out, but of a tree, and they make this nest a world. They despise the branch that bears it—the tree of which it is a part—and they absolutely deny the existence of the soil from which the tree draws its subsistence. Their nest is the great world: the branch, the tree, the soil, the mighty universe, are but inventions made by the envious and impotent few of people who are not "celestial." What a fearful tyranny this may be made! Nay, what a fearful tyranny it has shown itself to be! How it rules free nations, western as well as eastern, to this hour! Were it rooted out—were men determined to banish tyranny, by disembarrassing themselves of it, what a fruitful source of mischief would be removed from the world! We hated the French once, because of their shoes. The consequences of that hatred remain in the jealousy and mistrust felt towards each other by two nations whose cordial amity might change the destinies of humanity. We hate the shape proportions of the human race, because their skins were of a different colour from our own; and we see the result, if not among ourselves, among our children and our neighbours. We have conquered this particular power of the tyranny; but we see, from him that would not be free with a system, what a strangent tyranny it is, and how little reason any nation has to boast of its political freedom, when it allows so wretched a prejudice to overmaster it, in spite of true policy, of reason, and of religion.

Into the question of Individual Prejudice we need not enter. Its forms are too multitudinous, and yet too well known to need specification. The slave to prejudice is the most deluded of slaves. He serves a fiend, and thinks he is a god. He harbours an enemy in his bosom, and thinks he is a friend. He takes a thief among his jewels, and considers him an honest man. He puts the children of his enemy out into the safe keeping of a murderer. He trusts his bread and his meat, his oil and his wine, to one whose monomania is to poison for the sake of poisoning. If a man had a prejudice against the sun, and imagined that his beams spread abroad coldness, darkness, disease, and death, instead of warmth, light, health, and life, what a miserable slave every body would confess him to be! Let the reader ask himself if he foster no prejudice as outrageous; and if he do, let him make himself free.—an effort will do it and acknowledge that he has lived in the cold shadow when he might have lived in the sunshine, and been a voluntary slave when he might have been a free man.

The next great tyranny is that of HABIT. What a super-obstinate tyranny is this! If we but once give it a footing upon our land it takes entire possession of the estate. If we once put it on like a glove it enters through the pores of the hand, and affects the whole system. If we once breathe it, it will make our lungs its own. Sometimes harmless, sometimes hurtful, it is always wrong-headed. If it listen to reason, it very doggedly refuses to obey. A curious instance of the unreasoning nature of the bold habitué, was very recently offered at Manchester. It is the habit or the custom in that town to dine at one or two o'clock in the afternoon. The habit interferes with business, and most people complain of it. Nothing would seem more easy than that those who complain should break through it, cast the tyrant off, and be free to dine when London or Liverpool dines, or at any other time they please. It seems easy, but it is not. The tyranny has taken root, and is as firm as if Law compelled the dining in the middle of the day under the penalty of fine and imprisonment. Private meetings have been held—public meetings have been summoned to shake off the monster habit; but, as yet, all attempts have been in vain, and Manchester dines against its will at the hour the tyrant specifies.

The tyrannies of snuff-taking, tobacco-smoking, opium-eating, alcohol-imbibing, and various others, will immediately suggest themselves to the reader: they are all equally powerful. The man may know and confess that they waste his substance, destroy his health, impair his mind, and embitter his existence; but what then? He will not put forth his strength and conquer the tyrant as he might do. No; he calls him foul names and hugs him to his bosom, designates him a pernicious tyrant, and yet helps the said tyrant to rivet his chains the faster.

Another tyranny, as powerful though scarcely so malevolent, is FASHION. We all ourselves are the willing command of strange nature: although we know all the while that we are doing wrong. We know that it is at yrant's command; yet we do not resist. We impair the symmetry of our manhood, we dess roy the beauty of our womanhood, we distort and injure our feet, and our ribs, because this tyrant wills it; and though the warning voices of those who see and abominate the tyranny are daily shouted in our ears, we give a faint assent to admonitions that are so common as to have become truisms, and continue slaves.

Into the tyranny of SEX we shall not enter. It is a very heartless and cruel tyranny; but as the national law is responsible for it to a greater extent than the individual mind, we shall say no more of it than that we hope law will soon become more civilised in this respect, and acknowledge woman to be something better than man's chattel. As for all the other tyrannies we have mentioned,

Who would be free, himself must strike the blow.

Notes by the Northumberland Club.

(a) This is a good move, and seems to give White the better position.

(b) The best move, we believe.

(c) This is well played, and virtually wins the game. If Black now take R P (check), White interposes, and, after exchanging, will win by force. The position is a very interesting one, and quite a study in Pawn play.

(d) The speediest and surest method of bringing matters to a close.

Notes by the Northern portion of Club.

(a) Q to K 2d would, we believe, be better play; but, in any case, this opening gives the first player a strong attack.

(b) An excellent move, and extremely difficult to parry.

(c) A hazarde, the threatened advance of P to K 6th must be prevented.

(d) It is clear they had moved Kt to K Kt 3d. White would have played Kt to K B 3d with great effect.

(e) Black cannot save both the attacked Pawns and prefers to leave the advanced one, which ends in a difficulty have been long defended. Advantage.

(f) A very important move, and one which most materially improves the aspect of Black's game. Q to K 3d is better.

(g) White have now no safe retreat for the Bishop, and by leaving him to be taken we believe they cannot maintain the acquired Pawn.

(h) Very well played. Black cannot yet take the Pawn to advantage.

(i) If they play K to Rook's 2d they are obviously mated in two moves, and as they cannot otherwise evade the perpetual check, except by losing the Rook's Pawn, the game was fairly enough abandoned as drawn.

CHOPIN'S PLAYING

THE pale wizard's fingers,
With magical skill,
Make a music that lingers
In memory still.

There wild bells are tinkling,
And shoot-ing-stars twinkling;
Great meteors are rushing,
Soft streamlets are gushing,
Through meadows of flowers,
And deep shady bowers,
Full of music the maddest,
Th-e sweetest, the saddest,
Men's cares all entrancing
With light echoes glancing
Now nightingales breathing;
Now fierce oceans seething;
The wild silence dying,
To heaven in flying,
Beats ea-sual of the hearer

To Paradise nearer,
And seems a thanksgiving
From all that are living
With ecstacy thrilling.
The heart-tones distilling,
Through space resound lowly,
Pathetic and holy
Like a chant of the fairies
The harmony varies,
With long-drawn whisperings,
Out of life's hidden springs,
Till the wizard awaking,
With every nerve shaking,
Pours a last peal of thunder
That leaves us in wonder.

So his magical fingers,
With exquisite skill,
Make a music that lingers
In memory still.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

The simplicity of his nature was shewn in too many things not to be credited in this. It is related of him that when he presented himself for ordination, at the time when he thought of the Church, he was rejected because he appeared before the bishop in a pair of scarlet breeches. All this is reconcileable with that want of foresight which led him to contemplate setting up to teach English in Holland, without knowing a word of Dutch; and that story which is told of him by Dr. Parr, to whom he communicated a scheme he had in view of going to decypher the inscriptions on the Written Monuments, though he did not understand a syllable of Arabic. It was this guilelessness, and thoughtlessness, and arrogance of character, which no dreadful injuries could deform into selfishness, or strain into practical sagacity in his dealings with the world—this extraordinary union of wisdom as an observer of mankind, and incapacity to turn that observation to account in his own interests—which gave the beauty to his life, and kept it pure. And it is remarkable that, with feelings so impressionable and impulsive, this easy-natured and most tender of human beings appears never to have fallen into love. A passing emotion of that sort flitted over him in Dublin, but left no permanent trace. But the truth was that his nature was too diffusive, his affections too comprehensive, to be narrowed to a passion that finally reverts to, and concentrates itself on, one. His life was unfavourable to its intelligence, and opened few opportunities for its awakening in a heart so shy, and weak in its self-reliance.—Bentley's Miscellany.

GREEK MEETING GREEK.

The proprietors of gambling-houses in London, in Paris, all over the world, are Greeks by universal acclamation. One evening a wine-merchant, of high reputation in the City, entered the Athenæum in St. James's-street (not the establishment otherwise known as the Athenæum in Pall-Mall), and called for a hundred pounds' worth of counters. He received and lost them. He then demanded another hundred pounds' worth; and when they had gone the same way as their predecessors, a third hundred was given to him. He lost this supply, and peremptorily insisted upon more. This was refused; whereupon he asserted that he had given a cheque for four hundred pounds, and that, consequently, there was still a hundred coming to him. The cheque was then shewn to him; he took it in his hand, observed that it was only for three hundred, tore it in pieces, walked out of the house, and so closed that transaction. Who was the Greek in this deal?—Natural History of the Dandy Tribe. By J. W. Carleton.

LORD BYRON AND "MY GRANDMOTHER'S REVIEW"

At the close of the first canto of "Don Juan," its noble author, by way of propitiating the reader for the morality of his poem, says:—

The pub is approbative I expect,
And beg they'll take my word about the moral,
Which I wish their amusement will connect,
As—should it prove sterile—such receive a curse!
Meantime, they'll doubtless please to recollect
My gradual progression to the land
For fear some prudish reader should grow skittish,
I've bribed my Grandmother's Review—the British.

I sent it in a letter to the editor,
Who thank'd me duly by return of post—
I'm for a handsome article his creditor;
Yet if my gentle muse he please to roast,
And cram my promise after saying made it her
Jerq ing the rec-pt of what is cost,
And swear my page with gall instead of honey,
All I can say is—that he had the money.

Canto 1 at octa. exx.

Now, the British was a certain staid and grave high-church review, the editor of which received the poet's imputation of bribery as a serious accusation; and, accordingly, in his next number after the publication of "Don Juan," there appeared a paragraph, in which the receipt of any bribe was roundly denied, and the idea of such connivance altogether repudiated, the editor adding, that he should continue to exercise his own judgment as to the merits of Lord Byron, as he had hitherto done in every instance! However, the affair was too hilarious to be at once altogether dropped; and, so long as the prudish publication was in existence, it enjoyed the soubriquet of "My Grandmother's Review." By the way, there is another hook connected with this poem. One day an old gentleman gravely inquired of a printseller for a portrait of "Admiral Noah" to illustrate "Don Juan".—London Anecdotes: No. 2. Popular Authors.

HOW IS THE POSITION OF AUTHORS TO BE IMPROVED.

And, even in respect to them, how much must the public, at least stand by it through good and bad report, before it can know whose stamps are its true representatives, whose are to falsify the marks of the trade? Bring me those honest men, then, and judging their literary acts by the same severe standard as they by which they judge all else, I trust we shall know them. Then will they receive from me, and from all the world, the encouragement which is due to a rope-dancing, is not a craft, not an amusement, but the worthy thought of earnest men, and as such worthy of all honour.—British Quarterly Reviews.

THE CURSE OF THE SOLDIER

It would be no such difficult matter to elevate the moral character of the soldier if we could keep him from yielding to the allurements of drink. But there is not much hope of this, so long as we cast him abroad upon the world to seek his pleasures and his comforts. There is nothing for him at home. In point of fact, there is no home to keep him. Everything about him is public, exposed, uncomfortable. He may lounge about on his cot, half-asleep and half-awake; or he may parade about the barrack-square; or smoke a cheap cigar in its vicinity. But domestic enjoyment is utterly denied to him. Be he married or single, it is all the same; he has no home in barracks. Hundreds are crowded together with as little regard to decency as to comfort; there is nothing in the world to induce the soldier to spend his time off parade in quiet, rational pursuits; he is not supposed to have the ordinary wants of humanity; and yet, with everything against him, with everything to demoralise, with everything to drive him to the bottle, he is expected to be infinitely more steady and sober than men in every other condition of life. The least unsteadiness of gait; the least bewilderment of manner; a blushing of the face; a thickness of utterance—and the vigilance of the non-commissioned officer sets it down at once to the influence of liquor. He is put through his facings; and woe betide him if he boggles at the "left about three quarters." It is right enough that we should endeavour to keep him from drinking, but there are better ways of doing it than by putting him through his facings, and then sending him to the guard. The "hangman's gripe" will, after all, never "make a drunkard sober." It may sink him lower and lower in the abyss of destruction; it will never lead him a single hand. Neither extra guards, nor solitary cells, nor the cruel cat, will ever keep a man from drinking; the more he is punished, the more surely he is script of his self-respect, and the less cogent, therefore, all inducements to self-denial. The sense of shame is soon deadened within him, and then his descent is rapid and sure.—North British Review.

DYAK SUPERSTITION.

One superstition which obtains with, among the Dyak races is remarkable to the last degree. When, taking his way through a forest or any other lonely place, a Dyak hears the note of a certain black bird uttered from a particular direction, he will immediately stop, and become agitated by the most violent emotions. Nothing will induce him to proceed any farther on the same course. A Dyak, one morning traveling with an Englishman, heard the bird's voice on his right hand. Without uttering a sound, he instantly stopped, trembled violently, and, catching hold of his companion's arm, endeavoured to lead him from the spot. The European asked the reason of this proceeding, but could obtain no answer until, having been hurried away by the trembling savage, he had placed himself where the note of warning could no longer be heard. It was then that the Dyak explained that it was a bird-sign, which to hear shut had, but in what the terror consisted he could not tell.—Lowe's Edenburgh Magazine.

EXAMPLE OF THE LATE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

In the first ardour of popular triumph the French believed themselves to have set an example which all the nations of the civilised world could not fail to follow. Appearances, indeed, for some time justified such expectations. The torch of insurrection kindled in the streets of Paris, lit up a flame in Berlin and Vienna: Poles, scattered, like the Jews of old, throughout all Christendom, fondly dreamt that their independence was, at length, at hand; Lombardy flew to arms and shook off the leaden Teutonic bondage; the supreme head of the Church himself, on his temporal throne, was compelled to bespeak states more metamorphosed into constitutional governments; Holstein rebelled against Denmark; even Hanover ventured to remonstrate with her arbitrary sheriff of magistrate, Ernest, Augustus; and muttered, at least, the wrongful spirit of demand of various kinds of terrible vengeance; Venice shook off her chains; Sicily slipped from her yoke, Irish disaffection almost ripened into open rebellion; and chartists frightened the good city of London from its propriety.—Colburn's Magazine.

HAVRE

Havre has a terrible air of business. You feel this at once. The moment you land you are called up in ropes, and casks, and trucks, and porters, and cranes, and the bustle of the Custom House. The life of Havre is on its quays and its docks. There is no relief or escape from its din and clatter. If you attempt to go into the streets, it is still the same thing. Crowds in House and the same pursuits you wherever you turn. Even the Boulevard, which, in most towns, is the resort of the idle, who affect to be the fine people in the world, is here the walk of merchants, who affect to be the most busy people in the world. This street is one wide, long, noisy, dusty, bustling, hot, stifling Change, where you can not meet a friend, but will want wonderfully to discuss matters of business. It refers to the trade in progress, if already made.—Wagside Pictures, in Bentley's Miscellany.

LINCOLN CATHEDRAL.—WESTERN FRONT.

porch has a front extremely rich, with panels and hanging tracery, and a very curious roof of stone, panelled. Under the windows at the end of the transepts, in the interior, are two monuments of late, but the very finest design, and the best execution; the foliage very interesting, and vieing in elegance with the work of our best cathedrals: although not much known, they will doubtless soon become celebrated. Here is also the famous and deservedly-admired font

From a mistake as to time—half-past five having been fixed as the moment of return the train was obliged to leave the Nottingham station for its return to Lincoln without having received those noble and distinguished gentlemen and the officials of the Institute, who had been invited to the hospitality of Wollaton. They arrived at the station at six o'clock; as the train was in motion, and another engine being on its way down the line, return was impossible. The party were conveyed to Lincoln, however, by the subsequent trains, so as to appear in the course of the evening at the soirée given by the Mayor and Corporation to the Institute, and which was excellently attended. As usual in Lincoln, it became a ball from the commencement of the arrivals; and polka, waltz, and quadrille continued till nearly two hours after midnight—which, after the fatigues of twelve hours' journey in the daytime, proves how much the visitors were delighted. The supper consisted entirely of fruit, as being more cooling and refreshing than more solid viands, and finer fruit could not have been procured.

SATURDAY.

EXCURSION TO KIRKSTEAD, TATTERSALL, AND BOSTON.

At nine o'clock on Saturday morning nearly the same party as that which gathered on the previous day left Lincoln, by favour of the Great Northern Railway, in carriages lent by the Midland Company, and were conveyed to the Boston steam-packet, about seven miles from their terminus. On board they found a handsome déjeûner à la fourchette, provided by the liberal thoughtfulness of Mr Chaplin, of Blankney, and feasted right merrily, with a slight interruption of walking to the Abbey at Kirkstead, founded for the Cistercians, to the honour of the Virgin Mary, in 1138, by Hugh Brito, son of Eudo, both Lords of Tattersall. Of this Norman edifice nothing remains but a most interesting and most beautiful tall ruin, such as is represented on this page, which is assumed to be the end of the south transept of the Abbey. Thence a walk to the Church, of the next style, and across the fields, brought the party over a neck of land to a point whither the steamer had preceded them round a considerable bend. A short time served for their transport to Tattersall, and here they visited the fine brick Tower, with four octagon turrets, of perpendicular-work, with walls 13 feet thick, on an oblong plan, built between 1433 and 1443, by Lord Cromwell, Treasurer to King Henry VI.

The Church, also shown in the view in relation to its situation with the Castle, is of late Perpendicular style, cruciform, with a western square tower, and aisles to the nave, which extend to the west side of the tower.

Boston, one of the largest churches and loftiest towers in the kingdom, was next visited. The Church is principally Decorated, the tower Perpendicular—both excellent in their kind—and the chancel is partly of both.

The interior is on a very magnificent scale, the mouldings of the arches and piers remarkably bold and good; but the Church is groined for its ceiling in plaster, in a work of not very good modern design.

There are three stalls in the south aisle, and several monumental arches—one rich, the others plainer. Some of the parapets and pinnacles are very beautiful, particularly a sort of niche on the east end of the north aisle.

The tower, which is one of the finest compositions of that style, is a complete arrangement of panelling over walls and buttresses, except the belfry story, in which the window is so large as nearly to occupy the whole face of the tower. A very rich and elegant lantern rises from the tower, and is supported by flying buttresses from the four pinnacles, and has also a rich pierced battlement and eight pinnacles; this lantern is panelled throughout, and each side is pierced with a large two-light window, having double transoms. This composition gives to the upper part of the steeple a richness and lightness of appearance scarcely equalled in the kingdom.—(See the opposite Engraving). The party returned to Lincoln, which was reached about nine o'clock in the evening.

SUNDAY

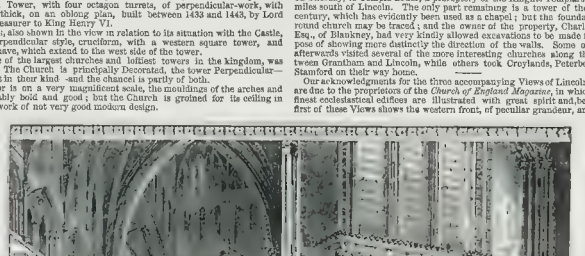
Service at the Cathedral in the morning, when the Dean preached, was attended by nearly all the visitors brought by the meeting into the town, as well as by a larger number than usual of inhabitants, amongst them Dr. Buckland, the Duke of St. Albans, Lord Monson, and Lord Brownlow.

MONDAY

On Monday there was a meeting of the historical and other sections, at the Assembly-Rooms, when several short papers were read. By Edward Hawkins, Esq., of the British Museum, on the Mint of Lincoln; by J. Talbot, Esq., on the Chapel of Chesterfield, in Somersetshire; by the Dean of Hereford, on some Crosses found near that city; by Lord Monson, on Baronial Feuds in Lincolnshire; by J. G. Nichols, Esq., on the Earls of Lincoln; by E. J. Willson, Esq., on the death of Queen Eleanor and the erection of the Eleanor Crosses, and by the St. Mary's Conduit, in Lincoln. After some other conversation, the Earl Brownlow took the chair, and the general meeting was held, at which the report was read, and the state of the funds of the Society announced to be prosperous. The place of meeting for next year was fixed to be at Salisbury, after rival claims had been put in for that honour from Oxford, Hereford, Durham, and Chichester. Several votes of thanks were then carried and responded to, and the meeting broke up. It has been generally acknowledged that the Lincoln meeting has been better attended, that the objects of interest have been more numerous, and the contributions to the Museum much greater than on any of the four previous occasions.

A kind of supplementary excursion, in which thirty or forty joined, took place on Tuesday, to Temple Bruer, a preceptory of the Knights Templars, about ten miles south of Lincoln. The only part remaining is a tower of the thirteenth century, which has evidently been used as a chapel; but the foundations of the round church may be traced; and the owner of the property, Charles Chaplin, Esq., of Blankney, had very kindly allowed excavations to be made for the purpose of showing more distinctly the direction of the walls. Some of the party afterwards visited several of the more interesting churches along the cliff, between Grantham and Lincoln, while others took Croylands, Peterborough, and Stamford on their way home.

Our acknowledgments for the three accompanying Views of Lincoln Cathedral are due to the proprietors of the Church of England Magazine, in which work our finest ecclesiastical edifices are illustrated with great spirit and beauty. The first of these Views shows the western front, of peculiar grandeur, and by competent judges preferred to every other in England. In the second Illustration is shown the western transept, with its exquisite rose window; and in the companion Engraving we have Bishop Longland's monument—a work of elaborate art, just by the south-eastern porch.



LINCOLN CATHEDRAL.

BISHOP LONGLAND'S MONUMENT

At the foot of the central page we have illustrated one of the rarest and most remarkable of the contents of the museum—a Calendar Stick, with inscriptions in Runic characters. In Icelandic, "Rimakefli" signifies a stick with an incised inscription; but the specific appellation for this walking-stick converted into a calendar is "Rimstok," or "Primstaf;" the first term being literally calendar stick, the other expressing the same notion in the term "new moon staff." The inscription is in three lines: the first being filled up by the days of the week; the next, by the cycle of the golden number; and the third, by hieroglyphics or symbols of the social and religious events of the month, so as to put the labourer in daily remembrance of his duties. The side represented exhibits, near the handle, the month of July, and the column is finished by December; a corresponding column containing the earlier six months of the year—the inscription ascending from A to B. The sticks are generally found either three or four-sided, but the present example is round, and about three feet eight inches long: the mounting is modern. This very interesting relic was exhibited to the Institute by Sampson Hodgkinson, Esq.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

WILLIAM TORRENS M'CULLAGH, ESQ., M.P.

A REVIEW of the great deal that has been spoken, and the very little that has been done, during the present session, and the important measures that now, at the close of it, are of necessity to be hurried over or thrown aside, may well give rise to the idea that Parliament is fast becoming so crowded with talkers, that it will shortly be impossible, in the course of a session, even without holidays, to get through any business. Speeches there must be, but it would be an incalculable benefit if by any means members could be got to speak only upon subjects which are important and which they understand, and only at such length as is needful to explain their views. Mr. M'Cullagh is one of the few who has adopted this course; he has the rare merit of being a practised and accomplished speaker, who knows when not to speak, and who, when he does speak, says no more than the case requires. He has been a member of the House since March last, when he was seated on petition for Dundalk; and although distinguished as a public speaker, amongst other questions upon that of Free-trade, he has only spoken thrice, and on each occasion briefly to the purpose.

MR. M'CULLAGH, M.P. FOR DUNDALK.

The first speech, when our press of foreign matter made it impossible for us to find room for the Sketch, was on Friday the 30th ult., on the Sugar question. He showed that distress amongst the planters was not new thing: that they had complained just as loudly when they had the slave-trade, slavery, apprenticeship, and the complete monopoly of the British market; that the competitors who were now pressing most closely on the West Indies were not the slaves of Cuba and Brazil, but the free labourers of India and Ceylon; that the export of sugar machinery within the last two years had increased to the East, where sugar was the produce of free labour, and fell in addition to the slave-producing countries; that Burke, Fox, Wilberforce, Clarkson, and all the great leaders and advocates of the abolition of the slave-trade, had dwelt upon the greate. spirit, skill, effectiveness, and cheapness of free labour; and the published observations of the late Joseph J. Gurney during his tour in the West Indies confirmed their views. Speaking of the rights of the consumers, he said "It was easy for those who lived in affluence to look out through the plate-glass of their own luxurious condition upon the wintry day of laborious life, and marvel why the struggling multitude appeared so ill at ease. But it was the imperative duty of the Legislature to endeavour to keep steadily in view the wants and hardships of the many. It was the boast of commerce, that it rendered those things that once were luxuries so cheap as to lead men to regard them as necessaries: but it was the reproach of unjust or excessive taxation, that it turned what had become necessaries into luxuries again."

This is the very point that it most behoves the people of this country to keep a strict watch upon. After laborious years of agitation and difficulty, they have won freedom for trade, but the progressive increase of taxation is tending to make dear again what free industry has cheapened.

On Thursday week Mr. M'Cullagh moved an amendment on the Irish Encumbered Estates Bill. The Bill limits the right of petitioning for a sale to the owner of the estate, to the first incumbrancer, and the mortgagee in possession of the title-deeds. These several parties, Mr. M'Cullagh pointed out, are not at all likely to seek the sale of the estate. The owner does not want to sell, because he clings to the honour of being still an owner of the family name and the family lands. They prop him up in a position that he has no wish to come down from. The first incumbrancer does not want to sell, because he, for the most part, holds a charge under a family settlement, or an old judgment on a bond; and has, in either case, about the best possible investment, and one which at any time he can transfer or sell. The mortgagees with the deeds were mostly parties who had taken such care that their investments were safe, and with such sufficient margin of rent for interest, that to wait for them to sell would be to wait for ever. The parties really interested in having the estate sold were those not then included in the Bill, though they were included on its first introduction last year—the lesser incumbrancers, who, year after year, as they saw the estate decay, had it forced upon them that the chances were becoming less and less either of interest or repayment. Mr. M'Cullagh proposed, therefore, that these minor incumbrancers should also have the right of requiring a sale given them, which would make the Bill effective, and really would bring land on Ireland into the market. The amendment was negatived by a large majority, but there can be no doubt that without it the Bill will be practically a dead letter. The encumbered estates will remain as they are; there will be no sales; and the land will be left to keep a ruined landlord and half-starved tenantry, instead of passing into the hands of a solvent owner, who could spur the tenantry to improvement instead of grinding them down to beggary. By next year the uselessness of the present Bill will, probably, have been learned, and Mr. M'Cullagh may carry then what has so absurdly been rejected now. At all events, this amendment, and the conciseness of the speech with which it was introduced, give us hope that the honourable member will bring forward in the ensuing session what has so long been vainly looked for, some practical measures for the real benefit of Ireland. Mr. M'Cullagh again spoke upon the above bill on Tuesday night.

Mr M'Cullagh was born in October, 1813, took his degree in Dublin University in 1833, and was called to the bar in January, 1836. Two years afterwards he founded the still flourishing Dublin Mechanics' Institute. He is known as the author of a work on the Use and Study of History, published in Dublin in 1841, and of the "Industrial History of Free Nations," a work of laborious research, tracing especially the growth of the commercial spirit amongst the Greeks and Dutch, published in London in 1846. At the general election of 1847 he stood as a candidate for Dundalk, and was defeated by a majority of three; but, on petition, was seated by a scrutiny of the votes.

THE "SEA LIONESS."

A NUMBER of species of the Seal have been confounded under the name of "Sea Bear;" and there have been several honoured with the name of "Sea Lion." One of the latter was brought to this country last week, and exhibited at the Cosmorama-rooms, Regent-street. This specimen was captured in latitude 70° south, upon an iceberg near the Crozet Islands, whence it was taken to the Cape of Good Hope, where it was exhibited several months, and thence it was brought to our metropolis. It differed from the common seal, in its broad flat head, and blunt muzzle, in which respects it resembled the "Sea Lion" of Forster (Leo marinus, Buffon). The skull is of very peculiar form; but the chief character is presented by the teeth: of these there are only four conical cutting teeth in each jaw; these are far apart, and much resemble the canine teeth. The molar teeth, or grinders, are small, with large simple cylindrical roots; whereas, in the common Seal, the roots are divided.

HEAD OF THE "SEA LIONESS."

Captain Triscott, of the Matheus, who brought this specimen to England, describes it as good-tempered, and displaying considerable intelligence in the recognition of persons. At the Cosmorama Rooms it was kept in a tank of sea-water, beneath which it occasionally dived, but more frequently it rested its head upon the edge of the tank, with the whole body nearly out of water. The poor creature was, evidently, far from vigorous; and, after being exhibited three or four days, it died, on Monday last. It was fed upon fish, and the blood of animals, which it appeared to be very fond of.

The surface of the body was covered with smooth black hair, of a brownish tint. One of the Illustrations shows the general conformation of the animal: its fore-paws resemble human hands, but have longer nails, not claws. In the other Engraving is shown the head, with long whiskers, and large, round, bright eyes.

NATIONAL SPORTS

Sweet is thy pastime,
And easy the means to health, as they rise.—Poppy

The autumnal quarter is prodigal of sports in all their infinite variety. During the present month there will be upwards of forty race meetings. August is the especial time for regattas of importance. The people's recreation, cricket, now greatly prevails. Grouse shooting, a class sport, it is true, but one of the wildest known to civilisation, will commence this day week. The angler pants for the running waters—in short, it is the occasion for almost every species of out-door amusement conducive to wholesome enjoyment, manly exertion, and boon intercourse. The turf, however, is without any matter of public account till York, which does not fall till the 23rd.

The regatta in Southampton Water can hardly claim the character of a national sailing. The scene is too confined to admit of any display of marine manœuvre or marine materiel. It was a most pleasant passage of aquatic revelry—a delightful amphibious holiday—but with scarce any higher maritime pretension. The rendezvous of the amateur sailor will presently be beyond the Solent, and then our leg will toll of encounters of pith and moment. To be sure, the spirit of yachting in some parts of the gentle and bright is not as courteous as might be desired; but the purest of blood has had its rills since the days of Virgil, as well as before—"tantene animis cœlestibus iræ?" And now it must be said in sorrow a cloud has come o'er the Lacyon course of cricket. This, until the present moon, was the purest of all pure pastimes—the honour of the victory was the player's only ire. But base here cast an eye upon it—and lo! there was advertised in the journals a "Grand Cricket Sweep!" Forthwith did Mr Dank express his "greatest possible objection," and passionate lovers of the game denounced the "pernicious project." Thus bad begun, we come to relate what remained behind. Upon the heels of the cricket lottery trode the following announcement: "Royal Victoria Purse Sweeps!!"

This was a little scheme of some five or six thousand pounds, to be decided by means of sailing matches between members of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club, in the neighbourhood of Ryde, in the course of the present month. At first sight, this seemed another "pernicious project." Your yachtsmen carry things with a high hand, and there promised to be something puzzling to the propriety of the white and the red burgee, in crie-de "Go it Gobyl in!" "Cut away Cardigan!" and the like. . . . But it is possible those who [illegible] were premature in their anxiety. Is not the whole affair a hoax? In the advertisement, it is stated that "Remittances can be made in Post-office stamps." . . . Can they? Would it not require as much of the adhesive plaster [illegible] the form it is at present manufactured to accomplish such a purpose, as would reach from the General Post-office to Spithead?

In the notices of the Goodwood Meeting, in the last number of this paper, a change affecting its future features was anticipated. This has already begun. In future, Lord Chiffney's stud will stand at Newmarket, trained by the elder Stephenson. Goodwood races became the first turf festival in the world when Lord George Bentinck had the first turf establishment in the world upon the spot—and became of it. Heaton Park, Eglinton Park, Gerhambury, are among the pleasant places—that were. Have they found fitting successors in the monster handicap days, which "express" their thousands for an hour to a betting-ring a hundred miles a-field, and then "express" them back again? Our matter is scarce germane to philosophy, and yet a useful moral may be read by those that

Catch the manners living as they rise.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—A very heavy settling on the Goodwood Meeting took up the greater part of the day; it went off smoothly, although some of the Surplice and Honeycomb party are said to be hit to a large amount. JUBA AT VAUXHALL.

THE only national dance that we really believe in, as a fact, is that of the Niggers. We mistrust the "Cachucha"—that is to say, whensoever we have seen it performed by a real Spanish danseuse, we have always pronounced it far inferior to Duvernay's in the "Diable Boiteux." We should never expect to see the "Redowa" danced in its own country as Cerito and St. Leon represent it at Her Majesty's Theatre; and we have some doubt as to whether Carlotta Grisi's delicious "Truandaise" was ever known in the Cour des Miracles of old Paris. Hornpipes are entirely confined to nautical dramas and pantomimes, or the square bit of board or patch of carpet of the street dancer; and anything so physically painful, not to say almost impossible, as those peculiar pas of the Chinese that we chanced to have witnessed in Europe convince us that at all events the execution must be exceedingly limited.

"JUBA," AT VAUXHALL GARDENS.

But the Nigger Dance is a reality. The "Virginny Breakdown," or Buck "Alabama Kick-up," the "Tennessee Double-shuffle," or the "Louisiana Tickle-toe," we know to exist. If they did not, how could Juba enter into their wonderful complications so naturally? How could he tie his legs into such knots, and fling them about so recklessly, or make his feet twinkle until you lose sight of them altogether, his energy. The great Bon Bonnerail could not, and he deserved the glory Lucs conferred. If our readers doubt this, let them go the very next Monday or other evening that arrives, and see him at Vauxhall Gardens.

But Juba is a musician, as well as a dancer. To him the intricate management of the nigger tambourine is confined, and from it he produces marvellous harmonies. We almost question whether, upon a great emergency, he could not [illegible]

Certainly the present company of Ethiopians, at the Gardens, are the best we have seen. They have with them Pell, the original "Bones" of Mr. Macready's theatre; and he is better than ever. No one, in the wildest flights of fashion ever ventured upon such extraordinary shirt-collars as he wears. nobody ever started such a frill, both of which have such marvellous properties of elongat n that, when excited, he can completely bury himself in His finery. One circumstance more upon the bones, which he gives after Punt deliberation and with an earnest feeling of the importance of his task, convulses the spectators. The Gardens are nightly crowded.

Madame Marie Macarte, the equestrian, who enjoys a brilliant throughout the United States, will make her first appearance here on and "John" has been re-engaged.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Bellini's "Puritani" was revived on Saturday night, to introduce Mdlle. Jenny Lind in a new part, that of Elvira. Of all the compositions of Vincent Bellini, not one, always excepting the "Sonnambula," has enjoyed a greater than the "Puritani." His "Adelson e Salvina," written in 1828, was followed, years afterwards, by "Bianca e Gernando," played at the San Carlo and the latter work secured him his engagement at La Scala, in M where he produced, in succession, "Il Pirata" (in which Rubini and Tamburini, for Maria de Marie Lalande and Tamburini; and then, his name having become renowned in Italy, he wrote the "Capuleti e Montecchi" for Venice and "I Montecchi" for Rome, the impression of which, four years later, and the tender and exalted Giorgio, warbled forth their varied emotions in one of tioned stream of melody; and there is no particular characteristic in the ideas to identify one part from the other, but the whole is rich and beautiful, and ro-sed and touched, by the unint upted flow of enchanting tunes, that there is no time to analyse the forms of the composer.

Hearing the "Puritani," and the "Norma," and the score afterwards, suggest very different notions to the critical examiner. Hackneyed, as the opera has been, for thirteen years, it was listened to on Saturday night with evide dly unmitigated feelings of delight. The Arturo of Mdlle. Lind, in the following Coliseum and Lablache in the splendid air of the lovers approach was graceful and

The most exquisite bit of vocalisation displayed by Mdlle. Lind, to our mind, was in the finale of the first act, where, in an under tone, A ere points forth her accents of desolation at Arturo's supposed flight with a rival. The most scene, "Qui la voce," in the second act, is very similar in the dramatic construction to that in the Lucia, and therefore afforded little scope for variety. The last scene, the faltering and resumption to reason on le ring that Arturo had only fulfilled his duty in saving the proscribed Queen, was very ably depicted. Mdlle. Jenny was much applauded for her exertions, and received a fervent ovation at the fall of the curtain.

To state that Coletti was Riccardo, and Lablache Giorgio, suffices to enable the connoisseurs to know how effectively these characters were sustained. Lablache, as usual, was the old Puritan, was a perfect study in the making up, and has aid in the concerted pieces was of the greatest importance. The trumpet obbligato, of course, demanded a second time. Gardoni was the Arturo, but his music is not in his vocalisation was not by which its brilliancy was affected; especially in the "Ah, se ancora" in singing sweetly at times, but was very deficient in power. The beautiful prayer of the Puritans, with its quaint, was omitted: this is a pity, as it is one of the gems of the opera.

On Tuesday night, and on Thursday, for the extra night, the "Puritani" was repeated.

The subscription season closes this evening (Saturday), but the theatre will remain open for extra representations.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA

Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" will be no doubt the attraction-rating point of attraction to the remainder of the season. Nothing else is talked of in the musical circles, and the perfection of the ensemble is recognised on all hands.

The emotions enkindled during the third act by the conjunction and benediction of the "daggers," and then by the magnificent acting and singing of Viardot and Mario, were quite overwhelming. On Saturday night, a triple encore was demanded for the "Conversazione." The "Reine Marguerite" and "Pif-paf" martial song of Mario, and the cavatina of Alboni in the second scene, are encored nightly. Viardot requested on Thursday night that the benefit of the gifted Viardot, and will be given again to-night (Saturday) and on Tuesday next.

On Tuesday last, Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" was performed. Grisi, Bonoli, Tamburini, and Mario were in splendid voice. The "Chorus of Musques" in the Prologue, was encored, and Alboni's drinking song demanded three times The trio in the second act was also encored, and was superb, executed by Grisi, Mario, and Tamburini.

At the eleventh hour on Thursday, owing to the sudden indisposition of Signor Mario, there was the greatest fear that the performance of Rosina would have played the character before but he had studied it for the French Grand Opera in English, of course, as he had only three hours' notice, and no rehearsal. His success was immense. Nothing could possibly express the finishing of the opening air, "Pleurez, pleurez mes yeux," with the alto obbligato of Hill. He electrified the house in the Septuor and the Duet, and was rapturously encored. The duo with Viardot, in the third act, was wonderfully sung, and was cheered from the last. Viardot sang the duo in French, and thus the ensemble was perfect. The reception of the whole was most cordial, and we had the honour of a recal before the curtain with Roger, amidst a shower of bouquets. The beauty of the organ of the French tenor, his fine style of declamation and power of expression, far exceed every expectation. Roger and Alboni had last night the duo, and the "Conjuration" was given twice in all its might and majesty. The house was crowded to excess.

On Thursday next Rosina's "Guillaume Tell" will be mounted with splendour. Roger will appear in Arnold, Madame Castellan in Mathilde, Marini in Tamburini, Polonini, Mei, Lavia, Tagliafico, &c., are in the cast. It will be worth a pilgrimage to hear the overture and choruses.

There is at present complete stagnation in the theatrical world. The greater part of the theatres are closed; and the current those now open will soon come to a termination.

The LYCEUM, on Monday, on the occasion the benefit of Madame Vestris and Mr Charles Mathews, has gentlemanly announced that it will be closed to the public for their patronage during the season, and spoke. Cheering terms of the association. We are but echoing the opinion of our contemporaries in bearing testimony to the unwearied and judgment displayed in every department of the theatre, and the attention to elegant detail, and true artistic effect which characterises all its productions. In these respects, the Lyceum stands

Adolphi. company continues to perform at the HAYMARKET.

Mr Bicknstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam are at the SURREY; and Mr. and Mrs Keeley at the MARYLEBONE, all proving highly successful. We intend to visit them and look forward to little to chronicle before the winter season commences.

MUSIC.

JENNY LIND'S CONCERT.—A more gratifying scene than that presented on Monday, in the Great Concert Room at Her Majesty's Theatre, has seldom been witnessed. The most distinguished artists exerted their talents in the cause of charity When the fact was ascertained that Jenny Lind has so ably undertaken to give a concert in aid of the funds of the Hospital for Consumption Brompton, we confess we felt no surprise at the offer—it was but an additional instance to many similar actions that have signalised her artistic career. Every seat in the area, the boxes, and the orchestra was filled by rank, fashion, and talent. The programme was admirable. We had the grand air of Mozart, from the "Flauto Magico," "Non pavento," with its wonderful altitudes and intricate passages; and the comic cavatina of Bellini, "Casta Diva?" Rossini's duet, from the "Turco," for princess Clara Novello and Lablache, and the amour trio of Meyerbeer from the "Crociato," Giovinetti Cavalieri; and last and not least by violins, as exhibiting the extraordinary power, brilliancy, finish, facility, and musicianship, the first violin part of which was executed in each instance to many similar actions that have signalised her artistic career. Jenny Lind acted as music director, giving the time and tasking the tempi very gracefully and pleasantly. Mons Reinhardt and Mr King were the flautists, and performed admirably. Mdlle Cruvelli sang a romanza of Nicoli. Signor Costelli delivered an aria from Mercadante's "Apoteosi di Ercole," and the amour trio of Meyerbeer from "Sonnambula." "Deh! ti ferma." The instrumental portion consisted of Liszt's fantasia of the "Lucia," and a pair of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," played by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt; and a violin concerto of De Beriot, played by Mr Cooper.

GRAND PERFORMANCE AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.—We call the attention of our readers to the great attraction presented at Drury-Lane on Monday night, being a benefit for the Institute four orphans of Madame Sinnacke Rousseau. The leader a mass of artistes, and the whole in a first-rate divertissement "Lucia" will be seen in Italian by Sanna Rosaves, Corradetti, and Mdme Castellan. In addition to this, a concert will be performed, in which Grisi, Mario, Salvi, Mei, Polonini, Ivanoff, Tamburini, and other artistes of the Royal Italian Opera, will sing. Mdlle. Lucile Grahn will dance in a ballet. The chorus and band, conducted by Lucas, will be selected from the Covent Gar- The only pay-house places for the ment

MDLLE LIND'S TOUR IN [illegible]. Mdlle Lind will commence the tour on [illegible] a fifth of November. She is engaged for twelve performances per month, either at concerts or on the stage. Mr. Knowles, of Manchester, is the chief speculator. He has engaged Roger of the Royal Italian Opera, to sing with Mdlle. Lind in "Sonnambula," "Lucia," "Puritan" and "Pria del Reggio entr." Lablache will be the basso, and Balfe the conductor.

MADAME STAMATY, the artiste, after the Norwich Festival, will make her début at the Académie de Musique (Théâtre de la Nation), in Paris, as Valentine, in "The Huguenots." She is engaged with M. Roger to appear in Meyerbeer's opera for the "Prophète," to be produced in January, 1849.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The satisfactory nature of the news from Ireland, on Monday, caused a temporary advance in Consols of about ¼ per cent, which, on the arrival of the Dublin news, on Tuesday, further improved. Consols, on Monday, at opening, quoted 86⅞ to ⅞, and closed at 86⅝. The opening price, on Tuesday, was 87⅛ to ⅜; and, after some slight fluctuations, prices closed the same. But, although on Wednesday the price quoted was 87⅜ to ½, the market towards the close of business displayed some weakness, and after the customary hours price receded to 87. This heaviness marked the opening on Thursday, arising from the unsettled state of the money market consequences with regard to the harvest. Joined to a confirmation of the preceding day's news of the defeat of the Parisian people, and consequent probability of French intervention. As the day progressed, however, prices somewhat recovered, prices receding 86⅞ for Money and Time. The approaching settlement has had, and will have, some effect on quotations, until after its adjustment. At its commencement, the Bulls had it all their own way, but the Irish disturbances have relaxed the Bear party have been enabled, in many instances, to buy in their accounts, and, as Money Stock is far from scarce, may, towards the close of the account, be enabled to carry over their sales. Apart from these circumstances, the unsettled state of Italian affairs, necessarily reflecting itself in French politics, coupled with the probability of a harvest not of unemployed capital Exchequer Bills have maintained their value during the month; the remainder of the English Funds fluctuating with Consols. At the close of business, on Thursday, the quotations for Bank Stock, 194; Reduced, 87⅝; Consols, 86⅝; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent, Annuities, 87⅜; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 1860, 9⅞; Ditto, Oct. 10, 1859, 8 11-16; India Bonds, £1000, 30 pm; Ditto, under £1000, 30 pm; Ditto, small, 30 pm; Consols for Account, 86⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, March, 41 pm; £1000, June, 37 pm; £500, June, 37 pm; £500, June, 34 pm; Small, March, 40 pm.

The Foreign Market has been neglected during the week, transactions having been confined to Mexican, Brazilian, Portuguese, Russian, and Dutch. Mexican, on Tuesday, quoted ⅜, but is since a shade lower. Prices generally are flat. In Spanish, Three per Cents, for the account, have been registered. The following list of the closing quotations may be regarded as almost nominal: Brazilian Bonds, Small, 69; Buenos Ayres Bonds, Six per Cent, 81; Mexican, Five per Cent., 18¾; Account, 17½; Spanish Five per Cents, 18¾, 11; Ditto, Passive, 2¼; Ditto, Deferred, 6¼; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 53¾

Shares continue to be but little dealt in, the market continuing heavy for all classes of securities. The little disposition to deal until after the declaration of the dividends, which, upon nearly all the important lines, fall the 15th month. The state of the market will be best shown, by the following list of actual bargains: Aberdeen, 8; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 22; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 14½; Eastern Counties, 14⅝; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 5 per Cent, 8¾; Great Northern, 6; Great Western, 86¾; Ditto, 8 Shares, 49; Ditto, Shares, 103½; Shares, 104; Yorkshire, Fifths, 10; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 5 per Cent, 8¾; Ditto (Preston and Wyre), 10; Ditto, Lancaster and Hornby, 10; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 39½; London and North-Western, 126¼; Ditto, New, 8¾; London and South-Western, 17; Midland, 10¾; [illegible] 4 pm, 8 dis; Ditto, 4 pm, 8 dis; Ditto, 4 pm, 8 dis; Ditto,

CHARLES II. IN HOLLAND, BEFORE THE RESTORATION."

PAINTED BY W. CARPENTER, Jun.

We have already spoken of this work as a picture of high class, in our notice of the late Exhibition of the Royal Academy. The incident is taken from the following passage in Pepys' "Diary," date May 16, 1660, and is a scene from the "unkingship of Charles II."—"This afternoon Mr. Edw. Pickering told me in what a sad poor condition for clothes and money the King was, and all his attendants, when he came to him first from my lord, their clothes not being worth forty shillings the best of them, and how exercised the King was when Sir John Grenville brought him some money, so joyful, that he called the Princess Royal and Duke of York to look upon it as it lay in the portmanteau before it was taken out."

Her Majesty's Visit to Balmoral.—We understand that some furnishings have been supplied for the Queen's Highland home, Balmoral, and that several ornamental bridges are being constructed over the Dee, as it runs through some of the walks cut out on the Royal domain. Major-General Riddell, Commander of the Forces in Scotland, has been at Aberdeen, and neighbourhood of Balmoral, from which it is conjectured that, besides the Court, we shall have some of her Majesty's troops stationed in the country, in the Vale of Dee. But nothing of an authoritative nature has yet appeared as to her Majesty's intentions on the subject.—Inverness Courier.

Disease in Grapes.—A disease, almost universal, has this year seized upon the [illegible] stage, a description of [illegible] which, I believe, and their natural size considered almost free from disease of any kind. No one seems to know how it originates, nor whether [illegible] or epidemic, though I am rather inclined to think it is something in the soil which causes the destruction. The grape, we understand, has been attacked at every stage, sometimes when it is not larger than a sweet pea, and sometimes when it has arrived at maturity, and in every stage between these points. The first sign, which appears suddenly, is a kind of damp bloom which comes over the grape, which then withers, decays, and finally rots.—Brighton Herald.

No. 330—Vol. XIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1848. [Sixpence.

THE SOCIAL AND DEMOCRATIC REPUBLICANS.

Nothing is more pitiless than a theory. No man is more cruel than a political or social enthusiast, when he meets with obstacles to the establishment or even trial of his schemes of social and political regeneration. The mild Robespierre committed unparalleled atrocities for the sake of his theories of government. Marat outraged humanity, thinking to be of service to humanity; and Danton, all for liberty, justice, and the safety of the Republic, as he understood it, organised those infamous murders known as the "September massacres." The committee appointed by the French National Assembly to inquire into the circumstances attending the insurrection of the 15th of May last, and the still more fearful doings of the four days of June, have given in a report which, if correct in its facts and deductions, would prove that the race of such "reformers" is not extinct with these men of evil memory; and that in Messrs. Ledru-Rollin, Louis Blanc, and Caussidière, the nineteenth century possesses three revolutionists who fully equal that other unscrupulous and daring trio whose names are so indelibly associated with the great Revolution of the eighteenth. Whether the report of the Committee of the Assembly be correct or incorrect, it is evident that the "Social and Democratic Republic" is the object of the wishes of these men, and those who have acted with them. They are not contented with merely political reforms. The utmost liberty that can be enjoyed by sensible, industrious, and educated men, is not the liberty that suits their notions of right. Nothing less than a total reorganisation of society seems of a nature to please them. Men must not only be free according to their ideas of freedom, but equality must be as absolute among them as among the bees in a hive. They would abolish the old frame-work of society—of which individuality, self-reliance, and exertion for one's-self and family, are the great props, and substitute instead of it a system in which all men shall be cut down to one mechanical standard. When the Revolution of February 24th unexpectedly vested power in a few of these men, in conjunction with M. de Lamartine and more moderate politicians who did not indulge in such Utopian visions, they found themselves in presence of a chance which they determined to make the most of. By themselves and their organs they proclaimed loudly that the new Revolution differed from all previous ones; that it was not a Revolution to change the forms of Government merely, but to re-constitute Society upon a more equitable basis, and provide bread for the humblest, whatever the amount of his capacity or of his exertions. To this faith they clung with the pertinacity of the most bigoted devotees, and found in obstacles but new incentives to exertion. As the Revolution grew older, these obstacles increased. The gulf of dissension betwixt themselves and their colleagues widened in proportion. Immediately it became evident that the National Assembly, chosen by Universal Suffrage, was not imbued with Socialist or Communist ideas; that it would be contented even with a Monarchy, if rational liberty were secured; and that its Republicanism was no more advanced than the Republicanism of the old Girondists, if it were even advanced so far, the energy of this party was exerted against the Assembly, against the Republic as established by the Revolution, and against Society itself. A few of the more vehement and imprudent of its members were so prominently implicated in the events of May and June, as to fall an easy prey to the offended law. They now await trial and punishment in the dungeons of Vincennes and the forts around Paris. But the great leaders have hitherto escaped. Their names have been upon the tongues of men. They have been loudly accused in private and in public, and but little doubt has been felt as to their guilt. The committee charged with the investigation of the whole of the circumstances attendant upon both catastrophes has at length made its report, and accused in set terms Messrs. Ledru-Rollin, Louis Blanc, and Caussidière, of treason against the Republic and society. The delivery of the report threatens a new crisis in French affairs. Though weak in the Assembly, the party is strong out of it; and it has become a question of the gravest importance, whether, in the actual state of men's minds, it is politic to pursue the inquiry. So much, however, has been said, that it is scarcely safe to let the matter rest; and such danger threatens political parties in the French capital from the further prosecution of the affair, that it is unsafe to go forward as it is to stand still. Under those circumstances, an abridgment of the report and the main points of the evidence on which it rests will not be uninteresting.

It will be remembered that Messrs. Ledru-Rollin and Louis Blanc were members of the Provisional Government of the French Republic, from the date of the Revolution to the day of meeting of the National Assembly, and that M. Caussidière was the self-installed, but very efficient Prefect of Police during the same period. According to the report of the Assembly, it was the fatal theories on the organisation of labour, developed and expounded to the workmen at the Luxembourg by M. Louis Blanc, and acquiesced in by M. Ledru-Rollin, M. Caussidière, and many other men of note and influence, that occasioned all the mischief which the Republic has had to deplore. By these theories hopes were excited which it was impossible to realise; and the Assembly being blamed by ignorant and deluded men for evils which no Legislative Assembly could cure, and for the non-fulfilment of hopes which were purely Utopian, an attempt was made to dissolve it by force of arms.

The Provisional Government, in instituting the national workshops, wished to make them an auxiliary army; but they soon passed into the hands of the enemies of order, and were at the complete disposal of Messrs. Caussidière and Louis Blanc. The report insists that it was the latter who organised the popular movement of the 17th of March, and that M. Caussidière acted with him Some days before that event M. Caussidière called together the 48 Commissaries of Police of Paris, and said to them:—"Tell the inhabitants of the quarters of Paris attached to monarchical institutions—tell the upper classes, that if they are not wise, the sword of Damocles is suspended over their heads; and if the deputies of the provinces should resist the wishes of the patriots of Paris, they shall be exterminated. Tell your stupid bourgeoisie and National Guards, that if they attempt the least resistance, 400,000 labourers are determined to make table rase and destroy Paris. They will not for that purpose require muskets; a few chemical matches will suffice."

The Committee of the Assembly asserts in unmistakeable terms its conviction that Messrs. Caussidière, Sobrier, and Ledru-Rolin directed the movement of the 16th of April. M. Blanqui refused to join in it, because M. Ledru-Rollin was to have been proclaimed Dictator. General Changarnier waited on that day on M. Lamartine, at the Hôtel de Ville, and found him greatly dejected. M. Lamartine stated that Messrs. Louis Blanc and Ledru-Rollin were privy to the demonstration which the 100,000 men next assembled in the Champ de Mars intended to make. The General then called on M. Marrast, and the latter wrote, under his dictation, the order to the municipalities to beat the rappel, which brought out the whole of the National Guard, and saved the capital. The Club of Clubs, presided over by Sobrier, and the Club of the Rights of Man, took an active part in those events. They were in direct correspondence with M. Ledru-Rollin. The arms with which they threatened the country were supplied by the arsenals of the State. Sobrier had established his head-quarters, with the consent of M. Ledru-Rollin, in a building of the Civil List: 500 muskets and 30,000 ball cartridges, furnished by the Prefect of Police, on an order of the Minister of War, were stored in that building. Sobrier had taken on himself to send 500 or 600 men to the provinces to revolutionise the country: those men received ten francs per day out of the Treasury.

On the 15th of May an individual was sent by M. Ledru-Rollin to countermand the émeute, to the president of the Club of the Rights of Man. M. Ledru-Rollin, on being questioned respecting that fact, did not deny it. M. Caussidière admitted that he was aware of the intention of Sobrier to make a demonstration on the 15th of May; but he had obtained from him a promise that it should not be armed, he paid no further attention to it. One fact, however, proves, in the opinion of the Committee, that he connived at it. M. Yon had been appointed by the President Commissary of Police of the Assembly. That choice displeased M. Caussidière, who sent for M. Yon, and recommended him to remain at his post in the Faubourg Montmartre. The latter, however, insisting, Caussidière said to him, "Well, return to the Assembly; the place is indifferent to me." Another witness examined by the Committee declared that he heard M. Caussidière say, "I will throw the Assembly out of the windows." The Committee further state that it was a notorious fact that the Prefecture of Police was, previous to the 15th of May, a manufactory for ball cartridges.

In the scene of the 15th of May, M. Louis Blanc acted a conspicuous part. He harangued the people and approved the proclamation of the Assembly. He was met in the Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine amidst a band of armed men; and one of his friends having cried "Vive Louis Blanc!" he silenced him, saying, "The affair has failed: don't notice me, or I shall be arrested."

The report comes to the conclusion, from all the information that it has received, that M. Louis Blanc was decidedly implicated in person in the affair of May as well as M. Ledru-Rollin and M. Caussidière. It then proceeds to speak of the insurrection of June, and the causes which in particular contributed to its coming to a head. It traces the manner in which the national workshops were organised, and declared that the brigadiers who paid the men were the principal instigators. It also brings forward several circumstances, none, however, of a very decisive character in themselves, but important in connexion with previous events, to show that the same persons who planned the émeute of the 15th of May were the instigators of the insurrection of June. The reading of the report caused a painful sensation in the Assembly, and led to many interruptions on the part of the three persons most implicated. General Cavaignac was, it appears, consulted before the report was read, as to the expediency of bringing it forward at this particular time, and is stated to have given his approbation to the adoption of such measures as may be deemed advisable to bring M. Ledru-Rollin, M. Louis Blanc, and M. Caussidière to trial for their complicity. But his opinion has changed since the Report was read. Though the capital is still in a state of siege, and filled with troops; though the middle classes are weary of continual struggles, and anxious to punish, once for all, the instigators of violence—it is not deemed prudent to resort to extremity against those three men, who are considered by the great bulk of the working population as the fathers and founders of the Republic. It is therefore considered probable that the Assembly will receive the report, and proceed to judge by finding the point of the question the Report. Whether those men will continue unpunished for guilt which has already consigned men much less guilty to the dungeons of Vincennes, is a question which the chances of events in Paris may determine, but which it is at present both useless and impossible to speculate upon.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

From the accounts that have reached us this week, it will be seen further down that the disaffected are not quite crushed, and that they look to assassination as the only means left them to avenge their defeat. M. Thiers, in the present instance, being the chief object of attack.

The project of law for a tax on mortgages, which occasioned so short, but violent a debate on the 4th inst., and in which MM. Thiers and Berryer took leading parts, was again the subject of debate on Friday, when an amendment was carried against the Government, substituting one-eighth for one-fifth as the amount. Upon this being carried, M. Goudchaux withdrew the project, but announced that he would, in a few days, propose an income-tax (impôt sur le revenu mobilier).

The Constitution Committee has terminated the discussion of the different amendments proposed by the bureaux. Among the articles of the project of Constitution rejected by the majority of the bureaux is the article 109, prohibiting in future the admission of salaried ministers into the Assembly. The Committee, after having heard all the suggestions of the delegates from the Standing Committees, have recommenced their labours. M. Armand Marrast has resumed his functions as reporter, and it is expected the report may be presented to the Assembly on the 18th instant. It is said that the preamble will be modified considerably, and that several articles have been expunged which were disapproved of by the delegates.

The report of the late insurrection, which we noticed in our Postscript of last week, as regards M. Louis Blanc, comes to the conclusion that he is decidedly implicated in person in the affair of the 15th of May. As regards the insurrection of June, the report declares that "the object of that movement was, nominally, a democratic and social Republic, but in reality pillage;" that it was in fact "a savage war, carried on by cannibals!" The report states that the political men compromised in the insurrection are M. Louis Blanc, M. Caussidière, and M. Proudhon. The hon. reporter then announced that the secret association formed at Paris, and their connexions in the departments, would form the subject of another report. "Before terminating this painful record of our civil dissensions," he said in conclusion, "let it be permitted to us to repeat the words of the last proscribed by a glorious martyr, 'May my blood be the last shed.' Yes, let the wish of the holy Archbishop, dead at the foot of a barricade, be granted, and let that blood be the last spilt forth in civil war! Let those who substituted violence for the expression of the national will know that they were misled by fatal counsels, and that such conduct, instead of serving the Republic, would lose it. Who was the workman who would not consider it a misfortune to have on his blouse a drop of the blood of General Bréa, or of the heroic Archbishop of Paris? Though," added the reporter, "the Committee has made a distinction between the actors of the 16th of May and that of the month of June, it is evident that both had the same cause, the same origin. The 17th of March, the 15th of April, the 16th of May, and the 23rd of June, were connected together, and resembled each other—they were warfares against order and against the National Assembly. The Government has known how to establish order; the Committee hopes that it will know how to maintain it; and that thus our great country may accomplish its noble destinies."

M. Lamartine is quite exonerated from any participation in the culpable schemes of the above-mentioned gentlemen.

Five hundred of the insurgents of June, sentenced to transportation, were transferred on Saturday night by railroad to Havre. Having been embarked in the Ulloa steam-frigate, they were to have sailed on Sunday morning for Brest, where they were to remain confined on board a hulk until the Executive Power should have fixed their destination.

In the meanwhile arrangements continued to take place. M. Pujol, one of the chiefs of the national workshops, one of the delegates who waited on M. Marie, at the Palace of the Luxembourg, and who is said to have been one of the chiefs of the insurrection of June, had been taken into custody on Saturday last, in the Rue Geoffray Marie. Several persons of some consideration in the communes of Charonne and Montreuil had been arrested in consequence of information received that they were actively engaged amongst the insurgents in the barricades of the Faubourg St. Antoine.

The following details relative to the attempted assassination of M. Thiers have been published: It appears that within the last few days M. Thiers received more than one anonymous letter threatening his life. The police authorities likewise cautioned him, and recommended him to change the white hat which he generally wore, and by which he was described. M. Thiers, however, took no notice of those warnings. At six o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the hour at which M. Thiers usually returns home, M. Mignet, who likewise wears a white hat, was crossing the court-yard of M. Thiers's house, when he was alarmed by the cries of a little girl, who was sitting at the gate. M. Mignet, on returning, found that the girl, about ten years of age, whose occupation was to sell birds, was wounded by a ball, which having rebounded from the stone staircase, struck her in the back. The child was raised up by some National Guards who were at hand, and examined. The wound is fortunately not serious. The Commissary of Police of the quarter addressed to the house a statement of the facts. M. Devisme, the celebrated gunsmith, on examining the mark of the ball, declared that the shot must have been fired from an elevation either from the entrance to the house, which is at the corner of the street, or from one of the houses in the neighbourhood. Neither M. Mignet, nor any person in the house, heard any report of a shot. It is believed that the assassin used an air-gun. The gun must have been of double-barrelled or loaded with more than one ball, because at the same instant that the child was wounded a pane of glass was broken in the house adjoining that of M. Thiers.

Several members of the National Assembly met on Sunday in the Salle des Conférences, where the attack on M. Thiers was much discussed, and it was said that the lives of other representatives had been threatened. M. Baudhuin, who read the report of the Committee of Inquiry to the National Assembly, received a threatening letter on Saturday afternoon, of which the following is a copy:

"Your report is a mere tissue of infamous assertions. The only thing that consoles me for it is, that you will hope be your doom of . . . 1794. You shall hear from me again shortly."

A decree of the chief of the Executive power had been published on Monday, removing the suspension pronounced on the 27th of June last against the following journals:—La Révolution, La Vraie République, L'Organisation du Travail, La Presse, L'Assemblée National, Le Napoleon Républicain, Le Journal de la Canaille, Le Père Duchesne, Le Prolo, La Liberté, and Le Lampion. By the same decree the fleurs-de-lis which seal the seals on the presses of those journals are enjoined to remove them, and the prohibition to print them was also done away with. La Presse and other suspended journals appeared on Monday.

The Commission of Inquiry into the events of the 15th of May and the insurrection of June met on Sunday afternoon, and remained sitting until a late hour of the night. They classed all the documents referred to in their report, which has been ordered to be printed; and they employed an extraordinary number both of copying-clerks and of printers, in order that the evidence might be presented to the National Assembly as quickly as possible.

The Journal des Débats, in announcing that the Marquis de Brignole was the Sardinian Ambassador, and M. Marquis A. Ricci, Envoy Extraordinary from the Government of Turin to the French Republic, had a conference with M. Bastide, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, on Sunday, and expressed its belief that the mediation of the British and French Governments has been off red at Vienna and at Turin." "May this hope be shortly converted into an official fact!" says the Journal des Débats, on which we are of opinion that a diplomatic intervention would establish the sacred cause of Italian independence more firmly than the most remarkable victory or the most extraordinary triumph of physical force. We appreciate warmly as any party the sentiments of humanity and necessity which will not permit France to suffer the nationality of the Italians to be crushed under her eyes without intervention; but, in consequence of the interest we take in that independence, we desire to see the cause of the Italians taken in hand, not alone by France, but by all, defended by the two truest nations in Europe, it may henceforth be placed in that position in which it will have nothing to fear from the enemy's sword, it will honour the epoch in which we live more than an age of war and battle could effect."

On Tuesday the same journal published the following paragraph on the proposed mediation of the Governments of Great Britain and France:—

"The Marquis Brignole Sale, the Sardinian Ambassador in Paris, and the Marquis A. Ricci, were received yesterday (Monday) by General Cavaignac, President of the Council. We are assured that at that interview the Sardinian envoys claimed officially of the Chief of the Executive Government the immediate intervention of a French army in Italy. General Cavaignac is said to have replied to this demand by announcing that the Government of the Republic had already anticipated such contingency, and had opened negotiations with Great Britain on that subject, of which the speedy result would be the offer of a mediation to the belligerent parties in Italy by the Governments of France and Great Britain in concert. It was affirmed in the afternoon that the conditions of this mediation had been already agreed upon between the two Cabinets, and that Piedmont would be invited, by giving satisfaction to the rights of all parties, to endeavour by all means to spare Europe the misfortune of a general war."

On this important subject we find some interesting intelligence in the Paris papers of Wednesday. La Presse of that morning contains a long article describing the state of the negotiation which had taken place between the Sardinian envoys and the French Cabinet, respecting the intervention, in the cause of Italy, which reminded the French Government of the promise made by the King of Sardinia two months since. General Cavaignac replied that the affairs of Europe had so much changed within that period, that France could not fulfil the engagement.

Le Pouvoir says that the reply of the British Government to the proposition of joint intervention in Italy brought to Paris on Tuesday was not entirely that which the French Government expected or desired, inasmuch as it reserved a portion of Lombardy to Austria. A conference was, in consequence, held at the Foreign Office, at which the Marquis of Normanby and Gen. Cavaignac attended. Three couriers were subsequently despatched—one to London, a second to Vienna, and a third to Turin.

The Journal des Débats of the same day announces, on the contrary, that the Governments of Great Britain and France have actually concluded a definitive arrangement to put an end to the effusion of human blood, and to offer the united mediation to the belligerents in Italy. A British Cabinet courier brought to Paris on Monday the sanction of the British Government of the arrangement proposed by the Government of the Republic. A courier was immediately despatched to the Hon Mr. Abercrombie, the British Minister at Turin, and likewise to M. de Reizet, the French Chargé d'Affaires in that city, with orders to repair to the head quarters of King Charles Albert and of Marshal Radetzky, to notify to them officially the offer of the mediation made by the two Powers, and to regret its a provisional or temporary armistice. Another courier was despatched on Tuesday afternoon to Vienna, with instructions to the Baron de Bourgoing, French Ambassador to that city, by virtue of which they are similarly ordered to offer the Imperial Cabinet the mediation of their respective Governments.

Count Moltke, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Denmark; General Baron Fagel, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of the Netherlands; and the Chevalier Peruzzi, Resident Minister of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, presented their credentials to General Cavaignac on Monday.

On the same day Count Ludolf, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the King of Naples, charged with a special mission to the French Republic, and M. de Arnaud de Vaux, Chargé d'Affaires of Spain, were admitted in private audiences by General Cavaignac, to whom they delivered letters from their Sovereigns, accrediting them to the Government of the Republic.

The 8th Regiment of the Line arrived in Paris from Havre on Monday, and proceeded immediately to the camp of St. Maur.

Letters from Lyons of the 5th inst. state that much excitement prevails in that city, and it is added that the troops have shown symptoms of fraternising with the populace. The latter have insisted on the authorities closing three cafés, frequented, as they say, by aristocrats. At the departure of the mail a picquet of 200 men of the line were ordered to fire at the Croix Rousse, and a piece of cannon was directed towards the square.

The disappearance of M. Jarasson, an extensive silk manufacturer, added not a little to the excitement. At the time of his disappearance, no idea of his having committed suicide was entertained. It is feared that he has been assassinated.

On Monday the National Assembly resumed the adjourned debate on the Jury Bill. M. Leroux proposed to exclude from the jury all individuals sentenced to more than one year's imprisonment (excepting political offenders), and M. Delmon wished to extend the same penalty to convicted of acts of dishonesty and immorality. These amendments were ultimately adopted. Several other amendments, including one requiring that the jurors should be elected by their fellow-citizens at large, were rejected. The three articles of the decree were voted without any discussion, a proposition to grant members of the jury two francs per day during the session having been rejected. The Assembly next proceeded to discuss the project of decree relative to the custom money required for the publication of journals and periodical works; MM. Louis Blanc, A. Thouret, and Felix Pyat opposing the measure, and M. Leon Faucher and M. de Chasseloup speaking in its favour. The principle of the bill was ultimately affirmed.

On Tuesday the details of the measure were taken into consideration. On the first article—which obliges the proprietors of daily political journals in Paris to deposit a security of 24,000 francs; of 18,000 if they appeared only twice a week; of 12,000 if published weekly; and 6000 if more than once a month; and which fixes the security for journals published in towns of 50,000 souls and above at 6000 francs, and at 3600 in other towns—a lengthened discussion ensued, and the question was ultimately adjourned.

On Wednesday the debate was resumed, and, after a desultory discussion, the Chamber at length divided on an amendment proposed by M. Pascal Duprat, to the following effect:—"All the laws relative to the security in money and the responsibility of the agent are abolished. The personal responsibility of the writers shall be substituted in future for that of the agents." The numbers were declared to be—for the amendment, 342; against it, 407. It was accordingly rejected by a majority of 65. A short discussion then ensued on the subject of the documents connected with the recent report of M. Bouchart. The Assembly decided that all of them should be published without any exception. The first article was at length carried, and the main amendment stating that the new law should only remain in force until the 1st of May, 1849, the Minister of Justice having pledged himself to bring forward, in the interval, a definitive law on the subject. M. Scribes had presented an amendment to the effect of reducing the cautionnement required to publish a journal in Paris from 24,000 to 12,000, which was rejected without any discussion. In the course of the sitting there were presented to the Assembly two projects of decree relative to the establishment of general stores in different towns for the deposit of merchandise, by the decrees of 21st and 26th of March, 1848; and a project of decree granting a credit of 2000f. for the widow of General Damesme for two lives. M. Goudchaux, the Minister of Finance, proposed to the Assembly to vote, d'urgence, a project of decree, providing that the persons who had subscribed to the national loan of 125 millions of francs by the 22nd of March last should receive coupons of Five pc. Cent. Stock to the amount of their subscription. The project was voted without opposition.

SPAIN.

There is nothing of importance from Madrid this week. The Ministerial arrangements consequent on the changes mentioned last week had not been completed on the 4th inst. M. Mon, the late Spanish Ambassador at Vienna, had not left Madrid on that day. It was reported that he had been summoned to the Court of Gratz, and that Olozaga would ultimately be appointed Minister of Finance. General O'Donnell, former Captain-General of Cuba, had arrived at Madrid.

With respect to the Carlist movements no positive intelligence as to the whereabouts of Cabrera had been obtained, but it was still considered certain that he had passed the Ebro, and was in the Maestrazgo. Marsa, at the head of a band of 600, was said to be in the province of Teruel; the brothers Tristany were in the environs of Solsona; and "on the whole," says the International, "the Catalonian insurrection makes new progress every day, and if, which is to be feared, the troops of the Queen cannot be increased before the commencement of the winter, it is positive that it will be formidable next spring."

The Espana announces that the contract concluded between the Government and the Bank of San Fernando has been cancelled.

The Gaceta contains the decrees appointing the Duke of Rivas Ambassador at Paris, and M. Isturiz Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the French Republic. Another decree names M. Pidal Minister for Foreign Affairs.

The Gazette had officially announced the miscarriage of the Queen.

PORTUGAL

Advices from Lisbon to the 1st inst. have come to hand. On that day a debate was coming on in the Lower House involving a Ministerial crisis, and affecting the guarantee to be given for paying the dividends by means of revenues specially pledged upon that object by the Board of Public Credit, and payments Ministers and others converting such revenues to different purposes.

The Finance Committee was against the Ministry, [illegible] of the division was expected doubtful.

The King had recovered from the effects of his fall, and was expected the Queen to hold a levee in Lisbon, and attended the Opera on the 31st ult., being the Duchess of Braganza's birth-day, previous to swearing the Charter.

ITALIAN STATES.

PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY—The reverses of the Piedmontese army have brought the war near the gates of Milan, and the Provisional Government and the Ministers when it is almost too late—making hasty preparations to remedy, if possible, the disastrous state of affairs. A forced loan of fourteen millions of francs has been decreed by the Constituent Assembly at Turin; patriotism will escape no contribution is interdicted, and all publication of military news forbidden, except the official bulletin. Persons propagating alarming news are to be called before the tribunals of war. Additional powers have been decreed in advance to [illegible] of the Provisional Government of Milan were published on the 31st ult., ordering the immediate enrolment of all capable of bearing arms, five thousands days. Let us raise our barricades again, cut the bridges, the dykes, the roads; let us put desolation between us and the enemy; let us prove that we can resist misfortune, and we shall soon see an overwhelming force move on, we deserve the assistance and sympathy of all Europe. We possess the elements of secure confidence, but we must be prepared. And should God [illegible] terrible trial we must manfully ask Him for the faith that the day of his justice will dawn."

The forces under Radetzky, including 10,000 Bavarian auxiliaries and other troops recently arrived from the Tyrol, amounted to 80,000 effective men, opposed to a force which, at the highest estimate, does not exceed 48,000. At Milan alarm continued to be extreme, and the most vigorous measures of resistance and defence were also adopted. A levy of [illegible] men was ordered to be sent to the field, and all capable of bearing arms were called upon to [illegible] the people the most alarming proclamations. A council of war was in permanence, and public [illegible] summarily all who might be found to betray the nation.

Besides the forced loan of 14,000,000 already mentioned, 9,000,000 were ordered by the sale of state property. All unemployed officers were invited to join detences round the capital, and to constitute a fortified camp on the Adda. Every species of vehicle was called into requisition to transport provisions to the army. All the saddles and bridles of every description found in the city were seized for the cavalry. Females of every rank, from the noblest to the peasant, and of every age, down to childhood, were employed in making cartridges, which were prepared at the rate of 100,000 a day.

The head quarters of Charles Albert were removed first from Lodi to Cremona, thence to Codogno, where his Majesty rested on the 1st, with the intention, as was generally understood, of immediately changing to Lodi. The whole army was in full retreat, but whether on Pavia or Milan was not known.

The reports of the revolts against the Austrians at Treviso and Padua proved to be without foundation.

The Austrians entered Cremona soon after the Piedmontese left, on the 31st ult., and imposed a contribution of two millions, and made many prisoners among the citizens. The King had proposed during the struggle an armistice of ten days; Radetzky consented under the following conditions:—1. That the Piedmontese army shall retire to the Adda, and separate its cause from the Venetians. 2. Venice, Reggio, Modena, Parma, and Piacenza shall be likewise given up. Upon which the King answered, "Last Radetzky knew that the Piedmontese army can only answer such conditions by cannon.

The King continued to shift the head-quarters of his army up to the 3rd inst., when, having quitted Lodi, on the Adda, he arrived at Milan during the night of that day, coming from Melegnano, and established his head quarters at S. George, beyond the Porta Romana. The moment it became known that his Majesty was in the neighborhood, the whole city was illuminated.

The line of the Adda has thus been abandoned. The whole army marched from Lodi to Milan. There the King was engaged in throwing up entrenchments before the city, and there he determined to give battle. He had with him 50,000 men, the infantry much demoralised, but the cavalry and artillery in good order. Mr. Abercrombie, our Minister at Turin, after having had two hours' interview with the King on the 1st inst., accompanied by the French Minister, had set out for the Austrian army, and had seen Marshal Radetzky near Cremona; but his request for an armistice of a few days was decidedly rejected. The Marshal said he was determined to enter Milan, and he would do so at all hazards. The officers near Radetzky said the Austrian force amounted to 55,000 men, but that number was considered to be an exaggeration.

The Austrians had entered Pavia.

No barriers were erected within the city of Milan, nor were the inhabitants detained to defend the city, in case Charles Albert should be in mind to have entered beyond the Tessino. Several families had left, and nearly all the ladies of rank. The populace prevented workmen and gentlemen from accompanying them.

The latest accounts that have reached us from Italy are through the medium of the Paris Journals; and, according to these, on Saturday last, the 5th instant, a sanguinary battle was fought a few leagues from Milan, between the Piedmontese army and the Austrians, commanded by Marshal Radetzky. At the conclusion of the affair, which was unfavorable to the Piedmontese, the King had entered Milan, where he was endeavouring to fortify himself. Other accounts add that the Austrians had entered Milan on that da

ROME. The latest advices from "the Eternal City" announce the termination of the Ministerial crisis. Mamiani re-enters office with plenary powers, and the cabinet will be composed of the most competent statesmen. He has extorted the consent of the Pope to the closest alliance with the Princes of Italy for the common defence of the country, and received authority to despatch reinforcements to Charles Albert without delay

TUSCANY.—Disturbance took place at once at Florence and Leghorn on the 30th ult., when the accounts of the defeat reached by the Italian army became known. Fortunately a violent storm, accompanied by heavy rain, prevented at Florence the riot degenerating into an insurrection. At Leghorn the populace assembled before the Governor's palace, shouting "Down with the Ministry!" "Death to Radolfi!" "Long live Guerrazzi!" The disturbance was tranquillised by a telegraphic despatch announcing the resignation of Ministers, and that 16,000 National Guards were to be mobilised

On the resignation of the Ministry, which took place in Florence, on the 30th ultimo, it was resolved by the Chamber to send large reinforcements to the Italian army

NAPLES.—According to advices dated the 30th ultimo, the King had found it impracticable to carry into effect the forced loan in its original unqualified sense, and was obliged to give it up as regards merchants and professional men. From the provinces of Salerno it is announced that the insurgents in the valley and near Sala have been dispersed. Many have made their submission, and are being disarmed. In the Calabrias order is completely restored. Provisional National Guards have been organised.

"The news of the retardation of the expedition against Sicily, which is generally ascribed to the interference of "a certain foreign Power," has been confirmed by the Italian journals.

SICILY.—According to the draft of the Constitution, which has been published, every aristocratic element of the Constitution of 1812 has disappeared The peerage for life is abolished, and an elective senate substituted. The Chambers have voted a civil list of 1,500,000 ducats, besides the palaces at Palermo and Messina, country palaces, &c. It is said that the English and French squadrons having signified to the Neapolitan Commandant of the citadel of Messina that he must surrender the fort, he had accordingly done so: the fort is at this moment in the power of the Sicilians.

PRUSSIA.

We have dates from Berlin to the 7th of August.

The prospect of a renewal of the war between Prussia and Denmark is exciting the greatest discontent in the three Baltic provinces, which are, in a mercantile point of view, the chief sufferers by the war.

Government has, at last, resolved to lay before the constituent Assembly a bill for the total suppression of the so-called patrimonial (or private) tribunals of justice, and the enfranchisement of the peasantry. The Government is, consequently, prepared to undertake to defray all the expenses incidental to the administration of justice. Even the tribunals of the mediatised princes will be abolished, but the reform was to be carried out gradually. General Von Below had returned to Berlin from Vienna; and Colonel Willisen, the brother of the famous general who commanded in Posen, has gone on an extraordinary mission to Paris.

The new police force of Berlin have had frequent rencontres with the "lloges" in the "discharge of their duty."

Herr Hansemann's financial projects, so far as they relate to the new land-tax, and the increase of the duty on brandy by fifty per cent., are exciting great discontent amongst the landowners in several provinces of the Kingdom, who vehemently oppose the measures, and are forming clubs in some five or six provinces for the purpose of defeating them. The voluntary loan is making very slow progress, only three and a half out of fifteen millions being as yet subscribed. In a few days, as proposed by the Minister, too forced loan will be demanded. It is probable, however, that the time for making voluntary payments will be prolonged.

The majority of the compositors at Berlin still refuse to return to their work They appear to have plenty of funds. The cotton printers have also resolved to strike, in consequence of their employers having refused to give work at half wages to the unoccupied portion of the trade. The workmen demand also the diminution of machine work, and the consequent increase of hand work

It is officially stated that the plenipotentiaries of the Central Rhine Navigation Commission have resolved not to allow any steam-vessels to navigate that river, except such as plied on it before the 1st of August last, and such as are now being constructed according to agreement. Accordingly, no new licenses for the navigation of the Rhine will be issued for the present.

The 7th instant being the day originally appointed by the central Minister of War for "mustering" homage to the Vicar of the Empire, all the democratic clubs and unions went in procession to the Crenzberg, where tremendous cheerwere given for German Unity, the Vicar of the Empire, &.

AUSTRIA.

We have news from Vienna of the 1st of August. The Emperor having refused to return to Vienna, he will send a Council of Regency, as he had threatened. The camarilla of Innsbruck has thus triumphed. When this resolution was communicated by Doblhoff to the Diet, a dead silence ensued. The Minister then stated that he could not give any explanations on the subject. The persons head of the State, but that, so long as he possessed the confidence of the Emperor, he should retain his post. After stating that the Emperor had expressed his readiness to send his brothers, Charles, to the capital, if the Diet pressed on that point, he said his colleagues and himself were ready to appoint a deputation to wait upon the Emperor, in order to point out to him that his return was not to be delayed

The debate respecting the appointment of a committee for the purpose of drawing up "an energetic address" to the Emperor, urging him to return immediately to his capital, was very spirited.

It must be stated here, however, that the address itself (as subsequently agreed upon by the Diet, after the members of the left or Radical side had abruptly withdrawn, en masse, from the house) is tame, compared with the speeches that preceded it. The report of those speeches will have reached the fugitive Court before the address arrives, so that the vehemence of the former will more than compensate for the moderate expressions of the latter. The Minister of Justice has announced that the trial of the parties implicated in the recent insurrection in Prague will be public.

Several proclamations have been submitted to the Diet for the abrogation of the privileges of the nobility, but it seems very problematical whether the present Assembly will meet those wishes.

The Emperor had addressed an autograph letter to Marshal Radetzky, thanking him for his brilliant victories recently in Italy

Previous to the departure of the Archduke John for Frankfort, on the evening of the 30th, the Ban of Croatia had an audience of the Emperor, as had also Count Esterhazy, Count Bathyany, and M. Von Mailath, at which the Archduke attended. These Ministers, as well as the Ban, left Vienna on the 31st. As far as could be ascertained, no definitive decision had been obtained in regard to the Croatian question, which is fraught with no less important results to Austria for the future than is the Italian question. Both are pressed upon the attention of the representatives by their constituents. The Ban has not given up one iota of his demands

The Archduke John, before leaving for Frankfort, addressed a farewell proclamation to the citizens of Vienna, and officially resigned his post as the Emperor's representative.

RUSSIA

By a ukase, dated June 30, the Emperor, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, has authorised the issue of five new series of Treasury Bonds, making the 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th or 3,000,000 of silver roubles each, with the intent of furnishing the Treasury with funds to meet its claims, and with the means of defraying the expenses rendered necessary for the security of the empire under the disturbed state in which several of the countries of Europe are placed. By the above the Minister is authorised to issue the first two series immediately, but the remainder only when the interest upon them shall begin to run. The other series will be issued as circumstances may require and his Imperial Majesty shall order.

SCHLESWIG HOLSTEIN

Notwithstanding the close of the armistice, no step has been taken in advance by either party, either towards the renewal of active hostilities or the pacific arrangement of the quarrel. The only movement of consequence on the part of the Danish Government is its decision to blockade the rivers Elbe, Weser, and Jahde, and to declare Cuxhaven quite the same as Copenhagen in this respect.

Troops from various parts of Germany were shortly to be sent down to Hamburgh, and it was understood that quarter were being prepared for their reception near the city.

PRINCIPALITIES OF THE DANUBE.

Accounts from Bucharest of the 18th, in the Augsburg Gazette, announce that the fate of Wallachia is decided. The Ottoman Porte has proscribed the new constitution, and the Ambassadors of France and England have given in their adhesion. The Porte has protested against the entrance of Russian troops. The Turkish Government has built three new steamers for the Danube, and is to control the subject of slavery in Oregon. California and New Mexico, on the contrary, are to have no Legislatures at present; but the legislative functions are to be performed by a board, consisting of the naval and military officers of the Governor, Secretary, and Supreme Judges, all of whom are to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and these functionaries are prohibited from legislating on the subject of slavery or religion. The effect will be to leave the slavery question as it now stands, in regard to New Mexico and California, until further action shall be had by Congress, or until some decision affecting the case shall be made by the Supreme Court.

The charges preferred by General Pillow against General Scott, it was confidently asserted by the telegraph from Washington, had been withdrawn. The court of inquiry to examine the charges preferred by General Scott against General Worth was to meet on the 1st of August

MEXICO.

No news of interest has been brought by this mail. No positive information had been received in the United States as to the progress of the revolution It was only known that the Government forces under Generals Bustamante and Cortazar had been united, to the number of 3000, preparatory to an attack upon the insurgents, commanded by Padre Jarauta. A Commissioner of the Mexico had under consideration the protest against the late treaty with the United States

Yucatan had called for Yucatan with money and troops for the relief of the whites

WEST INDIES.

From Jamaica the accounts received this week are of the usual triste character. The financial state of the island was as bad as it could be. The Receiver-General of the public Treasury had issued a notice that he was without funds, and could not pay the salaries falling due, but that he would give notes as soon as he could pay a moiety of the amounts due. The Jamaica Dispatch says that the payments of the September quarter also cannot be met, and the Treasury may be said to be bankrupt, there being a deficiency of £14,000

By a proclamation of his Excellency the Governor, the House of Assembly was to meet on Thursday, the 3d of August, for the despatch of public business

From the west end of the island we regret to say there are unfavorable accounts; and great discontent is said to have arisen amongst the black labouring population from the inability of the planters to afford full employment, in consequence of the very general suspension of cultivation, the low remunerating price of produce and the refusal of merchants to make any advances have induced His Excellency the Governor had ordered strong detachments of police to concentrate in the disaffected districts; and bodies of that force had marched from the Kingston, St. Catherine, and St. Mary's divisions to check the disposition to revolt. The Jamaica Dispatch hints that the blacks have been incited to disturbances by several Dissenting ministers, besides two full-blooded negroes who have become rich by trade and by the savings of their wages, with 600 sail, two field-pieces, &c. The appearance of these troops restored comparative tranquillity. Governor Scholten had resigned, and has come to Europe

From Cuba we learn that the state of that island was very disturbed. In consequence of the slave insurrections in Hayti, Martinique, &c., and the news from Europe, the blacks were ripe for revolt, and the Government were taking repressive measures. The intelligence from Europe of the expulsion of the British Minister from Spain, and the dismissal of Senor Isturitz from London, had produced a bad effect upon trade

The island of St. Domingo remained in a sad condition; and the conduct of the President was much commented upon, as it was stated he did not use all client means to repress the frightful atrocities that have been perpetrated. A great many refugees had arrived at Jamaica, and at Kingston a vessel of the American ship, with four hundred persons on board, was wrecked on the Morant Keys.

Throughout the West India Islands the weather was favourable for the crops, and very fine.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

Advices from Sydney to the 10th of April have been received. On the 22nd March the Legislative Council was opened by a commission, consisting of the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney-General, and the Colonial Treasurer, the Governor's attendance being prevented from the recent loss suffered in his family. The Governor's address commenced by congratulating the Council upon the outstanding the commercial depression which prevailed in the mother country, and the consequent low prices of colonial produce, the chief resources of the colony had continued to increase. It also noticed the fact that, although the advance price of agricultural and pastoral labour had pressed so severely on the employers, it had, on the other hand, been the source of highly remunerative employment to the working classes His Excellency then observed:

"I have endeavoured, by seeking fresh supplies of labour from the mother country, to restore that equilibrium, the maintenance of which between the two classes is so essential to the general, as well as to their mutual, welfare. The anticipations which I entertained in my last opening address to the council have been in part realised, but not to the full extent. The loss of the land and emigration debentures have been paid off, and the territorial revenue has exhibited so prosperous a state as to enable me to request her Majesty's Government to send out to the colony, in addition to the 5000 assisted emigrants which the board had contin..ed

VALENTINE, MADAME VIARDOT GARCIA—MARCEL, SIGNOR MARINI—IN THE OPERA OF "LES HUGUENOTS," AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

STATUE OF SIR JAMES SHAW.

YESTERDAY week the inhabitants of Kilmarnock placed in the Market-square of their handsome burgh a portrait statue of the late Sir James Shaw, a native of Kilmarnock, one who, born to no fortune, but in the humblest circumstances, from his own energy and perseverance, succeeded in amassing a handsome fortune by the honourable career which commerce opens to every one who has talent and enterprise sufficient to enter upon it with a spirit of integrity and earnestness. It is not, however, to commemorate the life of Sir James Shaw the rich merchant, nor the Lord Mayor of London—for he was elevated to that high position in the British metropolis by the suffrages of the Court of Aldermen—but of Sir James Shaw the unostentatiously charitable man, the unboasting patron and encourager of industrious poor men, and the philanthropic gentleman, who did good from a love of virtue—who succoured and cherished the indigent, because he remembered his own unpromising infancy; and of Sir James Shaw, who, when no one moved to lend a helping hand to the children of Scotland's most gifted poor man—Robert Burns—came forward in the hour of their helplessness, as their generous patron, wise adviser and kind protector.

COLOSSAL MARBLE STATUE OF SIR JAMES SHAW, INAUGURATED AT KILMARNOCK, ON THE 4TH INST.

The statue is from the studio of Mr. Fillans; it is of the finest Carrara marble, and is placed upon a pedestal of Aberdeen granite. The figure is of colossal size, 8 feet in height. Sir James Shaw is represented in his robes as Lord Mayor of London; his left hand bears up a fold of the furred gown, and in his right hand he holds a scroll. The statue is a very graceful production.

On Friday week the foundation-stone of the pedestal was laid with Masonic ceremony; the pedestal and statue were then placed, and in the afternoon they were uncovered amidst great applause.

At five o'clock the event was celebrated by a public dinner, at the George Hotel; C. D. Gairdner, Esq., in the chair. There were about 150 guests. The toast of the evening was, "The memory of Sir James Shaw;" responded to by his nephew, Sir John Shaw, who succeeded to the baronetcy. Several other toasts were drunk, including the health of Mr. Fillans, the sculptor, received with great cordiality. "The memory of Burns," and "The living poets of Scotland," coupled with the health of Mr. A. Park, were among the later toasts.

Sir James Shaw was born in 1764, at Mosshead, in the parish of Riccarton; and was educated at the grammar-school of Kilmarnock. He subsequently settled in London as a merchant; and in 1805-6 served the office of Lord Mayor. During his Mayoralty he was elected one of the Members for the City, and occupied that honourable position in three successive Parliaments. In 1809 he was created a Baronet. He retired from Parliament in 1818, but continued to discharge the duties of Alderman till 1831, when, on the death of Richard Clark, Esq., he was elected Chamberlain. He resigned this office in May, 1843; and his lamented death took place on October 23, in the same year.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday night, Mario having recovered from his indisposition, re-appeared in Raoul, in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots." Excited, probably, by the great success of the French tenor, M. Roger, on the previous Thursday, who assumed his part at a few hours' notice, Mario exerted himself strenuously, and on no previous occasion did he sing with such sweetness and power. He gave new life to the sentence of the Duel, and, for the first time, he was encored in this splendid piece, as Roger had been on the previous Thursday. The grand duo between Viardot and Mario, in the third act, was received with rapturous plaudits. The house was crowded in every part.

On Tuesday night was the seventh representation of the "Huguenots," the attraction of which, despite the lateness of the season, has been unprecedented.

On Thursday night it was proposed to have produced Rossini's "Guillaume Tell;" but, owing to the great demand for places to witness the "Huguenots," that opera was given for the eighth time on Thursday night; and the "Guillaume Tell," with Mdme. Castellan, Mdme. Bellini, Mdlle. Corbari, Tamburini, Tagliafico, Mei, Lavia, Soldi, Rache, Talamo, Polonini, Marini, and Roger in the cast, will be produced this evening (Saturday).

Our Artists have depicted one of the most striking situations in the opera of the "Huguenots:" it is the duo in the second act, when Valentine (Madame Viardot) informs Marcel (Marini) of the peril of his master, Raoul, in the intended duel with St. Bris, a plot having been devised by the latter to assassinate the Huguenot cavalier.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.

On Monday night the metropolis was visited by two dreadful fires, which, in a very short period, laid in ruins a vast amount of valuable property, deprived one person of life, and severely injured three others. The first broke out upon the premises belonging to Mr. Hatfield, a Berlin wool-dealer, situate in Albany-street, Regent's-park, next door to the Windsor Castle tavern. The second disaster occurred upon the premises belonging to the Rev. Dr Dale, in American-corner, Paternoster-row, City.

FIRE IN ALBANY-STREET, ON MONDAY LAST.

The circumstances connected with the first fire were of a very distressing character. Shortly after the shop was closed the inhabitants were startled by a report like that of a cannon, and, at the same time, the greater portion of the premises, which were four stor es high, were blown out into the street, the floorings and roof were lifted into the air, the brick wall was demolished and sent flying in sundry directions, breaking in the shop fronts of at least a dozen houses on the opposite side of the street, seriously injuring a great number in Ernest-street, forcing in the windows of the Windsor Castle tavern; and at the same moment, as if by magic, the whole of Mr. Hatfield's premises remaining burst forth into a general blaze.

An immediate communication was forwarded to the barracks in the same street, and thence the intelligence was despatched to the Brigade and West-end of England engine stations. The first engine that arrived was that belonging to the Royal Horse Guards (Blue), which was accompanied by nearly 300 soldiers. The West Middlesex works afforded an instant supply of water, from which the engine was set to work, but the fire was too strong to be extinguished by that force. Other engines of the London establishment and West of England reached the spot in rapid succession, and they were set to work under the superintendence of Mr. Braidwood. Notwithstanding the exertions of the firemen, however, the flames continued to progress most fearfully, and it was not until nearly one o'clock in the morning—three hours after the outbreak—that they were entirely extinguished.

The destruction of property occasioned by the explosion is most serious. Of the house itself, in which the apparatus originated, not a vestige remains. That portion of the building not immediately destroyed by the explosion was wholly consumed by the fire which occurred subsequently, and not one brick remains upon another. The two adjoining houses—the Windsor Castle tavern on the left, and a hosier and glover's shop on the right-hand—are shattered to their foundations, and the front wall of the latter was expected to fall during the whole of Tuesday. The surrounding property is injured to an extent which would not be credible to any except an eye-witness; and how so much devastation could have been accomplished without a greater sacrifice of human life, is extremely strange. The surveyor who examined the district report that 100 houses have been more or less injured by the explosion, and it is certain that upwards of 2000 squares of glass have been broken. Thirty houses on the side of the street opposite, and about a dozen on each side of the scene of the accident, are shattered; the damage also extends over a number of houses in Ernest-street and Little Albany-street, and even so far as Chester-terrace, in the Regent's-park. There seems no reason to doubt that gas, and gas alone, was the cause of the accident.

The person killed was the nursery maid of the family.

The owner of the premises, with his wife and child, had been spending the day in the country, leaving his brother and sister-in-law in charge of the premises. During the past few days a strong smell of gas had been experienced on the premises, and workmen had made repeated examinations of the main pipes, but without being able to trace out the cause. On Monday night, about nine o'clock, on the house being closed, they found the smell of gas getting stronger, and in a few moments, on the door being partly opened, the explosion occurred, forcing the brother and sister through the back parlour window into the garden. At the same time the nurse-maid, who was standing at the street-door, was blown completely over the road, and found with such violence against the iron railings round one of the kitchen areas as to break the solid metal into several pieces. A man, who was passing along with his cart, was forced out of his vehicle, and severely injured. A lad, named James Stubbs, in the employ of Miss Warraker, the bookseller, of the same street, was blown across the carriage-way and also severely injured; he is still remaining in the hospital in a very precarious condition. At the same moment the iron gratings and window-shutters of the premises on which the explosion took place, together with chairs, tables, and other articles of furniture, were forced over the road, and having carried away the shop-front of the premises opposite, belonging to Mr Gibbons, No 163, sundry pieces of furniture were carried into the latter premises, and having made their exit at the back, struck the houses in Chesterterrace, a distance of nearly 200 feet, where a considerable number of window glass was also demolished. The floorings of the adjoining house, belonging to Mr Brown, linendraper, were lifted up, the walls were shattered, the furniture hurled into the street, and a female named Cole was thrown down and severely injured. The whole of the windows and frames in the Windsor Castle Tavern were destroyed, and the building fin several places sat on fire. Several of the inmates residing opposite were struck by the bricks and furniture entering their premises; but fortunately none of them were dangerously injured.

The surveyor to the Sun Fire-office, and Mr. Hodgkin, the assessor of losses, have visited the ruins for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of mischief done, and are of opinion that no explosion of similar violence has ever taken place in the metropolis; and it is a matter of astonishment how so large a quantity of gas as must have accumulated in the shop could have collected.

A minute examination has detected the immediate cause of the explosion—viz., the insecure state of the gas-metre. On examining the metre, which was placed under the shop front, its centre was found to be so fragile that the slightest kick would cause an indentation, the metal of which it was made scarcely being thicker than a sheet of ordinary cartridge-paper. At the back there was found an opening of a circular form, which had been the operation of the soldering of the upper portion and that of the side. From this open ing the gas, doubtless, escaped.

The second fire broke out shortly after twelve the same night in the upper part of Dr. Dale's residence. It was first seen by a gentleman named Sniff, who forthwith gave the necessary alarm to the police. The flames at that period appeared to be raging on the second floor, but shortly afterwards they penetrated the third floor, and bursting through the windows, they illuminated the city for some distance. Fortunately, the whole of the inmates succeeded in effecting a safe retreat from the blazing mansion, which there was some difficulty in removing a lady who had recently been confined.

The engines of the Brigade and West of England Company, with those of the parish, attended, and the former were supplied with water from the former were enabled to get the flames subdued by half-past one o'clock, but not until a serious amount of property was destroyed. How the calamity took place is unknown. The escapes of the Brigade were in readiness for the protection of life from fire attended at each fire, and they were of great assistance to the firemen by forming a ladder for conveying the hose to the top of the premises.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1848.

The arrest of Mr. Smith O'Brien may be considered the close of the foolish attempt at rebellion of the Irish physical-force Repealers. Long before the return of the late Daniel O'Connell as member for Clare, the phantom of an Irish rebellion has been present to the minds of the people of England. The elements of rebellion have been rife, or have been supposed to be so, every year, and every season of every year since that time, and the efforts of our statesmen have been directed to such redress of acknowledged grievances and such measures of undoubted benefit as might prevent that much thought of and much to be deprecated calamity. At last, the phantom has started into full shape before us; and the people of England and the whole civilised world have been astonished to learn what a small thing it was, and how much they have been scared by a trifle. Two considerable benefits, we firmly believe, will accrue from this unexpected and gratifying result. The people of this country will, for the future, learn to legislate for Ireland as for the rest of the Empire, under the influence of sober justice and right, and not under the influence of exaggerated suppositions as to the probable consequences of the refusal of claims that may be unrighteous or injudicious. Foreign nations, hitherto so utterly ignorant of the relationship subsisting between Great Britain and Ireland, and of the true causes of the evils that afflict that unhappy portion of our empire, will learn also that the Anglo-Saxons are not the oppressors of the Celts; that we do not hold Ireland in slavish subjection, or deprive its people of any freedom enjoyed by ourselves, but treat them in every way upon a footing of perfect equality of right and privilege. At the same time, neither Great Britain nor any other nation will imagine, because this Irish rebellion has proved so miserable, or we should say so happy a failure, that no causes for future anxiety exist, or shut their eyes to the fact that Ireland is a wretched country, whose condition by some means or other must be improved, if we would escape continual peril from her companionship. It is quite clear that the British Legislature and all its leading statesmen are aware of the urgency as well as of the difficulty of the task before them in this respect; and it is equally certain that the outbreak of these misguided Repealers will neither prevent nor retard the consideration of the whole social state of the people, with a view to such remedies as Parliament may have it in its power to afford. In no country, however, can a Legislature do much to improve either the moral or physical condition of a people. It can but remove impediments which laws may have placed in the way, and which prevent the people from improving themselves by their own efforts. We may be assured that our statesmen are not the less inclined to undertake this portion of the task, because Messrs. O'Brien and Meagher have done their worst and have been proved powerless. But, whatever their wishes or their plans, reform must begin with the great majority of the Irish people. If they still hanker after a repeal, which would ruin them, and not us—if they expect relief from Parliament, independent of their own exertions—they will continue inferior in wealth and happiness to England and Scotland, however much we may desire or labour for their improvement.

The affairs of Italy have become complicated, and threaten disturbance of the general peace of Europe. The King of Sardinia, who has fought the battle of his own ambition, and that of Italian nationality at the same time, after affording reasonable grounds for the hope that Italy would suffice for her own release from the thraldom of Austria, has met with unexpected reverses. Failing to receive the support from the Italians which he had a right to calculate upon, he has sustained a succession of defeats, and been driven from all his positions by Marshal Radetzky. The latter, thirsting to remove the stain of the reverses which he himself experienced at the commencement of the war, is far more anxious to fight than to negotiate; far more intent upon humbling the pride of his opponent, and punishing the Milanese, as a preliminary to all negotiation, than to spare the effusion of blood; and is now encamped under the walls of Milan, ready to inflict upon it the horrors of a siege, or to force it into submission. Under these circumstances, the King of Sardinia has applied for the aid of France and England, and both powers have offered their mediation. But a serious difficulty arises. Austria is triumphant. She insisted upon the possession of Venice when her arms were humbled, and when gloom of every kind was before her. She is not likely to renounce Venice when she is in the position of a conqueror, but very likely to insist upon still further concessions which the Italians cannot grant. But even if her demands were limited to the Venetian territory, and should she renounce that fair Lombardian territory which she considers one of the brightest jewels in her crown, will the Italians ever consent to peace with Austria until Italy is entirely free from German dominion? An Italy of which Venice should form no part would be an anomaly; and if both parties prove obstinate, as there seems every probability they will, of what use will be the mediation of the two Powers? France in such a case will be compelled to side with the Italians in the ultima ratio of the sword; and then, what will be the course taken by England? What also will be the policy of Russia, whose armies are already marshalled for a descent upon Southern Europe?

The Sicilian question, though not quite so complicated, is still of a nature to cause anxiety. England is, it appears, prepared to act in favour of the Sicilians, should the King of Naples carry into execution his purpose of invading that portion of his dominions—at least, such is the interpretation that must be put upon the replies of the Marquis of Lansdowne, when questioned by Lord Stanley upon the presence of the English fleet in the Bay of Naples.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The New Mihdia Suspension Bill was read a second time.

The Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Bill, the Loan Societies Bill, the Highway Rates Bill, and the Bankruptcy Release Bill, severally went through Committee.

The Trustees Relief Bill was read a third time and passed.

Some other Bills were forwarded a stage, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

The Representation of Burghs (Scotland) Bill and Marriages (Scotland) Bill were each withdrawn for this session. The House then went into Committee of Supply, when, after some discussion relative to the propriety of economising in our public establishments, several votes were agreed to.

The consideration of the miscellaneous estimates engaged the House the remainder of the evening.

THE COMMISSION.—True bills for high treason having been found against Williams and O'Doherty, proprietors of the Tribune; against Duffy, proprietor of the Nation; and against Martin, proprietor of the Felon newspapers, on Thursday the first-named was brought on for trial, but was not concluded.

A Government reward of £300 has been offered for the apprehension of O'Gorman Mesgher, it is understood, having, through the medium of a priest, conveyed to the Government his desire to surrender, on condition of his life being spared, the Lord Lieutenant has refused to hear of any terms but unconditional surrender.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALIAN STATES

LOMBARDY.—The news of the capitulation of Milan, which had surrendered on Saturday last, and not been taken by assault, as was at first rumoured, has been confirmed The terms had not yet been arranged. The further progress of hostilities, it was expected, would be at once stayed by the mediation of France and England.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

OSBORNE.

On Sunday morning the Queen and her Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales and younger members of the Royal Family, walked in the grounds of Osborne. Her Majesty, the Prince (attended by the Royal Household), the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, and Lord John Russell attended divine service at Whippingham Church in the forenoon. The Royal dinner party included Lord John Russell, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, and Sir James Clark.

On Monday morning the Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk in the park. The younger branches of the Royal Family also walked and rode in the grounds.

On Tuesday morning her Majesty and the Prince took their accustomed early walk in the grounds of Osborne; and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Royal Family rode and walked as usual. The Royal dinner party included, in addition to the Royal household, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, and the Hon. Captain Dudley Pelham. Mr. Nash was honoured by an audience, and had the honour of laying before the Queen and Prince his views of Windsor Castle, which were much admired by her Majesty and his Royal Highness. The Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn left Osborne for London early on the morning. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson and Sir George Couper, arrived at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's, at four o'clock in the afternoon, from Frogmore House, Windsor. The Royal Duchess left town, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, at her residence in Richmond Park.

On Wednesday morning, Prince Albert, attended by Lieutenant Grand Wylde, went at nine o'clock to Appuldercombe, the seat of the Earl of Yarborough, to view the farming stock. The Duchess of Kent visited the Queen Dowager in the course of the day. The Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by the Princess Mary, proceeded from her residence at Kew during the morning to the terminus at Waterloo-bridge, and took her departure by the London and South Western Railway for Cowes, Isle of Wight. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar visited the Duchess of Kent at her residence, Clarence-house, St. James's. The Duchess of Kent dined with the Queen Dowager in the evening, at Marlborough-house.

Her Majesty arrived off the mouth of Portsmouth Harbour on Tuesday afternoon at four o'clock, for the purpose of witnessing some of the matches at the regatta, towards which her Majesty and Prince Albert graciously presented £50 as prizes for the various matches to be sailed in ordinary. The ships at Spithead were decorated with flags, and fired Royal salutes as the Royal party passed Spithead

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager received a visit on Monday at her residence, Bushy-park, from her royal Highness the Duchess of Kent.

The Duchess of Nemours arrived at Osborne on a visit to the Queen on Thursday (last week), and returned to Claremont on Saturday.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston entertained his Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, and a distinguished circle, at dinner, on Saturday evening, at their residence in Carlton-gardens. There was an assembly held by her ladyship after dinner, and among the visitors were her Highness the Princess Metternich, accompanied by the Prince Richard and Princess Melanie Metternich, Prince Granteili, &c.

THE WEATHER.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS SECOND REPORT The Secret Committee of the House of Commons "appointed to inquire into the causes of the recent commercial distress, and how far it has been affected by the laws for regulating the issue of bank-notes payable on demand," and who were empowered to report from time to time to the House, have made a further progress in the matter referred to them, and have agreed to this their final report:—"1. Your Committee, in further prosecution of the inquiry entrusted to them, have examined several gentlemen connected with the mercantile and banking interests of Scotland, the Governor of the Bank of Ireland, and other gentlemen connected with the mercantile and banking interests of that country. 2. Your Committee submit the evidence of these gentlemen to the House, together with that of other witnesses who have been examined, in reference to an incidental point which has been much discussed, namely the effect upon the Indian trade of the system followed by the East India Company in making advances on goods hypothecated with them in India. 3. In the opinion of the witnesses from Scotland and from Ireland, no material effect has been produced upon the commercial affairs of those countries by the acts of 1845, by which the issue of notes payable on demand in those parts of the United Kingdom is regulated. 4. Evidence has been given by some of the witnesses as to the effect both in Scotland and Ireland which they attribute to the act of 1844, but as on this subject your Committee have already stated their views, they do not think it necessary to offer any further observations thereupon. 5. With regard to the acts of 1845, your Committee are of opinion that it is not expedient to make any alteration in their provisions. 6. Your Committee submit in the appendix various accounts, in which much valuable information will be found on the whole subject of their inquiry.—August 2, 1848."

ARREST OF SMITH O'BRIEN.

The particulars of the arrest will be found in our special Correspondent's letter, at page 92.

Immediately subsequent to the notification of O'Brien's arrest to the military authorities, orderlies were dispatched to the encampment for the two troops of cavalry under arms there, who, on their arrival, patrolled the streets and dispersed the groups which were beginning to form when intelligence of the important event had been generally disseminated.

Shortly afterwards General M'Donald proceeded to the railway terminus, and appropriated, for the use of the authorities, a railway engine, which was just then getting the steam up for the purpose of conveying the mails by the line to bring to the mail train to Dublin. To this engine two carriages and a van were attached, and about ten o'clock the prisoner was escorted to the station from the gaol by a party of constabulary, under Sub-Inspector Bracken. The prisoner and the numerous escort by which he was guarded, of which Major-General M'Donald took the command, having been placed in the train, it proceeded quickly to Dublin, and Mr. O'Brien was lodged in Kilmainham Gaol between one and two o'clock the same night. There was little or no excitement either in Thurles or Dublin, when the news of the arrest got abroad. The prevalent feeling seemed to be pity for the unfortunate dupe of his own vanity, and commiseration for the mental distress which his present position must occasion to the members of his family. He had not changed his linen for a week. When starting on his ill-starred enterprise he had a large supply of wearing apparel, but he had gradually parted with it to the country people. From his place of concealment on the Keeper Mountains he must have walked at least 25 miles.

The Freeman's Journal of Monday gives the following particulars of the capture since his arrival in Kilmainham :—"On the arrival of Mr. O'Brien with his escort at Kilmainham Gaol, he was conducted at once into the interior, and was shown into the Registrar's room, whilst arrangements were making for his reception, and the usual entry made in the prison books. Mr. O'Brien was received by the Deputy Governor with courtesy and respect. When he reached the prison Mr. O'Brien was enveloped in a large double-lined cloak or travelling-wrapper of dark frieze. This he wore over his usual costume. Some brief delay in having place, Mr. O'Brien inquired how soon he would be shown the room he was to occupy; he expressed himself very much fatigued, and intimated his wish to be allowed to take some rest. He was at once conducted to a 'lock-up room, where a bed was placed; and, on reaching it, he proceeded to dispose himself to take some repose, after his long journey by railway, and probably a fatiguing walk across the country to Thurles, previous to his arrest. His officer in charge of the prison, however, deeming that some refreshment was necessary for his prisoner, had tea, &c. got ready, and brought up to him. Mr. O'Brien, partook of it, and thanked the officer for his opportune attention. He then slept quietly and soundly until nine o'clock, when tea was served with breakfast. He breakfasted heartily, and, as we could learn, appeared self-possessed and cheerful during the morning. In the course of the forenoon several gentlemen called at the prison to get admission to see or converse with Mr. O'Brien. The strictest orders had been issued that no person whatever, for any reason, or on any pretence, should be admitted to see or converse with Mr. O'Brien. It appears that a gentleman requested an interview with him in the early part of yesterday, stating that he was Mr. O'Brien's solicitor, and wished to see him on business; but his request was peremptorily refused. Town-Major White visited the prison yesterday, early in the afternoon."

A subaltern's guard has been placed in the prison, and quarters are to be provided for the soldiers in the adjoining Court-house.

Permission has been given by the Lord Lieutenant to the Governor to admit Mrs O'Brien, her children, and Mr. French, uncle to Mrs. O'Brien, to see the prisoner.

ATTACK ON THE LIMERICK MAIL.—On Saturday, near Abbeyfeale, a mountainous district on the border of Kerry and Limerick, the car has both ways were met and surrounded by several hundred men, armed with guns and other weapons, and the guards were called upon to surrender the bags or they would be instantly shot. Terrified and hopeless they yielded, and the coaches proceeded both ways -the guards proceeding in each case to Limerick, to swear informations in the case. The names of these guards are Galvin and Purcell. Some of the mails have since been recovered. The letters had been all opened by the rabels.

ARRESTS Eight or nine of the leading Clubmen of Waterford were arrested on Saturday. They are lodged for the present in the county gaol, whence they will shortly be removed in a steamer. They were marched up to the prison handcuffed, by about sixty police, and, save that some women and children accompanied, there was not the slightest attempt made to molest the procession. Indeed, there was not the slightest attempt made to molest the procession. The strong body of dragoons drawn out at Ballybricken-hill to prevent the chance of disturbance. It is understood that warrants are out against thirty-five persons, including those already arrested.

On Sunday, the governor of Newgate prison received warrants from the Lord-Lieutenant, fully committing for high treason Dr. West, Dr. M. Carron, of Amiens (brother-in-law of Gavan Duffy), Mr. Stephen Meany (of the Tribune), and Mr. J. Brenan (of the Felon), the previous commitments being only for further examination. "The parties," says a statement in the Mail, "were immediately informed of the import of the new warrants, with a view, we presume, to a preparation for defence. The committal sets forth the charge against all the parties, as for having conspired, combined, confederated, and agreed, with divers other persons, to levy war against her Majesty, and deprive her of her just style and title of Queen of these realms. The committal of Mr. Meany is singular in this respect. He is not alone charged, like the others, with having conspired, &c., with 'divers other persons,' but with having conspired with 'Richard J. Verner, and divers other persons.' Mr. Verner is, we understand, brother-in-law of Mr. John Mitchel. It is understood that the trials for high treason will not take place during the commission, which opens to-morrow; but that, about the beginning of September, a special commission will issue for the purpose, that then the parties will all be put on that together, and that the Crown having given proof of a conspiracy, the overt acts, by writing or otherwise, of any portion will be made applicable as against all."

Among the arrests, which are very numerous, are Mr. Bergin, of New York, and Mr. Marron, editor of the Drogheda Argus, who were on Monday lodged in Newgate under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act. Mr. Bergin is a shipbroker, who arrived in this country only a few days ago; he has forwarded a complaint to the American Consul in this city on the subject.

REPEAL SPECIAL CONSTABLES The ill-considered extension—to use no harsher expression—of all repealers, or of persons who ever had been repealers, from the special constable roll in Newry, has been condemned by the Government. An application on the subject having been made to Mr. Redington, the subject-matter has been settled. "The Lord-Lieutenant does not consider that those who entertain the opinion that the Act of Union should be repealed are thereby necessarily disqualified from acting in the capacity of special constables for the maintenance of the public peace and the defence of property and order His Excellency does, however, consider that those who have joined in illegal club association for that or any other object, should not be appointed special constables."

The latest accounts from the South represent the state of the country as gunrally tranquil. A fact is stated with respect to the peasantry, which is just to record at them, and is consolatory to the well ordered. When the Thurles contingent of police were proceeding towards the Commons of Boulagh, the peasantry on the borders acted as guides to them over the hills, pointing out the nearest boys in the valley. Peasantry, police, and soldiers are on excellent terms.

THE COMMISSION The commission of oyer and terminer opened at Dublin on Tuesday. Chief Baron Pigot and Baron Fitzgibbon presided as judges. The following is a list of the political prisoners whose names appear in the calendar:—John Martin, aged 35, feloniously publishing sedition in a paper called the Irish Felon, at No. 12, Trinity-street; Charles Gavan Duffy, aged 32, felony in the Irish Felon, at No. 12, Trinity-street; Charles Gavan Duffy, aged 32, felony in publishing sedition in a paper called the Nation, at No. 4, D'Olier-street: Denis Holmes, aged 32, same offence in the Irish Tribune; Richard Dalton Williams, aged 27, ditto; Kevin Izod O'Doherty, aged 25, ditto; Thomas Delany, aged 29, ditto; Luke Dillon, aged 25, ditto; Edward Duffy, aged 29, ditto; Kevin Izod O'Doherty, aged 25, ditto; Thomas Delany, aged 29, ditto; Luke Dillon, aged 25, ditto; Edward Duffy BALLINGARRY, AND DISTANT VIEW OF SLIEVENAMON.

THE INSURRECTION IN IRELAND.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

AFTER a week of travelling through the central and southern districts of Ireland, on railways, stage-coaches, posting-cars, and on foot; by public roads and private roads, and across the mountain tracts where there are no roads; following the flying columns of the military or advancing in front of them; overtaking the armed constabulary or being overtaken; like themilitary and police, pursuing a fact, and, after tedious travel, finding it only a rumour; in motion almost continually, by the hill-sides, where the heaps of black "culm," and the coally faces of men, and the engines to pump the mines, show the colliery districts; by the meadows of green pastures and bog hay around the collieries; by the huts of broken thatch and crooked walls of mud and stone which stand beside crooked "lazy beds" of potatoes; around the wooded demesnes and their encircling walls, with pastures bearing cattle and sheep fat and fair to behold, sheltered by elms, limes, and noble oaks, the aristocracy of trees; through the wide plain of Kilkenny, rich in ripening wheat, and that still more fertile plain of Tipperary, so rich in corn crops that custom names it the "Golden;" up the green acclivities of hills to their swarthy heads of heather; from whence, looking down on yellow wheat and white barley, the green of turnip fields, potatoes, clover, and unripe oats interwoven; the carpet of this fair portion of the earth bordered by the blue horizon, variegated with the shining rivulets and rivers, like silver amid the green and gold—all so lovely that you desire to dream and never wake to descend and see that those red lines of solid ers are real—that those dotti.gs of dark constabulary are real—that every human habitation within sight and every human action is subject to martial law—that on that mountain side, amid copses and furze, in presence of that scene, so fair that it may be the floor o Heaven, men are hunting men, and will kill them if they find them, just as surely as they would have been killed had the pursuers and pursued been reversed.

STREET IN BALLINGARRY.

After a week of travelling amid such scenes, in motion almost continually, I now sit down to relate some of my observations in detail; the Artist supplies scenic and incidental illustrations.

THE TOPOGRAPHY OF THE INSURRECTION.

The traveller leaving Dublin, his face o the south-west, by way of Kildare

KEEPER MOUNTAIN, FROM KILLALOE, COUNTY TIPPERARY

ENCAMPMENT AT TIPPERARY

Carlow, and Kilkenny, to Limerick, has the districts which the insurgents have appeared in on his left hand. The country is generally a vast plain, whose sub-soil is limestone, bearing a rich soil of calcareous earth, that earth obedient to any system of agriculture, so kindly and generous that it yields crops where there is no system, even where there is hardly the appliance of labour. Occasionally the great limestone tract is intersected by hills of sandstone, having at their base, or in their vicinity, lesser elevations of clayey slate and other stones of the coal formation. In those latter districts there is little tillage. The soil is a retentive clay. The people keep cows and make butter for market, their farms measuring from 30to 50 Irish acres (20 acres, Irish, are equal to 32 acres 33 perches, 14½ yards, English). They also breed horned cattle and horses, and grow oats and potatoes, but no wheat and seldom any barley. Where the sand-stone formation is not too elevated, wheat is grown. On the limestone soil wheat is the prevailing crop. Widow M'Cormack's farm, consisting of 30 Irish acres, in and around whose house the insurrectionary conflict occurred on Saturday, the 29th of July, is one of those situated on the clayey slate stratum, its crops being oats and potatoes only, with meadow hay and pasturage.

Slievenamon Mountain, the name of which has become familiar to the public within these two weeks, is sandstone

KILKENNY CASTLE, THE SEAT OF THE MARQUIS OF ORMONDE.

If we start from Kilkenny—which is seventy-two miles south west from Dublin and proceed southward, we advance between lofty thorn hedgerows behind which fields of ripening wheat are seen, equal to four or five quarters per acre some more: some of the wheat in that district is equal to the best in Middlesex.

At the distance of ten miles, the ground gradually rising, and gradually declining in fertility, we reach Callan, a town containing, with its parish, about 3000 inhabitants, occupying the acclivities on each side of the King rivulet From this town Mr. Trant and fifty constabulary marched, on the morning of the 29th July, towards Ballingarry, nine miles westward, to attempt the apprehension of Mr. Smith O Brien—of which more hereafter.

Proceeding southward from Callon, we gradually ascend towards Slievenamon, which rises 2362 feet above the level of the sea. We have already passed within sight of, or near to, several seats o gentlemen and noblemen. At Kilkenny we left the Castle, noble residence of the Marquis of Ormonde. We have Desart-park on our right, where some of the finest oak timber in the kingdom grows. There are remnants of ancient monasteries and castles; and almost every elevation has its tradition of battles fought in times long gone between the

CHURCH SERVICE IN THE CAMP AT TURTELLA, NEAR THURLES.

O'Callons and other families; more recently between the Butlers, the Fitzgeralds, and those whom the incidents of civil war brought to the surface of the tumult. At present the youthful Lord Clifden is the chief proprietor of Callon: his mother, Lady Dover, who has managed the estate in his minority, is kindly spoken of by people of all social degrees and religious creeds.

At four miles from Callon we pass Garrynicken, a large wooded park of the Marquis of Ormond. Going five miles farther we reach Kilamery; and half a mile farther, as we ascend the eastern limb of Slievenamon, we see a large stone on the wayside, which marks the boundary of Kilkenny and Tipperary. Upward we go, and reach Nine-mile-house in a gullet of the mountain, where is a police-station. Mr. Smith O'Brien visited this, on his passage from Carrick-on-Suir to Ballingarry, on the 5th July; but the police had been removed.

We are now, with faces southward, see the blue-topped mountains of the county of Waterford before us, at the distance of ten, fifteen, and twenty miles, extending in a bold line from east to west. Lying between us and these is the valley of the Suir river, a soil of rare virtue for the growth of wheat. Fourteen miles by an angle to the right is the town of Clonmel. By an angle to the left at about the same distance is Carrick-on-Suir. Proceeding onward to the left past Carrick, with the beautiful Suir as our companion, we reach Waterford, near to which that river and the Nore, which we left at Kilkenny, and the Barrow, which we crossed on the railway at Bagnalstown, form the Three Sisters, and become one. As we intend to visit Waterford when interesting events are less pressing elsewhere, and to ascend the Suir by Carrick, Clonmel, and Cahir to Thurles, by which course we shall have the bold Slievenamon on our right, I shall at present recal my pan to the north of that isolated highland, and proceed westward, keeping it on our left.

Starting from Callan, by the north Carrick Mr. Trant took with his party of constables, we pass through eight miles of fine country, upon four or five miles of which the style of agriculture, the full-eared wheat, and the rich grazing meadows, besported with gigantic cattle, are equal to the finest parts of England. The centre of this well-cultivated district is Harly Park, the seat of Mr. Poe. We are now in Tipperary. The next two miles carry us upward to poorer soils and coarser crops, and lead us to the Double village of Ballingarry. The houses are about two hundred in number, reckoning the hovels which squat by the wayside, and form a ragged suburb. The village forms the letter L, its centre-point is a cross-village, a smart three-storied, and somewhat behind us, is the fair green on which, when visited by us, was the encampment of 350 men, with officers and non-commissioned officers of the 79th Regiment

An official specimen of the duty now performed by soldiers in Ireland, I may refer to this party. When we saw them it was a wet evening, and, but for an occasional glimpse of sun, a wet day. They had been in Ballingarry since seven o'clock the previous night. They had just pitched their tents at Callon, when the route came to march for Ballingarry. They had then come from Kilkenny; their tents were only up a night there when ordered to Callon. They had barely done more than pitch their tents at Dublin when ordered to Kilkenny. Such, planking backward, had been their movements. Major de Lacoy kindly conducted us through the encampment. The assistant surgeon was at work with a pick and shovel, making a trench round his tent to carry off the water. Noncommissioned officers and privates were doing the same service to their tents. Two were on guard, the sentries standing out by the sides of the corn-fields where the view was open, in the rain. Some were seeking the uncertain shelter of a low stone wall to boil their camp kettles. All, officers and men, though in the state in which they would pass the night, were in such readiness, that in the space of twelve minutes they could strike their tents, pack up, turn out, and be on the line of march. Most of the soldiers were taking advantage of their comparative stay for the night to wash their linen. The officers, though obliged to help themselves in most things, had not yet begun to wash their own linen; but in the same service to their comforts

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of the Earl GRANVILLE, the Rum Duties Bill was read a second time, after a few remarks from the Duke of ARGYLL and Lord MONTEAGLE.

The Juvenile Offenders (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Some other Bills on the table were advanced a stage, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House assembled at twelve o'clock.

The Registering Births, &c. (Scotland), Bill, and the Marriage (Scotland) Bill were read a second time, after some discussion.

The Insolvent Debtors Court Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Exchange of Advowsons in the Counties of Warwick and Stafford Bill was read a second time.

At three the House adjourned to five o'clock.

At the resumed sitting—

MEDIATION IN NORTHERN ITALY.—Mr. P. HOWARD asked the Foreign Minister whether the British Government intended, either singly or in concert with her Majesty's allies, to mediate between Sardinia and Austria, for the pacification of the north of Italy?—Lord PALMERSTON replied: Her Majesty's Government is deeply sensible of the great importance of putting an end to the unfortunate state of things in the north of Italy. I may assure the House that the desire of terminating, in an amicable manner, the existing differences, is equally shared by the Government of France. Her Majesty's Government are, therefore, about to engage, I may say are already engaged, with France, by an amicable negotiation, to bring these differences to an end.—This announcement was hailed with loud cheers from all parts of the House.

To a question from Mr. GLADSTONE, Lord Palmerston replied that the Admiral of the station had received orders to send a ship of war to protect British subjects and property at Hayti. A vessel had already been sent from Jamaica.

EMIGRATION.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL intimated, in answer to Lord ASHLEY, that the Government would be happy to assist in spreading information on the subject of emigration, but could grant no further funds at all thereof.

PUBLIC HEALTH.

On the motion of Lord MORPETH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the amendments made by the Lords in the Public Health Bill.

Some of the amendments made by the Lords were agreed to, and others dissented from, after a long discussion.

REVISION OF TAXATION

On the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Property Tax,

Mr EWART moved, as an amendment, that it is expedient that there be a revision of our present system of taxation, especially with the view to encouraged its chance of the commerce of the country, and to increase the employment and comforts of the commerce of the country, and to increase the employment and comforts of the commerce of the country, and to increase the employment and comforts

ARREST OF SMITH O'BRIEN AT THE RAILWAY STATION AT THURLES.

ARREST OF SMITH O'BRIEN, AT THURLES.

The preceding events occurred on Saturday, 29th July. On Saturday, the 5th August, Smith O'Brien, wearied with fatigue and disappointment, hunted from valley to hill, from hill to valley, hiding in the houses of those whose liberty or lives were perilled by giving him shelter, still retaining probably some of his defensive dreams that a rabble might arise out of the potato ridges and become a warlike army obedient to his command, able to cope with British soldiers and Irish constabulary, but at last reduced to hopelessness, he resolved to return to his family and home, if not discovered to yield himself willingly to the law, if discovered and arrested.

Thurles is a town situated on the river Suir, 98 miles south-west from Dublin. It has a considerable inland trade as a market and shop-keeping town. It contains about 1300 houses, 1560 families, 7660 inhabitants. Around it is a dense rural population; the soil, a level plain, is cultivated and fertile. Its central situation, its populous density, the mountain retreats westward and north, all indicated its locality as a likely one for insurrection.

Thither the "Flying Column," under Major-General M'Donald, advanced and encamped after the affair at Farrihyory, to keep the Thurles district in check, and, if possible, arrest the outlawed leaders of the insurrection. For the latter purpose, parties of military and constabulary scoured the country as far as the Keeper Mountain, which rises boldly in the north-west of Tipperary, and overhangs the Shannon opposite the county of Clare, near its junction with Galway. From the country below, they covered the mountain itself, but found none of the fugitives. O'Brien, a close spectator of the pursuit, retraced his steps towards Thurles; and at half-past seven o'clock on the evening of Saturday walked through the town to the railway station, and took a second-class ticket for Limerick. Several people knew him as he passed the streets, and implored him not to expose himself to capture; but he took no notice of what they said. One of the railway guards, named Hulme, who also knew him, sent for a Dublin detective policeman, whom he knew to be close at hand with a warrant, also for some constables to assist. Meanwhile, he kept his eye on O'Brien, who, paying 6s. for a ticket which was 5s. 6d., overlooked the 6d. which was returned as change. He was recalled by the clerk to take it, which doing, he inquired what side of the rails he should go to for the Limerick train, and was told the opposite side. To this he went, followed by Hulme. He walked about for a brief period, when Hulme, seeing the other constables approach, went behind him, laid hold of his arms firmly, and said "Mr. O'Brien, you are a prisoner in the Queen's name." The other constables laid hold of him also, and, searching him for arms, found a small pistol in his waistcoat pocket. He was not otherwise armed.—(See the Engraving.)

Intelligence was sent to General M'Donald, who at once turned out the troops, and ordered all the people of Thurles to keep within doors. Some of them not obeying the order, were threatened with the immediate penalty of death. A legal functionary, of considerable consequence, thought that he might continue to stand at his gate to see what was going on: but the General pointed to the nearest lamp-post as a convenient gallows for him or any one who did not instantly obey orders and disappear within doors. The gentleman looked at the lamp-post, went in, and shut his door.

Mulvaney, an engine-driver, was firmer. His steam was up, ready to take a train down the line, when an aide-de-camp ordered him to go to Dublin. He said he would go now here without the order of the station-master. "In the Queen's name I arrest you and your engine for her Majesty's service," exclaimed the soldier, drawing his sword. "Get the master's orders first," replied the engine-man.

The "master," who had the General at his side, with a pistol pointed to his head, gave his orders, and the engine was got upon the up line. The prisoner, who meanwhile had been lodged in the Bridewell near at hand, was brought to the train, placed in the centre seat, and, guarded by armed men, was ordered not to move or speak at his peril.

Rumours of conversation, alleged to have been held by him and the General, are common, but I have not been able to have them authenticated, and there are too many of them to be all true.

The special train arrived with him at King's-bridge station, Dublin, at two o'clock on the morning of Sunday. He was at once escorted from the train to the Royal Barracks, which are close by, and from thence to Kilmainham Gaol.

At the time of my present writing, the other leading outlaws, Meagher, Dillon, and Doheny, are still in hiding; but it is said they have endeavoured to negotiate for their lives through a Thurles priest, offering to give themselves up on the promise of their lives being spared. Government, however, will grant no conditions.

THE ROBBERY OF THE TRALEE MAIL-COACHES BY THE ARMED PEASANTRY.

The only events since the collision with the constabulary on the 29th ult., at Farrihyory, which indicate a mischievous determination on the part of the peasantry, are the attempted attack on the Cork mail coach, on the night of Monday, and the successful attack and robbery of two of the Tralee mails on Saturday.

From Limerick to Tralee a four-horsed mail-coach goes down once a day, and another comes up. They usually meet at eleven A.M., somewhere between the town of Newcastle, which stands at the western end of the plain of Limerick, and the village of Abbeyfeale, which is on the hills near the borders of Kerry.

The population on the hills is more dense than on the fertile plain below. They are also more lawless. Cahirmoyle, the property of Smith O'Brien's family on the maternal side, is situated near Newcastle, where also the Courtenay estates are, now the property of the Earl of Devon. About 28 or 30 years ago, long before the Earl of Devon had anything to do with the one estate, or Smith O'Brien with the other, the population was cleared from that of Cahirmoyle, and it was turned into grazing farms. Most of the people dispossessed went to the hills about Abbeyfeale. From the Courtenay property the small tenantry were only partially cleared. It was there that Captain Rock took his origin, with his threatening notices, assaults, and assassinations. Five men were hanged in a row at one time, on an eminence between Newcastle and Cahirmoyle, that they might be seen by the lawless bands who had taken refuge on the hills.

It is the descendants of those people who were cleared out of the fertile plain below at that time who now cultivate patches of moorland, and form those bands which, on Saturday last, lay in wait for the two mails where they meet, and who there rushed out on them, and plundered them of their contents.

The immediate effect of those outrages and the insurrectionary movements has been to prostrate and suppress the little trade which Ireland possesses. Merchants, commercial travellers, everybody except the constabulary, military and newspaper reporters, is staying at home.

THE HARVEST AND POTATO CROPS

Ireland only requires a few weeks of sunny weather to possess one of the best harvests of grain known for many years. Everywhere it is luxuriant. But since I came here the weather has been often wet, always cloudy.

Of Potatoes I read bad accounts, and occasionally hear people's fears, and see their heads shake with doubts; but I never saw a better growth, or a healthier bloom upon potato fields, than I have seen throughout the eastern and central counties. In no market-place, in no shop, at no dinner-table have I yet seen a diseased potato, though frequently inquiring for them. On some of the earlier sorts in gardens I have seen withered leaves, and in the fields where the seed failed I have seen blanks; but if there be disease, it is but imperfectly developed.

The State trials in Dublin are now in progress, and cause much public anxiety.

SEARCHING FOR ARMS.

The accompanying Illustrations, by another artist, Mr. James Mahony, show some of the precautionary measures, as the Posting of Proclamations, and the Search for Arms. Next, we have the porch of Lismore Castle, with the delivery of despatches for the officer in command of the troops stationed there.

Of the Encampments we have a series of Sketches, commencing with that in the Phœnix Park, Dublin. Next are two scenes from the Encampment of the 74th Highlanders: one representing the performance of the Church Service, and the other Major Ansel and the Officers at Mess, the appointments of the mess-table being void of all ceremony, each officer being obliged to provide his own knife, fork, plate, and drinking vessel.

The next sketch shows the Watch-fire, with Sentinels of the 85th on duty. Soon after our Artist was there an express arrived from Thurles, less than a mile distant, with the account of O'Brien's arrest.

For the remaining Illustration, the Camp at Everton, with the following, we are indebted to a Correspondent.

The force at present encamped at Everton consists of a demi-battery of artillery, under Captain Mitchell; the 46th Regiment, under Colonel Garrett; and the head-quarters of the 81st, under Colonel Willcocks; the whole camp being under the charge of Deputy-Assistant-Commissary-General Crookshank and numbering about 1150 souls.

On the north side of the ground is the demi-battery of artillery, sheds having been erected for their horses and those of the field and staff officers. On the south side, parallel with the Buck-road, are the cooking-grates; whilst the whole of the ground in front of the camp is devoted to parade and drill purposes.

Greenwich Fair, Primrose Hill on a Sunday, would give no idea of the crowd who flock to see the camp: not even the heavy rains which have prevailed of late have prevented thousands from visiting the ground; and the audience at tattoo is enormous. The vendors of Everton toffee and Ormskirk gingerbread make a rich harvest. By-and-bye, when all gets square, and bands playing, parades and reviews take place, the worthy Liverpoolonians may be rewarded for the violent admiration they entertain for red coats. But is it admiration or enmosity which prompts them to risk drenchings, and craftily to evade sentries, in order to get into the heart of the camp?

MAJOR ANSEL AND THE OFFICERS OF THE 74TH AT MESS.

The accompanying diagram may assist in explaining. The black O are soldiers' circular or bell tents, of which there are six to every company; the officers' bell tents (O) being in the rear of their respective companies. Field officers are allowed marquees, as may be seen by the mark ——. Each of the regiments have their mess marquee, and one common hospital marquee. In the rear of the colonel's marquee are the tents of his adjutant, quarter-master, and staff-sergeants.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE, AT SWANSEA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

WEDNESDAY.

We arrived last night, after a somewhat tedious sea voyage from Bristol. From this city during the day four steamers had started for Swansea, each one carrying a fair number of members and visitors to this, the first meeting of the Association within the limits of the Principality. On arriving at the Mumbles, we were treated to a fine display of aurora borealis, which was accompanied by some peculiar phenomena, particularly a series of luminous bands springing from the southern horizon, and ascending nearly to the zenith, where they were lost in some light bands of clouds; all this at the same time as a true aurora borealis was manifesting itself in the northern portion of the sky. Among the members already arrived are—The Marquis of Northampton, Sir R. H. Inglis, Sir Chas. Lemon, the Rev. the Dean of Ely, Sir David Brewster, Sir Henry de la Beche, Professor Ansted, Professor Edward Forbes, Professor Ramsay, Professor Oldham, Dr. Lankaster, Dr. Babington, Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Percy, Dr. Lyon Playfair, Colonel Sabine, Colonel Sykes, Richd. Phillips, Esq., and numerous other scientific gentlemen, with whose names the public are familiar.

The first meeting of the Council is at one o'clock to-day, for the election of officers, &c.

[Next week we intend to illustrate the proceedings of this important Meeting.]

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

A dread of French interference in the affairs of Italy, added to the rupture of the armistice between Germany and Denmark, has had a slightly depressing effect upon the funds during the week. The decline, however, has not exceeded one-half per cent, the easy state of money operating as a check upon any further fall. Business has been nearly confined to public purchases, the speculators and dealers generally being occupied in preparing for the settlement of the Account, which took place on Thursday. The range of Consols during the Account has been about ¾ per cent. On July 14 Consols quoted 87¼ ; on the 18th the price attained 89, afterwards receding to 88⅝ on the 27th. The opening price on Monday was 87¼, afterwards declining to 86⅞, closing at 87 ; again receding on Tuesday to 86¾, and closing on Wednesday at 86⅝. Upon the account being nearly adjusted on Thursday, 86⅝ to ¾ was the quotation for Money, and 86⅝ for the next September Account. Exchequer Bills have not materially varied, and the remaining securities fluctuated only in the same proportion as Consols. The closing prices of the week are, for Reduced, 86¾ ; Consols, 86⅝ ; New 3¼ per Cent Annuities, 87 ; Long Annuities, to expire Jan., 1860, 9 ; Ditto, Oct. 10, 1855, 8¼ ; India Bonds, after 1860, 19 prem. ; Ditto, under £1000, 29 prem. ; Consols for Account, 86⅝ ; Exchequer Bills—£1000, March, 39 prem. ; £1000, June, 34 prem. ; £500, June, 34 prem. ; Small, March, 39 prem. ; Small, June, 34 prem.

Transactions in the Foreign House continue on the most limited scale, and fluctuations, consequently, are proportionately insignificant. Mexican Stock has alone shown any sustaining power, the quarterly's price of 17¾ to 17 to 16 17. Dutch Stock has been heavy, and declined nearly one per cent ; whilst the variations in the other securities have been so slight as not to merit record. The state of the Market will be seen by the following prices : Brazil 5 per cent Bonds, 71 ; Mexican, Five per Cent, 1846, Account, 16½ ; Spanish, Three per Cent., 21¾ ; Belgian, Four-and-a-Half per Cent., 87 ; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 63 ; Ditto, Four per Cent. Certificates, 69.

Shares continue heavy, from a general absence of business, the only improvements occurring in some of the new Preference Stocks But little disposition is evinced to deal, although, being near to the quarterly settlement, sales have to take place, until after which transactions will doubtless remain limited. The last prices are :—Aberd., 21¼ ; Birm., Wo.ver., and Dudley, 14¾ ; Caledonian, 25⅝, xD., Ditto, Half Shares, 12¾ ; Ditto, New, £10 Pref., 8¾ ; Eastern Counties, 14¼ ; Ditto, 5 per Cent., 5⅛ ; East Lancashire, 17¼ ; Great Northern, 83 ; Great North of England, New, £40, 66, xd. ; Great Western, Half Shares, 46¾ ; Ditto, Quarter Shares, Fifths, 7¼ ; Ditto, New, 7¼ ; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 6 per Cent., 3⅛ ; Ditto (Preston and Wyre), 24¾ ; London and Blackwall, 4¾ ; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 30 ; London and North-Western, 97¾ ; Ditto, New, 7¼ ; Ditto, Fifths, 2¼ ; Ditto, £10 (M. and S.), 8, 10⅜ ; Ditto, £10 (M. and B.), C., 4¾ ; London and South-Western, 49½ ; Midland Birmingham, Six per Cents, 117½ ; North British, 21½ ; Ditto, Thirds, 2¼ ; North Staffordshire, 9¾ ; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 27 ; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 6¾ ; Scottish Central, 23¼ ; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, Class B, 14½ ; South-Eastern, 24¾ ; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 18¾ ; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 34½ ; Ditto, Original New and Berwick, 30 ; Ditto, G. N. E., Preference, 8¾ ; York and North Midland, 66 ; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 20 ; Boulogne and Amiens, 9¾ ; Northern of France, 14¾ ; Sambre and Meuse, 2¼.

SATURDAY MORNING. There was scarcely any variation in prices yesterday, Consols opening at 86¾ ⅝, and receding only ⅛ per cent upon the rumour of the French troops having passed the Alps. More attention was directed to the state of the weather than to foreign politics, anxiety beginning to be felt with regard to the harvest. The last price of Consols was 86⅞ to ⅞. The Share Market was languishing. A fall of ½ per cent occurred in Great Western shares, in consequence of a dividend of at the rate of only 7 per cent per annum being declared. The last year's dividend was at the rate of 8 per cent per annum.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday). Only a moderate supply of English wheat has been realized on the mark.t this week, and the show of samples to-day was small. Owing to the restricted state of the weath.r the trade for all kinds of wheat of home produce was steady, and Monday's quotations were fully supported. Foreign wheat, of which there were in good request, at extreme rates. In the middling and inferior kinds comparatively little business was transacted. Barley was in moderate supply and steady request, at the figures. There was a better inquiry for malt, to which price, however, we have no advance to notice. Oats, beans, and peas moved off freely, at extreme prices. Indian corn and meal quite neglected. The flour trade was steady.

Duty on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 5s ; barley, 2s 0d ; oats, 2s 6d ; rye, 3s 0d, beans, 3s 0., peas, 3s 0d

Tea.—The demand for most kinds of tea continues steady, and last week's prices are well supported. The deliveries continue good

Sugar—We have again to report a fair average amount of business doing, at rates as well as refined goods, the prices of which are well maintained

Coffee.—The market is less active for this article, yet holders do not give way in price

Rice. There is less excitement in the demand for rice, nevertheless prices are fairly supported Provisions. The supplies of Dutch butter continuing to increase. The demand for all description is heavy at a decline on last quotations ; from 1s to 2s per cwt. Hams, in consequence of the large supply of Irish, have given way from 2s to 4s per cwt. Irish bacon and rolls are also lower. Irish lard moves off slowly at a reduction of 2s per cwt. There is a steady sale for the best parcels of bacon, at full prices. Small parcels have sold at from 48s to 52s per cwt. Prime Irish hams are in fair request. All other kinds of provisions have to exercise no change.

Leather. Buenos Ayres and Rio hides are in moderate request, and prices have a downward tendency. Foreign calf skins are in fair demand, at full prices. Town tallow, 44s to 44s 6d per cwt.

Oils.—We have no change to note as to the general features of this market. A moderate demand exists for home use ; but we have no inquiry for export

Potatoes.—New potatoes are in fair supply, selling at 3s to 4s 6s per tcn

Wool.—The market is steady, and full prices are paid in every instance The imports continue to be a liberal one

Hops (Friday).—There is rather more inquiry for the best hops in pockets, at very full prices. In a small way a limited business is also doing at late quotations. The duty is called from £195 000 to £200,000. Generally speaking, the plantation accounts are not very favourable.—Sussex pockets, £2 2s to £2 6s ; Weald of Kent, ditto, £2 6s to £2 16s ; Mid and East Kent, ditto £2 8s to £3 3s.

Smithfield (Friday).—Notwithstanding our market to-day was but moderately supplied with beasts, both as to number and quality the best trade, owing to the unfavourable state of the weather for slaughtering, was very dull, at a decline in the prices of Monday last of 2d per 8lbs. The highest price for the primest Scots, or crosses, did not exceed 3s 4d to 3s 6d per 8lbs. With foreign stock we were very scantily supplied. The supply of English sheep was moderately good, but deficient in quality. On the whole the mutton trade was dull, and the demand for tallows were well supported. In lambs next to nothing was doing, at a fall in the rate of from 4d to 6d per 8lb. We can quote no beasts for sale for the best breeds. Prime sheep, with all average supply, and moderate request, at late rates. In pigs very little was doing. Milch cows sold at from £15 to £18 each, inferior to middling sorts at small sale rom the infant in its mother's arms to those past mid-life. It was curious to note how unconscious the children appeared of their new position, or rather how soon they had become accustomed to it. All save these seemed to be hard workers: many, who had scarcely reached manhood, bore the strong lines of care on their faces; and any one who had not been apprised of the conditions on which they obtained their passage, would have set them down among the industrious classes.

We now inspected the accommodation between decks, where a number of the passengers were seated—some playing with their children, others reading, and here and there might be seen one whose thoughtful air rather denoted sorrow for the past than fitting spirits for the future. We were glad to find so many books in hand; what a friend must a huge entertaining volume be upon a long voyage! We were happy also to see the officers of the Prayer-book and Homily Society distributing their publications: what hopes must they nourish, in time of peril upon the wide deep! THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 331.—Vol. XIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1848. [Sixpence.

ITALIANS, GERMANS, AND SCLAVONIANS.

The three great conflicts for national existence that sprung out of the French Revolution of February, 1848, are still raging with all their pristine intensity. Italy, Germany, and Sclavonia are each engaged in the effort to make itself one and independent. Each is involved in difficulties, dangers, and perplexities, in pursuance of its object. The sympathies of Constitutional Europe are more or less intensely excited in favour of them all; and the whole of Europe, whether constitutional or despotic, is deeply interested in the immediate settlement of the various questions to which the struggle of these three races has given birth.

The Italian question, in consequence of the appeal to the sword o which the Lombardian population, aided by the King of Sardinia, resorted at the very outset, is the one of most immediate and striking significance. While it is the day-dream of imaginative and thoughtful minds that that celebrated and lovely country should be freed from the bonds that have so long oppressed her, it s equally the practical and abiding interest of all Europe that the dream should be realised, and that—

> Italy, unloosening her bonds,
> By her strong will should be at last the home
> Of broadly based and virtuous liberty.

Much was expected from the Italians themselves in pursuance of the great object for which her wisest and bravest sons have struggled and suffered for two generations. When the present Pope, before the outbreak of the French Revolution, gave the cause an impetus by the declaration of enlightened and patriotic opinion which signalised the commencement of his reign, even the most indifferent spectators of the progress of events in Europe conceived hopes of the speedy regeneration of Italy. These hopes have not yet been realised. The Italians, long oppressed and misgoverned, have not proved equal to the task of emancipating themselves from foreign thraldom. The generous, although ambitious, attempt of the King of Sardinia to wage the battle of Italian nationality against Austrian domination has, for the present, failed; and the mischief is, that it is chiefly owing to the want of due support from the Italians themselves that this failure has occurred, and that Austria recovering from her foregone defeats, is once again installed in the capital of Lombardy.

The Italians have thrown away a great chance, and the vision of the nationality of Italy has receded far away into the dim and uncertain future. The utmost that can at present be expected from the joint mediation of Great Britain and France is that Austria shall retire from Milan, on receipt of an indemnity for her losses in the war, and on condition that Lombardy shall constitute herself into an independent state, with a large burden of debt upon her back, derived from her long connexion with Austria. It was evident, before these events, that the nationality of Italy could not be wrought out except by the Italians themselves. The fact is still more evident now. Any re-construction of the Lombardian kingdom, in consequence of the recent successes of the Austrian arms, will but add a new impediment to those already existing. Under all circumstances, therefore, the unity of Italy will depend, even more greatly than it did before, on the efforts which the Italians themselves shall make in their various States and Principalities to conquer those internal difficulties which arise from their own supineness or jealousy of each other. The case is not hopeless, but it is difficult and embarrassing, and will, it is to be feared, long continue to disturb Europe.

The nationality of Germany is equally desirable, but equally difficult to establish. It is as desirable for Western Europe as it is for the sake of the Germans themselves; but even more than the Italian imbroglio the case is hard of solution, from difficulties that are almost all of internal origin, growth, and complexity. Austria, that but a few weeks ago seemed a prey to anarchy;—and her Imperial House, that was on the point of yielding up her German possessions and leaving Austria to her fate to take refuge in Hungary, have both recovered a portion of their lost prestige, and stand in the arena, prepared for the assertion of claims that are of the highest magnitude. Prussia—divided between those who wish Prussia to absorb Germany, and those who would be contented that Prussia should be absorbed into the larger Empire—struggles with internal difficulties of the most formidable kind; and all the lesser States of the ill-assorted Confederation are torn with the conflicting claims and desires of Kings and people. One part of Germany struggles against another: Monarchs and potentates put forward their personal claims to supremacy, without reference to the interests of the people they govern; and Monarchical and Republican principles, independently, altogether, of the great idea of German unity, surge and re-surge over the length and breadth of that large portion of the European continent which speaks the Teutonic language. It is utterly impossible for us in England to form a correct opinion of what is taking place in Germany; and even the Germans themselves seem bewildered by the difficulties to be encountered and subdued before the heterogeneous Germanic Confederation can be fused into one great and coherent Empire. The Prince of Leiningen—son of the Duchess of Kent by her first marriage, and who at present occupies the post of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs under the Archduke John of Austria, the Reichsverweser, or present head of the Confederation—has issued a document, which very clearly and boldly puts the whole case before the people of Germany and Europe. The Prince affirms itself, by the election of a National Assembly, with the concurrence of all the States of the Confederation, the unity of Germany was virtually recognised, and that the appointment of the Archduke John as Regent was an additional and necessary recognition of the same fact. "Not only," says the Prince, "was a German empire decreed in place of the hitherto existing confederation of states, but the German nation was placed in a position to testify by facts whether it really desired true freedom, and whether it would really have an united and powerful Germany. As there is only one kind of real liberty which rests on law and order, so there is," he adds, "but one sort of unity—an actual union of all the component parts of a whole, and that, too, in such a manner as to avert the possibility of any dispute or contest between the whole and the parts. If the German nation, therefore, will have unity, it must not only will the means, but also adopt the consequences. There can be no more opposition of Bavarian, Prussian, Saxon, or any other interests to those of Germany. The former must be absorbed in the latter. Jealousy between individual states, revilings of the northern by the southern parts of the empire, or vice versâ, are, therefore, as he contends, mischievous absurdities." Nor will he allow that dynastic interests, so far as they refer to the imperial power, should be taken into consideration, for the Princes are as much called upon to conform to the will of the whole people as any other German.

The Princes contends, with force, point, and incontrovertible logic, that if the task begun is to be brought to a safe and permanent conclusion, the Imperial Power, that is to say the Imperial Government and the National Assembly—supported by the national will—must devote itself with courage and decision to the fulfilment of this great mission. The Imperial Power must, so far as it may be necessary, absorb in itself the sovereignty of the individual states; it must unremittingly undertake the requisite organisation of Germany; and must, whilst establishing the organism of the Imperial Government, reduce that of the individual states. He also insists, with equal reason, that the Imperial Power must abolish, as speedily as possible, the diplomatic intercourse of the individual states at home and abroad, and concentrate it in its own hands; that it must appropriate to itself the unconditional disposal of the national forces, take such measures respecting them as it may deem advisable, and advance the customs lines to the frontiers of Germany.

The Prince calls upon the German people to decide once for all whether this is the unity it requires; or whether it is content that the old seeds of discord and jealousy should remain in the soil, and that Germany should present to the world the spectacle of a disunited people desirous of unity, but without the courage and the ability to take the only possible means of acquiring and maintaining it. Coming from such a quarter, the document is of no considerable importance at the present juncture of affairs in Germany; but whether it will ever weigh with the people in any way or another, the decision of this great and complicated question, remains to be seen. There is one element of success in the struggle. There is no foreign domination in Germany, to coerce the people or to embarrass their conduct in any way. It is purely a domestic matter, which all the powers of Europe regard with solicitude and anxiety, but in which none has the right, or perhaps the inclination to interfere.

The question of Sclavonian independence hangs upon that of Germany. Russia, that cannot interfere with the Germans, or prevent the various states from forming one vast empire if they are so inclined, foments, as a matter of precaution, the desire of the Sclavonian races to imitate the example, and to form an empire of corresponding magnitude and importance, under the influence of Russian ideas. Betwixt the two races there is thought in Germany to be an inherent antagonism. Many German writers labour hard at the present moment to exaggerate whatever differences of feeling or prejudice may exist, and to hold before the eyes of the people of Germany the vision of a great Sclavonian empire, or "Panslavonia," with interests hostile to those of the Germans, as an incentive to the latter to forget their own differences, and unite against the hostile race. The wave of Revolution in Europe is not, as some represent it, merely a wave of Democracy dashing against the barriers of Monarchy. More than mere forms of government are involved in the convulsions that have taken place. Republicanism or Monarchy are not the questions to be decided in Italy, Germany, or among the Sclavonians. The matters to be decided are preliminary to these: they refer not simply to the right of self-government, but to the right to exist. This right was denied or ignored at the protracted settlement of the affairs of Europe in 1815; and consequently, and in due time, it has endeavoured to make itself heard. When the new settlement shall take place, there is a prospect that it will be somewhat more worthy of the name than the last was.

THE WAR MEDAL.

The following is a tolerably accurate statement of the claims to the war medal which have been decided upon by the Board of General Officers:—

Officers		2276
Non-commissioned officers and privates		17,027
Total claimants decided upon		20,303

These claimants have been proved to have been present at an aggregate of actions as follows:—

Officers	.. ..	2814
Non-commissioned officers and soldiers	.. ..	70,389
Total actions	.. ..	73,203

Or an average of more than three actions to each claimant; but there are seven claimants who, it has been proved, were present at eight or ten actions each, and one in as many as fourteen.

The under-mentioned regiments have participated in from ten to seventeen of the actions named in the general average:—

In Ten Actions—Coldstream Guards, 3d Foot Guards, 23d Foot, 42d Foot, 61st Foot, 71st Foot, 94th Foot, and 1st Light Battalion King's German Legion.

In Eleven Actions—1st Foot, 9th Foot, 20th Foot, 28th Foot, 31st Foot, 48th Foot, 50th Foot, and 83d Foot.

In Twelve Actions—2d Foot, 87th Foot, 88th Foot, 89th Foot, Royal Staff Corps.

In Thirteen Actions—32d Foot and 36th Foot.

In Fourteen Actions—7th Foot and 45th Foot.

In Fifteen Actions—5th Foot, 43d Foot, and 52d Foot.

In Sixteen Actions—40th Foot.

In Seventeen Actions—88th Fifles, part of the regiment being at Talavera, with battalion detachments.

In Eighteen Actions—The 60th Rifles eight battalions.

When Sir John Moore's army marched on Spain, two of regiments belonging to that army who remained in Portugal were formed into two battalions, called 1st and 2d battalion detachments; these two battalions were at Talavera, and of course the men who belonged to these battalions had a claim for that action.—United Service Gazette.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT REGATTA.

How beautiful seems all upon this isle!
How bright the verdure of the forest trees!
How fair each cultivated spot appears!
How fresh and fragrant is the gentle air!

THAT which fable and fairy tale did for the fancies of our forefathers, plain matter-of-fact enchants the senses of their descendants. The fire-drawn chariots of romance are now the ordinary appliances of travel by land, and galleys similarly propelled the means whereby we journey by water. In conditions of high civilisation and refinement, progress is at once cause and effect. About the period when London took possession of the village of Charing and other suburban retreats, "coaches," we are told, "began to ply in the streets of the metropolis"; and now that the capital has advanced upon Epping Forest and Hounslow Heath, railways are provided for the use of the citizens, which convey them between their country-houses and villas, without any reference to time or distance. When Admiral Sir Sidney Smith was said, had any one told him the day was at hand when it would be but a morning drive from Cornhill to the Saltmarket? . . . .

Then I should say with Ira Ha Iovelliw
Than all the valleys of London hills;

And two hours and twenty minutes west sou'-west of St. Giles's, hills and valleys that would put to shame all Asia Minor . . . but there are serpents in human shape that babble of the good old times! . . . Vectis, as the inhabitants of England is called in ancient chronicles, was, are now, the residence of Royalty, and [illegible] . . . Here, in the best sense of the expression, as applied to nature,

All is gentle and aristocratic.

The people, of whatever class or condition, have an instinct of urbanity and courtesy: the country smiles with the poetry of the pastoral age; and the winds of heaven take head lest they "visit the face too roughly." And, were it lawful at such a season to meddle with matters political, might it not be said the Wight offers, beyond all other spots of these dominions, the meetest retreat for Royalty? There the head reared by the crown, the hand harassed by the sceptre, may lay aside the trappings and the cares of royal state; and there the loyal and loving can feel that the object of their care is beyond the cunning and devices of the evil-doer. Had the situation of Neuilly resembled that of Osborne, would the fate of the House of Orleans be what it is? . . . .

This is the especial time of "the mountain and the flood." Grouse-shooting has sounded its charge on the brown heath, and the gallant hunting is waving over the blue water. By means of the sea has arisen its pleasure capital: it is full of fair women, and men that "deserve the fair." It is the eve of its high festival, and Cowes has steady matters of account in hand. Some few days prior to the Regatta week, a meeting of the Royal Yacht Squadron was held, at which the Commodore resigned office. In the spring-tide of its fortunes the sport of yacht-sailing had no more energetic friend than Lord Belfast. The amateur mania of this country owes to his companionship with it much of the peculiar character which distinguishes its present position and purpose. Yacht building and yacht economy have greatly refined our naval taste. The natural course of progress brought this about in time, no doubt; but it has been anticipated by the example set by our sailing clubs, and these received their first especial impulse and direction from the late Commodore of the Royal Squadron. The Marquis of Donegal secured for sailing the commanding character which it now occupies. As a national sport, in national importance it takes the precedence of all others. It is a school for marine architecture, and a nursery for seamen that the country did not possess before its institution, and the value of which it has learned rightly to estimate. Whether as the head of a leading club devoted to that most popular amusement, or, by the effect of circumstances, removed from that office to which his good services gave him such good claim, Lord Donegal will rank foremost among the worthies in the annals of British yachting.

Will there be a better spirit among the members of the squadron in future than during the season that Lord Donegal was at the helm? or has a discontent overtaken it that from day to day accumulates materials? Mrs. Gore has a passage in "Cecil" that may help us to an answer. . . . "I am already ashore!" (Fr. Reporter) "at this time of day to indulge in a chapter about yachting—now as vulgarised as cracking or steeple-chasing, or any other pastime of the fools. But when I and George the Fourth first indulged in the delicious recreation, regattas were in their infancy, and the high seas a highway for gentlemen. I used to delight in it when one had the Isle of Wight to oneself—but the little knot of the elect which might once be said to be esteemed as one man." . . . . "Surgit amari aliquid?" the million.

The week set in auspiciously: never was there such dog and cat weather as Monday it did not blow, but rain, and fog, and foster the blue devils. The silver Solent was as dark and dismal as the Dead Sea. That the effect might be perfect, a couple of hours before noon, the Royal yacht, Victoria and Albert, swept in her stately manner to her moorings, followed by her tender the Fairy, gay and gamesome as a dolphin. But beyond this the coming festival made no sign. . . . Tuesday broke more auspiciously . . . True, it did not shine, but the clouds were pleasantly chastened—it did not rain—small praise for a day in August, 1848. Long before noon the pier at Ryde was populous with a pleasure company, for it was the first day of the regatta at that port—the usual festival being this arrangement: Tuesday and Wednesday the Royal Victoria Yacht Club's prizes at Ryde; Thursday, the opening of the Squadron matches at Cowes; and Friday again at Ryde. Despite the "pitiless pelting" London had been in her element as well as her amusements which occupying it is not always an agreement. Two varies, obviously from the great metropolis, and not from its May Fair environs, had been screaming in my vacation canards. Both were facts: Hain't every day you see such a lot of nobs." "No, nor of the other sort, neither," responded Jim: "Bless'd if I don't think every tailor in London's here," modulating cautiously over both shoulders, in a subdued voice. "I've seen all mine already." . . . The [illegible] were to have been in two before noon, but by the clear sky all our about qualifications. The Eclipse—delivered in the morning, yes for her own [illegible] ments was one of the first entered. Now the others objected, that, having sailed in a class for vessels under 80 tons, she could not qualify for a class for vessels of 80 tons and upwards for the prize of £50. The point was given against the Eclipse—delivered in the morning, yes for her own ground. The second, for cutters from 15 to 20 tons, brought to the post three of the Royal Thames Yacht Club clippers: course, round the Nab, back to Calshot, round the Brambles, and home to the commencing point—the Royal Yacht Pier. There was now and then a puff of wind, but nothing up to the purpose for a sailing essay. For while the Secret and Prima Donna were together, the Fleur le Marais considerably astern: in this way they rounded the Nab and, 40m., and bore away for the westward. At this moment the roar of the Penetrate's salute announced the approach of her Majesty, and the Fairy, with the Royal standard at the main, appeared close in on the Hampshire shore. The Royal yacht then stood over towards the Penetrate, and having received the cheers of her manned yards, put her helm a-starboard, and bore away for Gosport, whence the Royal party immediately departed for town. Anon the royal salute from the Penetrate, while H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge steamed in the Ondine from Portsmouth to East Cowes. All this was holiday matter; and so was the duck hunt in active operation at Ryde; and so was the [illegible] &c. &c. But the yachting was particularly "slow," in every sense of the term; and it was not till the shades of evening prevailed that the Secret made her appearance, and rounded the winning vessel alone—the second vessel, the 20 Cup, being left to work out of sight of land for this season! There were fireworks in the evening, and the usual accompaniments of a day of festivity—albeit the average might have been below the mean: but is not such the lot of life? . . . . .

Wednesday dawned "heavily with clouds" and fall of gloom, more dispiriting than any former day—no amusement could reconcile it with. The present page gives to the fullest, and perhaps the most interesting time to come could not be contemplated without deep anxiety. The preliminaries of the sport were, of course, confined to those whom they concerned. Nobody went outside their houses who could help it. The [illegible] originally designed for Wednesday, to-day was postponed sine die, and the press turned over to cutters, the property of members of the Royal Victoria Yacht Club. For this, in a stark calm, three starved, viz. the Arrow, the Fairy, and the Gleam, were steamed, in Germany, to a second race—for vessels belonging to any Royal Yacht Club, not exceeding fifteen tons brought seven to the starting vessel; and we will leave them, with the wish that they may have a "breeze." . . . .

The company on the pier was select, especially as to numbers; but the yacht fleet off it was a large one. A couple of hours after noon the rain cleared away, and soon after five a fine rattle of ordnance at Portsmouth and Spithead told of the Queen's approach. Her Majesty came in the Fairy, and remained nearly a quarter of an hour abreast of the pier head. The Fairy then steamed gently through the fleet of yachts, and then made away for Cowes. The vessels kept up the game till dinner-hour. Among the best of the matches was one between the gigs' crews of the Brilliant and Amaranda—won very gallantly by the latter.

The festive hour having concluded, and all eleven P.M., by the blaze of a glorious moon, the town was summoned to witness the finish of the sailing match! It was surely a passing picturesque sight. The trio approached floating onwards as a sea of gold: the Arrow led, and won by some seven or eight minutes; the Eclipse second: the second race the Gleam won. . . . The principal match was a very queer one. In going out westward, the yachts were required to round a mark-boat: and this the Eclipse contrived to do, for the tide ran away with her, and carried her through the Needles! . . . . .

Why should we now our sails unfurl?
There is not breath enough to curl
A maiden's hair.

The gossip during the day ran upon the changes in the Royal Yacht Squadron. It was said—by rumour—that the office of Commodore would be offered to the Marquis of Anglesey, which he would decline, and that Sir Thomas Wilton would then be elected. In the latter event, as soon as the lease of the Squadron House expires—which happens very soon—the Squadron will remove from Cowes, and set up a club-house in the centre of Pyramus, Pall-mall, or some such pleasant." The Isle of Wight has been brought too near to Bloomsbury-square, by reduction of the South-Western Railway! . . . . .

The alkay influence ran all against the Royal Victoria Yacht Club: its exertions merited a better fate. . . . The arrangements were all admirable; and in the Club-house tables groaned beneath cups and vases, and all varieties of costly prizes—from watch the visitors might pick and choose their trophies. . . . .

Tuesday dawned with sunshine and fresh air. The scene was changed to Cowes, and at an early hour the harbour was white with canvass, and a-wing with many-coloured streamers. The Victoria and Albert and the Fairy were dressed with flags, and soon after ten the latter entered the river and warped alongside the Trinity wharf. She brought ashore the crews of both the Royal yachts, to be regaled at the entertainment given in the grounds at Osborne, in honour of the birthday of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. Five minutes before eleven the gun fired from the Royal Squadron House battery, to prepare for the race for her Majesty's Cup, for cutters of the Royal Squadron; and at eleven exactly, with a spanking breeze at west, five went for it, viz. the Arrow, winner of yesterday's cup at Ryde, the Sultana, the Gondola, the Bacchante, and the Vandal. They went out to the eastward, round the Nab; and soon after they had passed Norris, the latitude of the Castle and Royal Squadron House fired a Royal salute, in honour of the auspicious anniversary. On the esplanade at West Cowes there was but a very scanty attendance. The Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary, with their suite, were on the terrace of the Club-house.

The rural fete at Osborne, to which several hundreds of the neighbouring farmers and cottagers were bidden, commenced soon after noon. About the same hour a question of concern to the island was mooted at the Royal marine abode, namely, the removal of the Court to the Highlands. The superintendent of Sennymeer had been summoned to give information as to the fitness of the new Royal residence in Scotland for the reception of its distinguished tenants. Sennymeer has been taken on a lease of 97 years from November last, the owner having built it for the Earl of Aberdeen. It lies fifty miles up the Dee from Aberdeen, and is one of the finest shooting quarters in that district. Previously it was occupied by the late Sir Robert Gordon. . . . .

The start for the yacht squadron race, going west for Lymington, the Arrow leading by half a mile, with a rattling whole-sail breeze. . . . For once we will venture to prophesy, and name the Arrow the winner of her Majesty's Cup. [illegible] . . . . [illegible] . . . . [illegible] . . . .

General Cavaignac was called before the Committee, to express his opinion on the mode of election of the President, which was found to be in accordance with that of the Committee, being favourable to election by universal suffrage. General Lamoricière, Minister of War, was also called to give his opinion respecting the section of the project on the army, and especially on the question of "remplacement," or substitution—that is to say, whether persons drawn by lot to serve in the army shall be privileged to procure another person to serve in their stead. The opinion of General Lamoricière, in accordance with that of the Committee, is adverse to substitution: the effect will be, that the clause, if adopted, will render it compulsory on all persons drawn by lot to serve in the army as private soldiers, no matter what their rank, property, condition, profession, or occupation may be. It is expected that M. Marrast, the reporter of the committee, will present the project to the Assembly on Monday next, and that the discussion upon it will commence on the 28th.

A report was prevalent in the early part of the week, that Gen. Cavaignac, oppressed with the weight of his public duties, had resolved to resign at the end of the present month.

M. Lamartine has addressed a letter to the municipality of Macon, in which, having slightly glanced at the calumnies which his enemies had propagated against him, he says that he hopes soon to ask of them as his only ambition, "a little of that retirement which constitutes the agreeable repose of the mind and heart."

Abd-el Kader is about to be transferred from Pau to the Château of Amboise, in the department of Indre-et-Loire. Orders have been given to have the Château prepared for his reception within a fortnight. In consequence of the ex-Emir's residence at Amboise, a garrison will be established there.

The French Minister of Finance has communicated to the Assembly that the whole of the loan had been subscribed, viz. 13,000,000 francs rente towards the loan of 13,151,900 francs rentes, five per cent., authorised to be contracted by a decree of the National Assembly of the 24th July, 1848.

SPAIN.

In the accounts which have reached us this week, engagements between small bodies of Carlist insurgents and the Queen's troops are reported; but most important being an encounter at Llora, where the insurgents, 1,000 in number, headed by Marshal and other well-known chiefs, were dispersed, after having had forty men killed, several wounded, and many horses captured.

General Antonio Urbistondo has been appointed Captain-General of Navarre and the Basque Provinces, and is to reside alternately at Pamplelna and Vitoria. The Queen having accepted the resignation of General Serrano, has named General Campuzano Captain General of Grenada, and General Valdesoro has succeeded the latter as Captain-General of Valencia.

PORTUGAL.

Advices from Lisbon to the 9th inst. represent Portugal generally as tranquil, although the Government had been in some fear, and had taken extraordinary precautions against the effect of Spanish new.

The Cabinet had carried in the Deputies its plans respecting the revenue applicable to payment of the dividends; but the opposition to return on the 31st. Peers was victorious on the mixed commissions held upon alterations made in two other Ministerial projects.

The clause in the Revenue Bill was intended to provide for the regular remittance monthly to London of 100 contos (£24,000 sterling), by the Board of Public Credit, for deposit in the Bank of England to the credit of the Portuguese Financial Agency in London, to be used in discharging the claims of the English holders of Portuguese Bonds. This project would be of great advantage to the English bondholders, inasmuch as it would prevent those misapplications or misappropriations of funds in Lisbon to the necessities of the State which have so often happened to monies set apart for, and belonging to, the English creditors of Portugal.

The news of the arrest of M. Gonzales Bravo in Madrid had caused considerable sensation in Lisbon.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY AND PIEDMONT. The news of the occupation of Milan by the Austrians, which we briefly noticed last week, has been confirmed. An armistice for forty-five days has been concluded between the Austrians and the Piedmontese, according to the terms of which the territorial divisions are settled as they were before the war, the former fortress established, and the fortress of Peschiera, and the city of Venice given up to the Austrians. This cessation of hostilities will give time for the negotiations which England and France have entered into for a mediation.

The following is a summary of the events immediately preceding the Austrian re-occupation of the capital of Lombardy:—

On the 4th inst. the advanced guard of the Austrians arrived within about two leagues of Milan, the Piedmontese army having on the same day occupied that capital. The Sardinians possessed the natural and artificial advantage, having then three or four pieces of artillery and some hundred prisoners. The next day the Austrians, however soon coming up, presented numbers so imposing that it would have been a madness to attempt resistance. Consequently none were made. There were three courses open to Charles Albert, he might either allow his army to push up in Milan, and await the assault of the Austrians, which would have been inevitable. The destruction of the city, the massacre of its inhabitants, and the remains of his army buried under its ruins, are the events that would have probably ensued. Or, being invested, he might have forced his way out at the point of the bayonet, the loss of life in the meantime being terrible. Or, finally, he might capitulate, obtaining an engagement to respect life and property, and permission for his army to march unmolested to his own frontier. Charles Albert adopted the last course.

A large portion of the inhabitants, who, under the direction of the Republican Committee of Public Safety, had resolved to resist to the death, had thrown up barricades, and had expressed their determination not to admit the Austrians until the city became a heap of ruins, under which they were content themselves to lie; and when the King's resolution to capitulate became known, their rage exceeded all bounds. Followed by the populace, the commander-in-chief, Lazzo Greppi, which was occupied by the King, seized his equipage and broke it in pieces, and fired a volley of muskets at the windows of the palace. The King presented himself to them in person, to remonstrate against their conduct, and to explain to them the real situation in which the capital was placed. They rushed upon him, attempting to seize his person, and to retain him as a hostage. Being rescued by the Piedmontese officers present, they pelted Charles Albert with mud, uttered against him the most gross language, and finally, threatening his life, fired upon his guards. The latter succeeded in extricating the King without firing on the populace.

On the morning of the 5th the gates of the town were opened, and liberty given to all who desired to leave the capital. Immediately the active body of the soldiers, the great majority of the bourgeoisie, and an immense number of persons of all ages, men, women, and children, left with precipitation, some following the march of the Piedmontese army towards Novara, and others taking the road to Italian Switzerland by Como.

On the morning of the 6th, all the barracks and posts within the city were occupied by the Austrian troops.

The articles of the capitulation were as follows: "1. The town shall be respected. 2. So far as it depends upon His Excellency the Marshal, he promises, as to the past, all the consideration that equity requires. 3. The movement of the Sardinian army shall be effected in two days of march, as had already been agreed to by the Generals. 5. In return the Marshal demands the military occupation of the Roman Gate, and the entrance and occupation of the town at noon. 6. The transport of the sick and wounded shall take place in the two days of march. 7. All these conditions are to receive the acceptation of his Sardinian Majesty. 8. His Excellency the Marshal demands the immediate liberation of all the Austrian officers, and the measures that are at present in force."

Signed, August 5, by the Podesta of Milan, and by the chiefs of the staff of the two armies.

The Lombardian troops were concentrating by order of the King at Treate under the direction of Lieutenant-General Olivieri.

Charles Albert issued the following proclamation, the first addressed to his army and the second to his people:—

"Soldiers.—The chances of war have obliged us to re-cross the Ticino. The want of combat under the walls of Milan does honour to your courage. If the want of ammunition has prevented us from continuing the defence as we ardently desired to do, it is certain that the retreat has cost the enemy dear. Courage, soldiers! oppose yourselves quickly and energetically. I will have the most severe discipline observed, and every infraction of it shall be punished with the greatest rigour. The police must be better arranged, and private property be invariably respected. In difficult times your self-abnegation and your virtues are more necessary. The cause of Italian independence that we have undertaken to sustain is most noble and holy. Past ages have glided for it, and now the popular will pronounces itself for our freedom unanimously. The days of adversity will pass, and the right will triumph over brute force. Let us not despair, but let every one do his duty. Vigerano, Aug. 7."

"My dear People,—The fate of war, which at first did not cease to smile on the valour of our brave army, has become adverse to us by the fatality of numerous circumstances, and has obliged us to retreat before the enemy. In this movement we were influenced by consideration for the beautiful capital of Lombardy, and, persuaded that we should find it abundantly supplied, we were determined to use all our efforts for its defence. All our troops were brought under the walls, ready to make a vigorous resistance, when we learned that they were in want of money, provisions, and ammunition, whilst ours were nearly all expended. What aggravated our situation was that the large park of artillery had been also carried towards Piacenza, and we could not obtain it, the road being intercepted by the enemy. Thus situated, the first necessity was to save Milan and the army, and to spare a useless effusion of blood. We have attained this end by the capitulation on the terms that have been published by us, the passage beyond the Ticino should be left free, and the lives and property of the Milanese be secured as much as possible. It is thus, my dear people, that the army has retained its courage. If destiny has refused it the realisation of the high end of its generous mission, it has, nevertheless, rendered itself illustrious by skill and warlike conduct, and acquired a name by its fatigues and heroism, and it remains feared, and still capable of opposing, against every danger, the very energy. Receive it, you who participate in the glory it has acquired, and render the feelings of its misfortunes less sensible by your fraternal smiles. In its ranks are the princes, my sons; into its ranks I will myself re-enter, ready as we all are to make new sacrifices, to endure new fatigues, and give our lives for our loved native land.—Vigerano, Aug. 7.

All accounts concur in describing the distracted state of things that immediately succeeded the surrender of Milan. The Piedmontese soldiers were arriving in scattered and disorganised bands on the frontiers of Piedmont, in a state of complete destruction and prostration, cursing their chiefs, and charging them with acts of the most culpable malversation. The number of Milanese and Venetians who arrived at Turin from hour to hour seeking an asylum was incalculable; every available roof was crowded with them. These unhappy fugitives declared that the terms of the capitulation were scorned and derided by the Austrians, who the moment they entered the capital gave themselves up to pillage and the most horrible scenes of barbarism of which any idea could be formed. While these disasters were in progress at Milan, General Welden, who had raised the siege of Venice, crossed the Po, and proceeded to Modena, whence he issued a proclamation to the people of Romagna, announcing that he had received orders from Field-Marshal Radetzky to occupy all the legations, to purge them from brigands, and to restore order with 20,000 men and sufficient artillery; and in case the people intended to resist, he reminded them of the smoking ruins of Brescia.

At Turin, when the calamitous news was made known by an official bulletin published on the 7th, it caused great consternation. The populace, excited as was said on the occasion, by persons assembling in front of the palaces of Government relating to the maintenance of public tranquillity in the capital and its province. A third named commissioners charged with taking the necessary measures for mobilisation of the National Guard. A fourth decreed that the widows and children of those who fell, or have fallen, in fighting for the country are adopted by the State. Lastly, there was an appeal, signed by the Minister of War, calling upon all able men not comprised in the reserve lately called under arms to enrol themselves as volunteers. The Committee of Public Defence of Turin had ordered the examination of the fortifications of the city, the verification of the arsenal, and the construction of the fort of Castellette, where the Austrian prisoners were to be received. It had ordered also passports to be refused to all those who wanted to leave the town without sufficient cause, and invited those who had already left to return on pain of a fine; and taken other measures for enrolment, &c., required by the situation.

A report prevailed during the week of Milan having been reduced to ashes by the Austrians; but it has not been confirmed, and seems to have originated in the fact of the Litta and Borromeo palaces having been plundered and burnt by some of the mob, on the evacuation of the city by the Piedmontese.

Charles Albert had arrived at Alessandria on the morning of the 13th instant.

The Ministry at Turin having resigned, the King had charged M. Merlo, Vice-President of the Chamber of Deputies, together with Count de Revel, to form a Cabinet.

The Freemantene Gazette of the 12th instant states that the conditions of peace proposed by Austria are the following:—"The definitive union with Sardinia of the duchies of Parma and Piacenza, in return for a payment of 27,000,000 lire. The Austrians would abandon Peschiera, but the artillery and arms would be restored to them. The abdication of the King; and the resignation of Colombiano, Minister without a portfolio." The latter condition is said to have been dictated by the King of Naples.

ROME.—The state of the "Eternal City" has been, for some time past, very disturbed, in consequence of some designing men working upon the passions of the mob by making it appear to them that the Pope was very supine in his opposition to the Austrian sway in Italy. In consequence of the menacing attitude of the Austrians on the northern frontier of the Roman States, the Chambers, on the 1st inst., voted an address to the Pope, praying that instant measures might be taken for the protection of Italian independence, and stating that it was necessary instantly to enrol volunteers, raise supplies, and invite foreign aid. This address passed the Upper House with slight opposition, and was presented by a deputation in the evening.

The Pope, in reply, issued an edict, declaring his intention to defend the Romagna to the utmost.

This edict, and the subsequent choice of a new Ministry, produced more tranquillity; the Guards were dismissed from the Chigi Palace, and the agitators broke up their sitting. The new Ministry was composed of Corboli Bussi, Foreign Affairs; Count Fabbri, Interior; Laure Lauri, Finance; Campello, War; Galletti, Police; Sturbenetz, Public Work.

In the interim the Chambers had sanctioned the following measures:—The raising of 12,000 foreign legionaries. The mobilisation of all the civic guards. The appointment of an experienced General enjoying public confidence. The enrolment of volunteers throughout the State. A loan of four million of scudi to meet the expenses. An address to the Parliaments of Tuscany, Sardinia, and Naples, inviting them to be united for the safety of Italy.

Momentous events, however, marched with a most rapid pace on the frontier, which had been crossed by the Austrian General Welden on the 8th, 9,000 troops under his command. He advanced to Bologna, which he entered; and on the 9th inst. laid a heavy contribution upon the city, and to secure its payment required hostages. This demand gave great offence to the populace, and the tocsin was sounded. A dreadful conflict ensued, but the details are not given. The Bolognese, however, captured 27 of the enemy's troops, and drove the main force out of the city. Shortly afterwards the Austrian artillery commenced bombarding the town; two of the palaces were soon in flames, and the faubourg pillaged and burned. The Austrians lost 40 men killed and 30 prisoners; the Bolognese 15 killed and wounded.

The diplomatic corps at Florence, having heard of these hostilities, drew up a protest, which they forwarded to the Austrian General, urging him, by all the laws of humanity and the maxims of civilisation, to cease shedding any more blood.

GERMAN STATES

FRANKFORT.—In the National Assembly of the Confederation, on the 12th instant, the question whether the districts of Trent and Roveredo should be detached from the Germanic Confederacy or not was the subject of debate, and it was decided in the negative. The Assembly then took into consideration the report of the international committee concerning the war of Austria in Italy. The Assembly decided to refer the report of the commission and all the motions on the subject to the central power. The Assembly afterwards took into the question of the insurporation of Istria into the Confederation, that should also be referred to the central power. The public galleries in the locale of the constituent assembly have been clipped of their fair proportions in the space of a number of spectators, the "sovereign people" in those galleries having of late taken a more active part in the proceedings of the Assembly than parliamentary usage warrants.

The Administrator has at last succeeded in completing his Cabinet, and the following is a list of it which he has sent to the National Assembly:

The Prince of Leiningen, President of the Council; M. Duckwitz, Minister of Commerce; MM. Mevissen and Fallati, Under-Secretaries; M. Beckerath, Minister of Finance; M. Mathy, Under-Secretary; M. Heckscher, Minister of Foreign Affairs, MM. De Gagern and Briegled, Under-Secretaries; M. Robert de Mesnil, Minister of Justice; M. Wiedemann, Under-Secretary; M. De Schmerling, Minister of the Interior; MM. Bassermann and Von Wurth, Under-Secretaries.

With the exception of the Prince of Leiningen, who brought himself into notice some time ago by the publication of a pamphlet upon German unity, and M. Beckerath, the only Prussian, and a very distinguished speaker in the United Diet at Berlin last year, none of these gentlemen are much known to the world.

HANOVER.—According to a statement of Count Bernigsen, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to a popular deputation that had waited on him, on the 8th instant, with a petition, the Hanoverian cabinet entered into communication and the central executive in Frankfort, but, on the contrary, the most friendly relations

PRUSSIA.

Advices from Berlin of August 13 mention that the statement of the renewal of the negotiations with Denmark, with the consent of the central Executive in Frankfort, having taken place, had been all but officially contradicted. There is in office making no secret of the matter. It was added, however, that the Central Executive required the maintenance of German troops in the two duchies—a condition that would give umbrage to the Danes, provided it were fully carried out; but the general impression was that Prussia would considerably modify it, and thereby render it more palatable. The result of the recent discussion in the Prussian Assembly at Berlin, respecting some excesses of the military, had given general satisfaction to the citizens. The declaration on the part of that assembly against the retrograde and anti-citizen tendencies of certain officers in the army, was greatly extolled. They were called upon by the legal representatives of their country either to submit to the new order of things, and to enter into it in the spirit of the times, or to withdraw altogether from the army. The Assembly had negatived a proposition having in view the modification of the corps of constables. It had been understood that that question was considered a cabinet one, so that the rejection of the motion by a majority of 10 to 102 might be set down as an indirect vote of confidence in Ministers. Meantime, the constables were as unpopular as ever; but it was hoped that the comparatively large number of members of the Assembly who were hostile to them, at its present commencement, would disappear, to display greater moderation and forbearance than they had hitherto manifested. Several persons had been arrested on the charge of having distributed a revolutionary catechism.

The Democratical Society of Cologne had forwarded a strong address to the National Assembly in favour of Polish nationality. On the 11th the Assembly voted their president a salary of 2000 thalers per month, and rendered its acceptance obligatory.

AUSTRIA

On the 8th instant the Emperor of Austria and the Imperial family left Innspruck for Vienna, where they were expected to arrive on the 12th.

The opening of the Diet of the 9th, the minister, Doblhof, made a speech on some important declarations on the subject of the relations between Austria and Hungary. It is known that conferences on this subject and on the question of the difference between Hungary and Croatia, took place before the departure of Archduke John for Frankfort. Doblhof said in his speech: "The ministry has never known anything of the negotiations between the Hungarian and Croatian delegates and Archduke John. Count Batthyany has, however, sent a note, in which he put the following questions: First whether the Austrian Ministry is willing to allow the full effect of the pragmatic sanction in respect of the union of the Hungarian crown; and, secondly, whether the present ministry meditates preserving the rights of the crown, as regards the pragmatic sanction, in the actual differences with the countries bordering on Hungary? The ministry has answered to the first question, that the pragmatic sanction in its entire nature has never been questioned, and it has determined to give it effect. And with regard to the second point, the ministry has declared that in so far as the claims of the Croats were known, it was not their intention to separate themselves from the Hungarian crown, and that they also rested their pretensions on the pragmatic sanction. The ministry also replied that internal peace was only to be attained by the complete union of all nationalities. As yet (added Doblhof) no answer has been given to this reply."

The amicable settlement of the Hungarian-Croatian question was confidently looked for at Vienna. The Hungarian Prime Minister, Count Batthyany, and the Ban of Croatia, who have been entrusted with full powers by the Hungarian and Croatian Diets respectively, were shortly expected in Vienna for the settlement of this question.

HUNGARY

According to intelligence from Pesth, of August 4, the war between the Hungarians and the southern Sclavonians still continued. The latter, who had plenty of cannon, and who were assisted by a corps of 3000 regularly disciplined borderers, and assembled in great numbers in the neighbourhood of St. Thomas. They had issued a circular, setting forth their grievances against the Hungarians.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

The affairs of Schleswig remain much in the same uncertain condition as before. The two belligerent armies stand close to one another, and ready for the fight.

The latest accounts from Hadersleben and Apenrade are full of the movements of the troops.

The Danes of Jutland have not been passed, but a division of 12,000 strong lies within a short march of them, with a reserve of 10,000 men a day's march in the rear.

It is stated that Prussia has again been commissioned by the Imperial Cabinet at Frankfort to conclude another armistice with Denmark. The commission is so far limited, that the conditions of the former abortive armistice should not be thought of, but that both duchies shall be occupied by General Wrangel and his forces. M. v. Usedon has been appointed to conduct the negotiations with Denmark.

UNITED STATES.

Advices to the 2nd instant, from New York, have been received during the week.

Gen. Taylor has accepted the nomination made of him as candidate for the Presidency by the Whig Convention at Philadelphia.

The Oregon Bill was reported, with amendments, in the House of Representatives on July 31st. The most important amendment was the striking out of the veto power over territorial legislature acts, proposed to be vested in the Government of Oregon.

In Congress the attempt to pass a sort of compromise bill for the government of the new territories has been defeated—the House of Representatives refusing even to entertain or discuss the bill which had passed the Senate, and of which the leading feature was to permit the introduction of slavery in New Mexico and California. It seems pretty well settled now that no bill looking to such a result can obtain the assent of the House of Representatives.

The state of the commercial and money market is not improved since the advices by the preceding steamer.

The prospect of an abundant crop throughout the Union continues good. Some damage has been made of late from rain, but only in a few localities, there had been, however, more rain in the New Orleans districts than in the Atlantic States.

MEXICO.

The news this week is not of any particular interest. The dates from the city of Mexico are to the 14th ult., where the Government of Herrera seemed to be pursuing its course without interruption or disturbance. The intelligence respecting a battle, or rather succession of skirmishes near Guanajuato, between Bustamente, commanding the Government forces, and Paredes, with Padres Jarauta at the head of the revolters, has been confirmed. The victory is claimed for both sides, but neither appears to have done much in the way of fighting.

The American troops have all left Mexico, which is thus again delivered up to its own laws and rulers. Among other effects of this is the re-enactment of the old Mexican tariff.

THE CIVILIZATION OF PORTUGAL.—On Sunday, the 31st July, a disturbance took place at the thronged arena at the Campo Santa Anna Bull-fights, at Lisbon, which for a time threatened seriously to compromise public tranquility. A Spaniard, newly introduced to the circle, had been advertised as the performer of sundry novel and agile feats, one being that upon the first rush of the bull into the ring, he was to spring upon its back and then disable it. The slight difference, however, in the pleasing programme, and the fact as it occurred was, that instead of the cavalier's jumping upon the bull, the bull first knocked his antagonist down, and then jumped upon him. The disappointed spectators set up loud and angry cries, and the baffled matador first receiving a savage beating at the hands of the populace, one being that upon the first rush of the bull into the ring, he was to spring upon its back and then disable it. The slight difference, however, in the pleasing programme, and the fact as it occurred was, that instead of the cavalier's jumping upon the bull, the bull first knocked his antagonist down, and then jumped upon him. The disappointed spectators set up loud and angry cries, and the baffled matador first receiving a savage beating at the hands of the populace, one being that upon the first rush of the bull by others while he was thus kicked and beaten), was then handed over to the soldiers, who also cruelly maltreated the fainting wretch. The spectators relenting, expressed their disapprobation and disgust at this cowardly and savage proceeding, when, from some unexplained cause, the military guard and a portion of the lookers-on commenced a contention; on the part of the police soldiery swords were drawn, a miserable aborter of an affect seeing the example, sabre cuts were dealt out right and left, and severe wounds were received by many. The prompt exertion of the authorities to restore order, and, from after precautions taken by the military, it would appear that no attack on them was anticipated. Fortunately no further collision occurred.

THE CHESTER AND HOLYHEAD RAILWAY.

HOLYHEAD is again likely to resume its importance as a packet station for steamers plying to Dublin; the Chester and Holyhead line of railway, opened on the 1st inst., affording increased facilities of communication between Holyhead and Dublin, which have been usurped by Liverpool since the formation of the Railway from London to the latter place.

The Chester and Holyhead line will, when completed, shorten the time occupied in the journey from London to Dublin by about five hours, as it is anticipated the railway journey from London to Holyhead will take about eight hours, and the steam-packets will be about four hours on their voyage. The Dublin line is a very important one, in shortening the distance between the chief city in the British Isles and the important capital of Ireland, and adds another power to the Government in the case of contingency.

The Chester station is the longest of all the railway stations in England, and, as our Illustration shows, is a very noble pile of buildings, in the Italian style. It is a joint station for several railways, and its origin may be thus briefly explained:—

In the autumn of 1846 it was agreed by the London and North-Western, the Chester and Holyhead, the Shrewsbury and Chester, the Grand Junction and Birkenhead, and the Birkenhead, Lancashire, and Cheshire Junction Railway Companies, that they should build a general station at Chester, each of these companies having a separate line there. The needful arrangements were entrusted to Mr. Robert Stephenson, and the details were so far decided on, that, in the summer of 1847, the contracts were let, and in August the first stone was laid. On the 1st of August, 1848, the station, though not quite complete, was opened for traffic.

The station consists of a facade facing the city of Chester, 850 feet long, built of dark-coloured, white, and yellow bricks, with stone facings and dressings. The centre of this building, which is two stories in height, contains on the ground-floor the usual offices, waiting and refreshment rooms; and, on the upper floor, offices for the general manager, and for the Chester and Holyhead and Shrewsbury and Chester Companies, in which the business connected with the whole of their lines is conducted. The number of offices and rooms exceeds fifty.

The wings are formed by projecting arcades, with four arches each, and are appropriated to private and public vehicles waiting the arrival of trains.

On the inner side of the office buildings, a large platform extends, which is chiefly lined by the train-sheds, and is 700 long by 20 feet wide; this and the lines of rails are covered by an iron roof, 60 feet in span, which is one of the most elegant yet constructed; and, as the height of the walls on which it rests is 14 feet from the platform, the whole shed has a very imposing effect.

Behind this shed, and which is divided from it by a series of pillars and arches, is a shed for spare carriages, 450 feet long by 82 wide, also covered with a beautifully constructed iron roof.

There are likewise two sheds for arrival trains, each 290 feet long by 54 feet wide, in line with the office buildings, and filling the space between the principal shed and the shed for vehicles.

All the sheds are abundantly lighted by skylights in the day, and by gas at night, which is manufactured expressly for the purpose close at hand. Connected with the gas-works there is also a spacious reservoir, from which an engine pumps water into a large tank at the rate of 400 gallons per minute; the tank being placed so high as to command all the upper floors of the station.

The goods shed, which is only just commenced, will be a building 300 feet long by 170 feet broad; and will be peculiarly arranged for facilitating the transfer of goods from one company to another, which will be done more extensively at this than at most other stations. The goods traffic is entirely removed from the passenger department; and thus an annoyance greatly felt at the Victoria Station, in Manchester, at the large station at Derby, and at other places, is prevented.

In consequence of one of the public roads of the city crossing the rails close to the station, it was necessary to erect a bridge across the line: this is of handsome design, built with brick and stone, like the station, the roadway being carried on iron beams. The cost of this bridge was £15,000.

From Chester the line of railway skirts along the side of the river Dee; afterwards, its course, till near Conway, is close by the sea-shore, and again it wends its way by the sea-side in Beaumaris Bay, near Penmaen Mawr. The line of the railway being thus so close to the mighty ocean, much of the beautiful scenery of North Wales is avoided; but, by this route, the undertaking was rendered easier of construction than it otherwise would have been. There are many beautiful points of scenery on the line, and many glimpses of the bright blue of mountains towering high above the valleys whence they rise; and there are ruins also to be noticed by the way-side, telling of iron times gone by, and adding historical interest to the charms of nature. Flint Castle is one of these memorials of other ages (as we give a sketch of it in connexion with the railway), and is conspicuous object from it. It forms the subject of one of our Illustrations, and its historical associations is peculiarly rich, one of the most celebrated events connected with it being the deposition of Richard II. Flint Castle is but a mere shell, only the grey ruined walls attesting its former strength and grandeur. When it was built is uncertain—some authors placing the date of its erection in 1157, and others in 1277.

At Holywell is a very handsome station, of good design and character, and from the railway may be seen some few remains of Basingwerk Abbey. The far-famed Holy Well of St. Winifrede is worthy of a pilgrimage: it is so really beautiful in its architectural embellishments, and well repays a halt at the station to go and visit it. Pity that huge factories, some of them by the by untenanted and falling to decay, should blemish so fair a spot as Holywell with their nasty black chimney-shafts and thick smoke. Still, the Holy Well is in all its purity of waters, ever gushing, and brilliantly clear as possible; and it is visited by numbers of persons who test its efficacy in restoring health and making the crooked straight; votive crutches, hand-barrows, &c. evidencing the miracles wrought there, and strengthening the belief in the efficiency of the icy cold waters of St. Winifrede's Well in curing every ill which flesh is heir to.

Mostyn and Prestaign have each nice little stations; and Rhyl, a fashionable watering-place for the North Wallians and people of Liverpool to flock to, has a very good one.

The station at Abergele is close to the sea-side, and at a little distance from the town. Its situation is very beautiful, the Clwydian range of hills forming a most picturesque and varied background to it; and Gwrych Castle, the elegant seat of Lloyd Bamford Hesketh, Esq., adding a peculiar charm to the whole.

We shall, at the earliest opportunity, complete our illustration of this very important line.

LAUNCH OF THE "BLENHEIM," EAST INDIAMAN, 1600 TONS BURTHEN, AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

THE "BLENHEIM" EAST INDIAMAN.

This fine ship, of 1600 tons burthen, has lately been launched from the building yard of Messrs. J. and W. Smith, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Though destined for the East India trade, this splendid vessel is timbered and fastened in all respects like her Majesty's first-class frigates, and is equal to a complement of forty-eight broadside (32-pounders) guns, besides stern and bow chasers. Her dimensions are as follows:—Extreme length, 205 feet; ditto breadth, 42 feet 6 inches; height between decks, 7 feet 2 inches; measurement tonnage, 1489. She is a noble model of naval architecture, and her accommodation and convenience for passengers are unrivalled. She is the largest merchant-ship in Europe, and one of the only two that can at once act as a first-class frigate, if needed for that purpose.

CAPTAIN FREDERICK MARRYAT, R.N., C.B.

Another bright ornament of literature has been taken from amongst us. Captain Marryat, the Smollett of the nineteenth century, died on the 9th instant, at Langham, in Norfolk, in his 56th year. He had been long seriously unwell, from the bursting of a succession of blood-vessels; and the recent loss of his eldest son in the Avenger, is supposedtohave accelerated the fatal result.

THE LATE CAPTAIN MARRYAT, R.N., C.B.

Captain Marryat was the son of Mr. Marryat, the well-known banker of the city of London. At an early age he entered the Royal Navy; served, while midshipman of the Impersesue, in the operations conducted by Lord Cochrane on the coast of Catalonia, and was in the attack on the French squadron in Aix Roads in 1809. Subsequently he formed part of the Walcheren expedition; and, when lieutenant of the Newcastle, in her barge cut out four vessels from Boston Bay in 1814. In the Burmese war he commanded the Ariadne, and was, for some time, the senior officer on the station.

His literary fame, which is considerable, rests on his "Peter Simple," "Percival Keene," "Jacob Faithful," and "Mr. Midshipman Easy"—sea novels of unrivalled popularity, so replete with spirit and humour as to bear no invidious comparison with the admirable writings of the author of "Peregrine Pickle."

Rear-Admiral Sir George F. Seymour, C.B. and G.C.H., late Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific, has contributed £20 to the Royal Naval Benevolent Society, and £5 towards liquidating the £800 costs of the two actions recently tried at Croydon; £435 of which sum have been collected through circulars addressed to the naval service.

Precaution against the Spread of Cholera.—The Government, to prevent the cholera from spreading to our shores, in the event of any cases occurring in ships afloat, have ordered the Benbow and Devonshire, old line-of-battle ships, to be immediately prepared as hospital ships, to receive cholera patients from merchant vessels; and another ship, the Iphigenia, is also to be fitted as a cholera hospital ship, should necessity require additional accommodation.

ANNUAL CONGRESS OF THE BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION (WORCESTER).

(From our own Reporter.)

The fifth Congress of this Society commenced at Worcester on Monday last, under the distinguished patronage of Lords Lyttelton and Southwell, and the principal gentlemen of the county. The Very Rev. the Dean of Worcester, the Canons, and the Mayor and Corporation, exerted themselves to the utmost to offer a kind and hospitable reception to the Association. Every place of interest in the city and neighbourhood has been thrown open to the members and visitors.

Among the principal attractions of the week, the temporary Museum has formed a conspicuous feature, which has occupied the Rooms of the Natural History Society. Here have been exhibited a great variety of important manuscripts in the possession of Lord Lyttelton, including an original letter of Queen Elizabeth, endorsed, "A letter of Queen Elizabeth to my grandmother Pagett, upon the death of my grandmother Compton Lyttelton." It is a curious and characteristic effusion, and runs thus:—"A Memorial. Elizabeth R. Cal to your mynde good Kate how hardly we princes can broke in crossing of our comandes. How yreful wil the hiest powr be, may you be sure, when murmure shal be made of his plesainge wyl. Let nature therefore not hurt your selfe, but give place to the givar. And thogh this lesson be from a sely vikar, yet is hit sent fro' a lovinge souveraine." This letter is entirely in the handwriting of the Queen.

Other manuscripts curiously illustrative of Ancient Manners and Customs have been forwarded. The Rev. Mr. Cooper exhibited a very curious collection of Swan Marks of the time of Queen Elizabeth. Mr. Gutch contributed splendid specimens of illuminations of the 14th and 15th centuries. The Hon. and Rev. W. Lyttelton exhibited some valuable early printed books. The Mayor and Corporation permitted some of their most important documents to be placed in the Museum. The Clothmakers' Company exhibited their ancient and richly decorated charter; but the quantity of manuscripts of all kinds gathered here renders enumeration tedious

The formation of this Museum does credit to the energies of the Managing Committee of the Association. Great towns are never remarkable for their preservation of past records: the necessity of business, or the changes consequent on altered habits, are fatal to relics of the past; and it s only by extensive loca contributions, that so curious a collection of scattered antiques can be brought together. Among the most interesting are those contributed by Mr. Eaton, which were discovered in removing the mound known as "the Castle-hill," situated near the Cathedral, some years since. A great variety of articles of Roman, Saxon, and the mediæval periods were found here; Samian pottery and fine tiles, indicating the locality of the "world's conqueror," with ornamental pins and fibulæ, showing the beauty and delicacy of their arts, were discovered on this spot. Our cuts exhibits some of these articles: Roman fibulæ, of much beauty and variety; an early Celt, contemporary with them, or probably earlier; a bronze bell, which bears a curious and remarkable similarity to many which remain in Ireland, as the much-prized relics of their early saints. Mr. Eaton also contributed some curious marble sculptures of the fourteenth century, found in pulling down the church of St. Michael, situated in front of the Cathedral of Worcester. They represent the Virgin and Child, the Coronation of the Virgin, and a Female Saint kneeling at a desk; they were probably destroyed at the Reformation; and, although remarkably beautiful works of art, were ruthlessly fractured, and built up in the walls as common materials.

A singular spear head, dredged from the Severn in 1844, was exhibited by Jabez Allies, Esq., as well as a beautiful torque found at Perdiswell; a ring with a talismanic inscription; and a gun lock, a relic of Worcester fight.

Of ancient seals many curious examples were contributed, ranging from the Norman period to the middle of the seventeenth century; original dies for the medals to commemorate the Restoration of Charles the Second, the Accession of George the First, &c.

The museum of W. U. Rolfe, Esq., of Sandwich, furnished forth a rich and beautiful variety of Roman antiquities, including fibulæ and pins, plain and enamelled; armlets, bulla, portions of helmets, bosses of shields, and a great quantity of miscellanea, valuable and instructive to the student of Roman life. A magnificent Celtic sword, discovered at Ipswich in the most perfect preservation, was sent by W. S. Fitch, Esq.; and a curious collection of antiquities, found at Wesley Castle, in Northfield, Worcestershire, by J. F. Ledsam, Esq., the High Sheriff. Mr. Planché exhibited a singular relic of the famous Bianca Capella, a richly-ornamented scissor-case and its contents, together with her miniature, dated 1560. The Clothiers' Company contributed a magnificently embroidered pall, very similar in its character to that belonging to the Fishmongers' Company of London. It was richly decorated with figures of saints and angels, and stories from Scripture, and appears to have been a work of the time of Henry the Seventh. The original charter of the company was also shown, as well as the old processional shields borne by them

The collection of brasses of all kinds contributed by various persons was extensive enough to cover not only the walls of the Museum, but the large Assembly-Room at the Guildhall, where the principal meetings were held.

The proceedings commenced on Monday evening at 8 o'clock, with an address from the President, Lord Albert Conyngham, in which his Lordship dwelt on the utility of such meetings, and the gratifying reflection that through their agency much information was disseminated, and a proper regard for the relics of our forefathers maintained. He spoke cheeringly of the prospects of the Association, and its general good success since the first meeting at Canterbury; and remarked on the fertile field Winchester and its neighbourhood offered to the lover of archæology.

After the President's address, a paper was read from the High Sheriff of Worcester, communicating some particulars of the antiquities in his possession, which were discovered at Wesley Castle, and now deposited in the temporary Museum in Worcester.

This paper was followed by one "on Early Monumental Effigies previous to the time of King John, as illustrative of that Monarch's in Winchester Cathedral," by F. W. Fairholt, F.S.A.; in which he traced the history of Sepulchral Figures from their earliest appearance on coffin-lids, and gave curious instances of the examination of ancient stone coffins, which proved that the figures above exactly corresponded, to the minutest point, with the body within, which was usually habited in full costume. King John's remains were found to be exactly inhumed in Royal dress, as given in the sculpture above. The paper concluded with some remarks on the interest and beauty of these early sculptures, and an appeal for their preservation to all who had them in their care.

A paper by Thomas Wright, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., on the Romantic Materials of History, as illustrated by the Autobiography of Egwin, Bishop of Worcester, concluded the evening.

TUESDAY.

On Tuesday morning the members of the Association and visitors met at the Guildhall, and, accompanied by the Mayor and Corporation in their robes of office, attended by the sword-bearer and other civic functionaries, proceeded to the cathedral, at the door of which they were met by the dean and the clergy; and advancing to the interior, divine service was performed in that effective and beautiful manner for which this cathedral has been noted. Service concluded, Mr. Ashpitel delivered a very learned and instructive lecture on the peculiarities of this ancient structure; in which he particularly dwelt on the probability that the crypt was a portion of the original Saxon work, and noticed the tendency of architectural students to deny the existence of any portion of the work of our early ancestors in our cathedrals and churches; remarking on the fact of our ecclesiologists having at one time so strong a tendency for calling all circular arches Saxon that they have now gone to the other extreme and denied the existence of any portion of Saxon work. He strongly fortified his position by remarking the absence in Norman works, still existing on the Continent, of the peculiarities existing in the buildings we so strenuously insist are Norman: and noticed the improbability of the Normans destroying the buildings which had been erected with so much cost and care immediately before the Conquest, and which no change of taste or religion could have rendered necessary. After his lecture in the hall, he proceeded to the Cathedral, and there accompanied the members entirely over the edifice, enforcing his views and explaining its history in a most lucid manner.

The remainder of the afternoon was devoted to miscellaneous visits to the various antiquities of the city.

In the evening, J. M. Gutch, Esq., F.S.A., read a curious and interesting paper on Queen Elizabeth's visit to Worcester, compiled from manuscripts in the possession of the Clothiers' Company.

This was followed by Mr. Halliwell's paper on the ancient custom of Catherning as formerly practised in Worcester. This derived its rather peculiar name from St. Catherine, on whose festival day the country children paraded the villages to gather contributions of fruit or money, singing rhymes from door to door to excite the gifts of the more bountious

Mr. Fiaudé followed, with an extremely learned and amusing paper on certain peculiarities in Ladies' Head-dresses of the fourteenth century. He illustrated the various fashions by a large collection of drawings by himself from early effigies and illuminated manuscripts; quoting the mediæval poets and writers, who had described or satirised the extravagance of this portion of female costume.

C. R. Smith, F.S.A., concluded the evening with a most interesting communication by Dr. Lukes, of Sepulchral Antiquities in the Channel Islands, illustrated by many beautiful drawings, which satisfactorily proved that the stone circles, Druid altars, and cromlech were really sepulchral, and even used for various deposits. This paper was one of the most curious and valuable of the series communicated to the Association.

WEDNESDAY.

This day was devoted to Sudeley Castle, the interesting residence of T. and W. Dent, Esqrs. This structure was erected by Ralph Lord Botetier, in the reign of Henry VI. Sir Thomas Seymour retired here, in the time of Edward VI., with Catherine Parr, the Queen Dowager, whom he had married on the death of the King, her father. Her second husband treated her very ill, and she died in much conjugal misery, and was buried in Sudeley Chapel; her grave and coffin being found in the chapel, which had been totally ruined in the civil war of the seventeenth century. Upon opening the coffin the body was found in perfect preservation; but, on exposure to the air, it turned in part to dust. Not content with destroying the chapel, the Republicans, to revenge themselves on the owner, George Lord Chandos, who had been a staunch supporter of the Crown, dismantled the walls and habitable portion of the building, reducing the noble mansion to a state of ruin. The chapel is still a shell, but the house has been now rendered an elegant residence by the exertions of the present owners, who have added many of the most curious and valuable pictures which formerly decorated the walls of Strawberry Hill. Here the Archæological visitors were entertained on a scale of the most elegant profusion.

In the evening, J. M. Gutch, Esq., read a paper on the Clothiers' Company of Worcester, compiled from the documents belonging to that body, and curiously illustrative of their ancient state. Notes on the study of monumental brasses followed, by Mr. J. G. Waller, whose valuable work on that subject ranks among the best of our parkerarian publications. Mr. Fairholt then gave an extempore account of the curious and extensive series of rubbings from brasses which had been sent to the Congress by the Rev. G. Y. Osborne, Mr. Sprague, and others; the meeting concluding with the details of the discovery of Romano-British Antiquities at Abergwenny, by J. White, Esq., and an account of a Roman inscription discovered at Kempsey by the Rev. E. M. Rudd.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1848.

TOWARDS the close of every Session, there is always, whatever party may be in power, an attack upon, and a defence of, the Foreign policy of the Government. The close of the present Session offers no exception; nor was it to be desired that it should, when the state of the European continent is so critical, and when an attack upon the conduct of our Foreign Minister is valuable, as leading to explanations which might not otherwise have been rendered. The usual attack upon this occasion was made by Mr. Disraeli. He displayed the cleverness and bitterness which are always expected from him—the one as much as the other. Mr. Disraeli did not on this, as on previous occasions, run over the whole of the Continent to find vulnerable points in the policy of Lord Palmerston; but leaving Spain, that old and sore subject, and even Germany and France, he confined himself to the affairs of Italy. He complained of the mission of Lord Minto to Florence, Turin, Rome, and of Naples. He complained also of the alleged interference of Great Britain betwixt the King of Naples and his revolted subjects in Sicily; and treated the joint mediation of France and Great Britain in the affairs of Lombardy, as if its natural result would be war, and not peace; mixing up with these various statements an amount of hostile feeling towards the French Government and people which we regret to observe in so sensible a man as Mr. Disraeli, and which, were they largely participated in by the people of this country, could not but have the most injurious effects upon the tranquility of Europe. Happily, the British people, however much they may deplore, or however much they may approve of the events that have taken place in France, are convinced that no greater calamity could happen to the world than a real estrangement betwixt these two great nations. Even Mr. Disraeli confessed as much towards the conclusion of his speech, although the confession was rendered ungracious by his sneers against the present Government of France and the principles which brought it into existence. Lord Palmerston, in his reply, explained the circumstances under which Lord Minto had been requested to mediate and advise in Italy, and vindicated the Government from the charge of undue interference, and from the imputation of having pursued any course that was not only perfectly compatible with the honour of this country, and the best interests of the various states of Italy, but that was not conducive to the great cause of European peace. His Lordship dwelt upon the gratifying fact which had been proved by the events of the last few months, that, within the last half-century, a rapid advance had been made towards the establishment of an enlightened and peaceful policy between nations. The events which have occurred since February, 1848, would have involved Europe in one general conflagration, if they had occurred fifty years earlier; whereas, now, by the cordial union existing between the two greatest nations of Europe, there was every reason to hope and believe that the general peace would not be broken. Altogether, his Lordship's speech was highly satisfactory, and cannot fail to have a good effect both in France and Italy, as well as in this country and through Europe generally.

LORD Morpeth's Health of Towns Bill, after undergoing many mutilations, many postponements, and many hard attacks from the friends and foes of the principle involved in it, has at length passed its final reading in the House of Lords, and awaits but the Royal assent to become law. It is to be deplored, now that the Bill has been carried, that so little good can result from it; and that, while Asiatic cholera has already invaded Central Europe, a measure that might have been rendered effectual for preventing or diminishing its ravages has been so framed as to be positively useless in London, the place most likely to suffer from the scourge, if unhappily it should approach our shores, and so curtailed and tampered with as to be little better than useless in the other large towns of the country. The report of the Registrar-General for the past week gives the number of deaths from English cholera in London as nineteen; while we learn from Berlin that in that city, in the first week in August, fourteen persons fell victims to Asiatic Cholera. It is evident, therefore, that we should look about us, and prepare for the approaching calamity. At Manchester, which is affected by the operations, such as they are, of Lord Morpeth's Bill, a movement has already commenced which may prove useful. The Medical Committee of the Infirmary have recommended the establishment of Cholera Hospitals, provided with a medical staff that shall not only be sufficient for the treatment of the patients within their walls, but for the rendering of advice and assistance to patients in their own houses. Other sanatory precautions will precede these as a matter of course; and the towns of England that neglect to follow the example will subject themselves to the interference of the central authority in Whitehall. London, however, will be left to its own resources, as will Scotland and Ireland—both of which, as well as the metropolis, are unaffected by the measure of Lord Morpeth. It remains to be seen whether our local authorities will prove themselves equal to the emergency.

THE report has been received that her Majesty and Prince Albert's marine excursion this year will extend to Scotland, and that, too, in the vicinity of the Highlands, where the newly-acquired Royal estate is situated

COURT AND HAUT TON.

RETURN OF THE COURT FROM OSBORNE TO TOWN.

On Tuesday the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg and the Princess Elisa of Hohenlohe Langenburg, and attended by the Viscountess Canning, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Colonel Wylde, left her Majesty's marine residence, Osborne, Isle of Wight, at two o'clock in the afternoon, embarked at Osborne Pier in the Fairy, Royal yacht, crossed to Gosport, and travelled to town by a special train on the London and South-Western Railway. On arriving at the Nine Elms station, the august party proceeded in three carriages and four, escorted by a party of Light Dragoons, to Buckingham Palace, where they arrived at half-past four o'clock. The Queen held a Court after her arrival, at Buckingham Palace Monsieur de Beaumont, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the French Republic, had an audience of her Majesty for the purpose of delivering the credentials with which His Excellency was introduced by Viscount Palmerston, G.C.B., her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and conducted by Colonel the Hon. Sir Edward Cust, K.C.H., her Majesty's Master of the Ceremonies. Her Majesty was attended by the Earl of Morton, Lord in Waiting, and Mr. E. Ormsby Gore, Groom in Waiting. Lord John Russell had afterwards an audience of the Queen. Her Majesty and the Royal Palaces, the Prince Albert, the Princess Hohenlohe Langenburg, and the Princess Elisa, honoured the performance at Her Majesty's Theatre with their presence in the evening. The Royal suite consisted of the Viscountess Canning, the Earl of Morton, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, and Colonel Wylde

On Wednesday morning his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, presided at a meeting of the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall, in Somerset House

RETURN OF THE COURT TO OSBORNE

On Wednesday afternoon the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg, and the Princess Elisa of Hohenlohe Langenburg, left town at twenty minutes past three o'clock for her Majesty's marine residence, Osborne, Isle of Wight. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness were conducted to their carriage by the Lord Steward, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Earl of Morton, Mr. Ormsby Gore, and Captain Francis Seymour. The august party left Buckingham Palace in two carriages and four, escorted by a party of Light Dragoons, for the Nine Elms station, and proceeded by a special train to Gosport, where they arrived at the terminus in Clarence Yard at five o'clock. The usual cortège of military and naval officers were there to receive them, and also a guard of honour furnished by the Royal Marine Artillery, under Colonel Gibson. The Royal party embarked with Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, in the state barge, for the Fairy yacht, and in her proceeded to Osborne, under the usual salutes of guns from the garrison, and also from the ships of war in harbour and at Spithead.

HER Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by her suite, arrived at Marlborough House on Tuesday afternoon, from her residence, Bushey House, Bushey Park. Her Majesty honoured the performance at Her Majesty's Theatre with her presence in the evening.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ARREST OF ARMED CHARTISTS IN LONDON

On Wednesday night, in consequence of information received by the Government, Mr. Superintendent Hutt, Inspectors Carter, Evans, Arnold, and Rogers, with nearly 300 of the police, armed with cutlasses, at half-past nine o'clock, marched to the Angel Tavern in Webber-street, kept by Mr. Smith. Mr. Hutt, with a pair of loaded pistols by each side, entered the house, accompanied by a strong body of constables

The moment the police entered a general movement took place on the part of the persons assembled, and Mr. Hutt cried out, "If any man offers the least resistance, I will run him through," at the same time showing his drawn cutlass This had the desired effect, and little or no resistance was attempted. The police then seized fourteen men, and marched them to Clerkenwell, where, upon being searched, pistols loaded to the muzzle, rifles, three-corner daggers, spear-heads, and swords were found upon their persons, in others were boots secreted under the seats on which they had been sitting. Some of them were iron breast-plates, and others had gunpowder, shot, and tow-balls. Under one man no less than 70 rounds of ball cartridge were discovered.

Mr. Superintendent Hutt and Inspector Russell afterwards proceeded to Blue Anchor-yard, York-street, Westminster, where, it was stated, a gang of armed Chartists were waiting to join the other portions of the force, but on their arrival at a procession being formed. On entering the house of a well-known leader, the man and a large pike were found.

Upon the police proceeding to the house of Samuel Morgan, one of the men taken by the Lambeth division, the police found the leg of a chair loaded with lead, and a number of nails driven in at the extremity. Swords and weapons of various kinds have been found at the residences of the other prisoners

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

NATIONAL REFORM LEAGUE.—A public meeting of the electors and non-electors of Marylebone, convened by this Association, was held on Monday evening, in the Portland Rooms, Foley-street. Mr. Nicholay presided, and opened the proceedings in a brief address advocating Reform measures. He then moved the first resolution, which was to the effect that the present position of this country presents a subject for the deep and serious consideration of the community, and requires that some vast and prudent exertions should be immediately made to prevent agitation and restore tranquillity to the nation and prosperity to the people. The resolution was adopted unanimously.—Mr. Rumby then moved a resolution, expressing the opinion of the meeting that Little good could be effected or hoped for but by the united exertions and moral intelligence of electors and people employed in co-operation with full representatives, and that some steps were necessary to secure that co-operation The resolution having been seconded, Lord D. Stuart and Sir B. Hall addressed the meeting respectively on the object sought to be attained by the League. Further resolutions were afterwards passed in favour of the principles of the association; and a few remarks were then delivered by Mr. Kydd, the Chartist, who, while he would not move an amendment, expressed his conviction that the entire principles of the Charter were necessary to be carried out rather than mere partial reforms.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday, a meeting of the governors of management of the affairs of the above hospital was held at the institution. During the past quarter there had been admitted 269 in., and 3363 out-patients; of the accident cases there had been 519, of which 100 had been received as in-patients. The report proceeded to state that during the past year 2,092 indigent sick poor were admitted on the books for relief, at a cost of £2022 14s. 2d.: of these, 1155 were in-patients, and 10,537 were out patients

THE NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY AND THE ENGINE DRIVERS.—On Tuesday evening an adjourned meeting of engine-drivers and firemen who have seceded from the employ of the North-Western Railway Company took place at the Railway Tavern, Hampstead-road, for the purpose of receiving the report of the deputation appointed to wait on members of Parliament. Mr. J. Brown, engine-driver, was again appointed to the chair. The deputation reported that they had waited on the hon. members for Marylebone, at the St. Pancras Vestry-rooms, and that they had subsequently seen Mr. E. Osborne, M.P.; Mr. Hume, M.P., and Lord Dudley Stuart at the House of Commons. Lord Dudley Stuart told them that he had seen Mr. Glyn, the chairman of the company, and on informing the gentleman that he had, with Sir Benjamin Hall, been waited upon by a deputation from the engine-drivers, who represented the firm to be in a most dangerous condition to parties having, and that he intended, therefore, to put some questions to him on the subject, that Mr. Glyn requested he would not do so without giving him notice of the questions he intended to put. The deputation then entered into statements of accidents and delays which had occurred in consequence of the inefficient hands employed on the line as engine-drivers. Mr. B. Osborne urged that the men should do no act which might compromise their character as engine-drivers. All the honourable members expressed their determination to give the matter their most serious consideration. The Chairman then gave a general denial to what Mr. Glyn had stated from his seat in Parliament on the previous evening; and Mr. Marshall and others having read statements of delay on the line said to have resulted from the change of hands, a resolution was come to directing the rules of the clubs to be forwarded to Mr. Glyn and those members of Parliament who had been waited upon by the deputation, in order to disabuse their minds of the statement that the men had resigned in consequence of such influence.—The proceedings then terminated.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—On last Saturday, information was given to the police that the residence of Mrs. Hawkins, of No 3, Grosvenor-gardens, Park-lane, had been burglariously entered, between twelve o'clock at night and seven the following morning, and £900 worth of gold and silver plate, gold and silver snuff-boxes, a gold turquoise set with precious stones, the contents of a cabinet containing ancient silver relics, a gold medal presented to Sir Moses on laying the foundation-stone of the Birmingham School, snuff-boxes, and a gold ring of Egypt, and a diamond ring from Majesty Queen Victoria, carried off by the Thieves, who are supposed to have effected their entrance with skeleton keys.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &c. FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUGUST 12.—The number of births registered during the above week in the metropolis and suburbs was 1343, of which 704 were males, and 639 females. This number exceeds by 43 the number of births registered during the preceding week. The deaths registered during the above week numbered 1059, of which 566 were males, and 503 females. This number exceeds the weekly average for the last five summers by 87, and the deaths of the week preceding by 21. From the returns of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, carried off by the Illness

THE SALE AT STOWE.

Since the sale of Mr. Beckford's celebrated Fonthill Abbey, no auction has probably excited so much attention and speculation as the sale of the furniture and effects at the Duke of Buckingham's renowned seat of Stowe.* The magnitude of the building, and the enormous quantity of furniture necessarily required in it, some of which is of great beauty and value, the enormous quantity of silver and silver-gilt plate, and the highly valuable display of articles of Spoouerie, with Raffaelle ware, and all kinds of china in abundance, with very many fine pictures and other works of art, renders this sale truly memorable; whilst the length of time occupied by the disposal of so many lots (about thirty-four days) is equally remarkable, and will form a most interesting page in the history of sales by auction.

It is our intention to illustrate most amply this interesting sale; and to enable us to carry out our intention, we have been favoured by Messrs. Christie and Manson with special permission for our artists to make elaborate and faithful drawings of some of the most interesting and beautiful works of decorative art, Spoouerie, plate, &c., with which the noble apartments in the mansion were stored: and, to add to the interest of the series, we purpose giving several views of the most picturesque spots in the grounds.

It may be necessary to premise that our Illustrations and descriptions will not follow in the precise order of the Catalogue, as our aim is not to produce an illustrated list, but a general descriptive sketch of the most remarkable objects in the sale, with graphic illustrations of the most interesting and valuable.

This week we commence our series with an Illustration containing two views in the pleasure-grounds, surrounded by a border composed of different Articles of taste and virtu.

The upper view is the grotto, and the scene is taken from the borders of the lake, whence it has a most picturesque effect. The lofty trees which embrowd the grotto give great beauty to the spot; and the quiet solitude, broken only by the plash of water, and the murmuring of doves which nestle amidst the trees, is in harmony with the character of the building.

The lower view is the Temple of Victory, and in its form it is taken from the celebrated Maison Carrée, at Nismes. This is the largest, and perhaps the best temple in the gardens, and has a good effect in its situation. Near this temple her Majesty and Prince Albert, on their visit in 1846, planted two trees.†

We may here observe that architectural art has not seconded nature in adding to the beauty of the gardens at Stowe; for, while the trees are of the grandest forms and the most luxuriant growth, the temples are miserable efforts of invention, devoid of beauty of outline or character, and some even thoroughly ugly in their appearance. Still, with even these drawbacks, a ramble through the gardens at Stowe is most delightful. "The arched walks and twilight groves," the long avenues of magnificent beech and elm trees, with sombre chesnuts and graceful ash trees occasionally intermingled, are of themselves sufficient to redeem any tasteless architectural embellishments; and the exquisite bright water of the lake, reflecting with marvellous fidelity every leaf and branch in its truly mirror-like surface, adds a peculiar charm to the scene, not easily forgotten.

Stowe is situated at a short distance from the town of Buckingham; and its beauties have been commemorated by Pope and West, who spent many festive hours with the then owner, Lord Cobham. The mansion was originally built by Peter Temple, Esq., in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; it was rebuilt by Sir Richard Temple, who died in 1697. It has since been much enlarged and improved. The whole front extends 916 feet, the centre part 454 feet. A detailed account of the interior will be found in our Journal for January 18, 1845.

The ornaments surrounding the views we have just described are, as before observed, taken from some of the articles of vertu in Stowe House. The upper border is composed from the border to a silver framed toilet glass, and the lower from the handles of two cocoa-nut chalices, silver mounted, which are in the form of ostrich eggs, standing on the backs of two tortoises. The original is a very beautiful work of art, of the early part of the last century. In the original, eagles, displayed, adorn the upper corners of the frame, and angels the lower ones, and the stand is of silver, in corresponding taste; the bottles, &c. being mounted in silver. The tall vase on the right hand is beautiful work in silver, gilded, and is most exquisitely chased: the base of is very piquant in style, and well designed. The antique Roman sarcophagus in the centre is only a portion of lot 745, as, for the want of space, we have been compelled to omit a figure, stretched at full length, and with a large snake twined round it, on the top of the lid. On the front of the sarcophagus is a frieze, with a procession of priests, leading a bull to an altar, as a sacrifice; and on one of the ends is the following inscription:—"D. M. Antonio Pacurio filia fecit sibi et Erennii filio suo pissimo imperatoris Trajani Cæsaris Augusto Germanici servo dispensatori montaniano." This sarcophagus is exquisitely sculptured. We have also introduced into the group lot 1378, a beautiful two-handled Etruscan vase, found at Canino. The paintings on it, on the front and reverse, represent a priestess mounted on a bull.

Close to the vase is placed a nautilus shell (lot 109 of plate), one of two beautifully mounted in silver; the decorations are in very good taste: and near

BADGE AND RIBBON OF THE ORDER OF THE BATH, WORN BY SIR R. TEMPLE AT THE CORONATION OF CHARLES II.

COCOA-NUT-SHELL AND OSTRICH EGG CHALICES, SILVER MOUNTED.

CUP OF CRYSTAL, ENGRAVED, AND SET WITH AMETHYSTS.

we have placed a small cup of Chantilly ware (lot 130) of most exquisite workmanship, the handle to which is formed of a small branch, leaves from which spray out on the side of the cup, and give richness and variety of character to the whole. The body of the cup is barrel-shaped, and is adorned with paintings of flowers. To the rear of the sarcophagus, a beautiful oviform vase of Raffaelle ware (lot 483) is inserted in the group. It is a wonderful specimen of design and colour, and the subject upon it is men fighting, the figures being pencilled with great delicacy of touch and vigour of action. In purity of outline this vase may be put in comparison with the antique. A large and magnificent sideboard vase, one of two lots (456, 457) of plate, completes the group, and it is a most exquisite work of art. It is of silver gilded, and rests on a stand of open scroll-work. Two handles spring from above masks with wide open mouths. The neck and body of the vase are fluted, and the former tapers, and has a gracefully formed lip, under which is a nicely sculptured mask of a Silenus. The cover of the vase is terminated by a figure of a cavalier.

Our other Engravings, this week, represent the miniature of Charles II., by Cooper; a crystal cup and vase; an ostrich egg, and cocoa-nut; and the badge of Sir R. Temple. The miniature of Charles II. (lot 277 of pictures) is, indeed, a most exquisite work of art, beautifully finished with the utmost delicacy and force of expression. This miniature has long been celebrated, and well merits its reputation. It was sent by King Charles in 1651, to Henry Lord Beauchamp, and therefore represents Charles in his earlier years, not as the hard-featured King. The case of the miniature is painted in enamel, the interior having a landscape, and the exterior floreated pattern, set with rose diamonds.

The Engraving of a crystal vase represents lot 824, a beautiful specimen of compressed oviform character. It is made of a single block of rock crystal, and is very exquisitely enriched with arabesques, of old Italian taste. The mountings are of good characteristic design, of silver gilded. Another crystal cup (lot 1067) we have also engraved, mounted in silver gilt, the rim of the mounting being set with fourteen large amethysts. The crystal is old, but the setting, we may observe, is of modern workmanship.

Lot 277, an ostrich egg, mounted in silver, as a sideboard cup, is in fine taste. The setting in the foot is beautifully chased, and the stem is composed of a group of three ostriches whence spring terminal figures to support the sides of the cup. The rim surrounding the top of the cup is engraved with hunting subjects.

The Badge and Ribbon of the Order of the Bath, worn by Sir R. Temple at the Coronation of Charles II., will be sold amongst the pictures, and it is lot 279 of that portion of the sale. It is a very interesting and beautiful piece of knightly jewellery of the period.

The sale commenced on Tuesday, and was well attended. The lots were principally china of various kinds, and Majolica or Raffaelle ware plates, &c. Some of the specimens of china were very beautiful, especially lot 43, a pair of Chelsea china vases, oviform, with handles, and painted with subjects from Roman history. These vases were exquisite specimens of their kind. Some of the pieces of old Worcester china were of good design and style of painting, and most of the specimens realised high prices. The Chelsea vases just mentioned sold for £23 10s. The Majolica ware commanded very high prices, and the pieces were chiefly of fine design and colour; and though some of the pieces had been broken in parts, generally they were in good preservation. The subjects upon them were from the Scriptures and heathen mythology, and but few in which some incident either from Holy Writ or fabled myths was not pourtrayed. Noah, David, Judith and Holofernes, Joseph's coat brought back to Jacob, Jephtha, Judas Maccabeus, and many similar subjects, might be enumerated; whilst from the heathen worship, Jupiter, Juno and Proserpine, Ganymede and Apollo, the Rape of Europa, the Death of Æneas, Cupid with the Shield, and numerous others, could be selected as specimens of their peculiar ware.

VASE OF ROCK CRYSTAL.—OLD ITALIAN STYLE.

One of the lots (lot 77) was a curious plate of Majolica, of very early date, displaying the incredulity of St. Thomas; the legend was described on a label on it, and the figures were gilded, on a bluish-tinted ground. This piece fetched ten guineas; whilst another specimen (lot 76), with Diana and Actæon painted on it, was sold for five guineas, to Colonel Sibthorp.

Amongst the articles sold on Wednesday, two robe-chests, richly carved and gilded, from Fonthill, claim notice, from the elaborate carving upon them, and their decorative character. The sides are filled with rich trellage within a lag-

* The sale at Strawberry-hill, though extremely notorious at the time, was very far inferior to the present, both in the value of the property sold, and in the length of time occupied by the sale.

† This visit was fully described and illustrated in our Journal for Jan. 18, 1845.

tice-work, and the lids have oblong panels in the centre covered with crimson velvet, whilst the remaining portions of them are carved in lattice, the spaces being filled with flowers resembling thistles; and at the corners are fleurs de lis, whilst a border sculptured and painted to imitate precious stones, surrounds the whole. These chests are stated in the catalogue to be of pophir and sandal-wood; but one, certainly, has a positive smell of camphor-wood, which the compiler of the chest has not. We apprehend the latter is of ancient Oriental work, whilst the other was made for Mr. Beckford to correspond to it in style, though not of the same kind of wood. These chests were purchased by Mr Redfern, an agent, residing at Warwick for the sum of 60 guineas each.

There were two lots in this day's sale, which, although no mention was made of the fact in the catalogue, possessed considerable interest to those who were acquainted with their history. These were the two state chairs made expressly for, and used by her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Consort on the occasion of their visit to the Duke of Buccleugh, two years since. It is gratifying to be enabled to announce that both these chairs were purchased for the Marquis of Chandos at a price considerably under their real value, viz 60 guineas each. A Tournay carpet of great beauty, and a pair of Dresden baskets, were also bought for his Lordship, respectively for £21 and £5. The amount realised by the day's sale exceeded £1000.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Bon Mazo"—The positions marked No. 1 and No. 2, we are sorry to say, are more palpably deficient in "contrivance" than even those we before condemned; and they have the additional disadvantage of being quite unpracticable. In both you contrived White to have his first move to take the Pawn at his 6th. Black then takes the Queen with the Q's Pawn; and how, after that, the mate is to be given in two moves more, passes our comprehension.

"J. R."—Feable.—When your Pawn once reaches the adverse Royal line you can claim any Piece for it you please, without regard to the Pieces you already possess, but you are obliged to declare what Piece shall replace it, before another move is made.

"J. C. B."—You are mistaken as to Problem No. 237. The mate can be given in four moves, play as Black may. Your Solution of No. 238 is likewise incorrect.

"Sopranita"—The work in question is full of errors of the same description, and these greatly detract from its value. Your solution is the true one.

"W. L."—Your proposed solution is written so small as to be scarcely legible. The same remark applies to your Chess diagrams. These things cannot be too plain, as a doubtful letter may vitiate a whole Problem.

A Committee of the Lords of her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations had a meeting on Wednesday, at the office of the Board of Trade, Whitehall. The Lords present were—the President of the Board of Trade, the Vice-President, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and Sir Edward Ryan.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S

On Saturday night, Mdlle. Lind appeared as Maria in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento," supported by Gardoni and F. Lablache.

On Tuesday night, Mdlle. Lind appeared for the fifth time as Elvira in Bellini's "Puritani," supported by Gardoni, Coletti, and Lablache. The theatre was honoured with the presence of her gracious Majesty and Prince Albert, who had arrived first by train from Osborne. The Queen Dowager was also present, as also the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and Prince Leopold of Naples (Count of Syracuse).

On Thursday night Donizetti's "Lucia" was given, with Mdlle. Lind, Gardoni, Bouché, and Coletti.

Three additional performances will be given by Mdlle. Lind; and next week the theatre will finally close for the season.

The company will soon be dispersed in all directions. Mdlle. Lind, Belletti, and F. Lablache, with M. Regy—a tenor, will sing in operas and concerts from the 4th of September to the first week in November, visiting the midland and northern counties, Scotland, and Ireland. Gardoni and Coletti leave for the Italian Opera at St. Petersburgh; and Lablache will visit Naples, prior to his season in Paris.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Fossati's masterpiece, "Guillaume Tell," was produced on Saturday night under very disadvantageous circumstances, M. Roger, who was the Arnold, and Tamburini, the Wilhem Tell, both having severe colds, so much so that they were unable to appear on Tuesday night, when it was intended to have only formed the opera a second time. It may be guessed, that, with the two principal characters almost hors de combat, the glory of the execution fell almost exclusively on the chorus and orchestra; and, great as their triumph had been in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," it may be questioned whether Saturday night's achievements have not surpassed all their former doings.

Indeed, under any circumstances, this work must greatly depend for effect on its massive concerted pieces. "Guillaume Tell" was originally produced at the Théâtre de la Nation, formerly styled the Académie Royale de Musique in Paris, in Angust, 1829; and has been a popular production not only in that capital, but in the principal towns of Italy, Germany, Holland, Belgium, &c. In London it has been presented in Italian and English adaptations; but, although well mounted, these representations hitherto lacked the essential ingredients of an effective interpretation, a first-rate orchestra, like that of Costa, and a body of choristers, not only good musicians, but able to act as well as sing. With such powerful adjuncts, the performance of the overture very well may be felt, and, like the "Zauberflöte" of Mozart, and the "Euryanthe," the indifference of the libretto not prevent its permanent position in the operatic repertoire.

The overture was encored; particularly the introductory [illegible] four time was exquisitely played by Lindley. Nothing could be more perfect than the general execution: Barrett on the oboe, and Babe on the flute, T. Harper, Handley, Platt, Jarrett, Cioffi, Josephs, Lazarus, Baumann, &c., in the bits for the brass and wood band, and the general body of stringed led by Sainton, played with wonderful precision and irresistible energy. The introduction, which comprises the charming pastoral preparing for the nuptial fete of three couples; the lovely romance of the fisherman; and the quartet between Hedwiga, Tell, Edwige, and Jemmy (Tell's wife and son); the "Rans des Vaches," announcing Leopoldo of Melchtal's arrival with son Arnold, the sole of the former, and ssetto and chorus—all went beautifully. The duo which follows between Arnold and Tell betrayed at once that neither Roger nor Tamburini was in voice, although the former nobly declaimed his opening recitative, "Il mio giuro." The music accompanying Melchtal's benediction, finely sung by Polonini, and the celebration of the three marriages, was curtailed of the "Pas de Six," and of the "Pas d'Archers" and chorus—an omission scarcely politic. The finale to this act, beginning with Lentolde (Mel), pursued by the Austrian, demanding the aid of Tell to convey him across the torrent for safety, and terminating with the prayer of the Swiss and the imprecations of the Austrians—went magnificently. Mdlle. Corbari, who was the Jemmy, missed the high notes allotted to Tell's son after Melchtal's curse, and her general part was inefficient.

The "Chorus of Hunters," opening the second act, and the subsequent curfew of the Swiss as they retire from toil at sunset, were admirably done. In the celebrated vocal romance of Matilde, "Sois la bienvenue enfin," and "Sonnez fort," Mdlle. Castellan sang cleverly, but was not sufficiently impassioned; and her want of dramatic sensibility was still more apparent in the following duo between Matilde and Arnold, forming a striking contrast to the feeling displayed by Roger. In the next trio, which is regarded as one of the finest compositions in the world, all Roger's expressiveness could not compensate for his huskiness, and he was evidently prostrated by his physical inability to carry out his conceptions. Marini sang superbly his portion of the trio; and Tamburini, albeit crackened in many of his high notes, gave his music like a true artist. The intensity of grief manifested by Arnold in this trio, when informed of his father's death by Tell's orders, constitutes a picture of grief and desolation that has never been surpassed in musical records. The trio is replete with varied emotions, and skilfully prepares the way for the finale—the meeting of the three cantons of Underwald, Schwyz, and Uri—the descriptive music to each canton being wonderfully imagined. The sensation created by this finale equalled that produced by the third act of the "Huguenots." The audience encored a chorus, "Parla," the pas-seuse attained in which by the chorus singers was prodigiously fine. The exclamation "Tarare!" at the close of this finale, brought down thunders of applause. A more effective tableau than the Swiss mountaineers, with upraised pikes, rushing tumultuously forward, has never been witnessed.

We may state that the excitement finished at this act, for the second and third acts fell comparatively lifeless on the ear. A tedious scene of Matilde, opening the third act, usually omitted at Paris, was an injudicious restoration. The march, and entrance of Gessler on the Place d'Altorf, was done justice to by Taglafico. The "Tyrolienne" and accompanying chorus, danced by Lucile Grahn, Mdlle. Wathier, and Gentler, although regularly executed, was received coldly. It certainly affords no encouragement to restore the pas de soldats, as has been suggested. The quatuor and chorus leading to Tell's curatrna, prior to his hitting the apple off the head of his son Jemmy, went heavily; and the quartet and chorus succeeding this apocryphal scene dragged still more, so that the third act went flatly. Roger's illness, of course, deprived his grand scena opening the fourth act of interest, except the painful one attendant upon hearing a great artist vainly struggling to achieve what his physical powers prevent him from accomplishing. In Paris, since Duprez's great success in Arnold, it has been usual to terminate the opera with the air of the tenor; but Costa has restored the trio of soprani between Matilde, Edwige, and Jemmy, the musical interest of which is entirely destroyed by the absurdity of the dramatic situation: a Princess at the Imperial Horse of Hapsburgh running after Edwige to restore her son. The finale chorus was effective. Costa has selected the quick movement of the overture to illustrate Tell's triumph over the Austrians and the liberation of Switzerland.

Nothing could have been mounted with greater splendour. The beautiful scenery by Grieve and Telbin, with the diorama effects of sunset and moon raising, the picturesque costumes, the effective groupings and processions, were all conceived in an artistical spirit.

Owing to the indisposition of Roger and Tamburini, the second representation on Tuesday was postponed, and Rossini's "Tancredi" announced in its place; but this opera was again changed at the eleventh hour, in consequence of Madame Persiani's indisposition, to "Capuletti e Montecchi," in which Viardot and Castellan, Mei, Marini, and Polonini appeared, followed by the scene from "Betly," sung by Alboni.

OLYMPIC.

Finding that vaudeville did not offer pieces sufficiently attractive to the frequenters of this theatre, either from want of that delicate finish and detailed reflexion of actual drawingroom life, which alone renders it amusing, or from the paucity of the pieces that have been acted during the exciting season, the management has adopted another course, and produced a decided melo-drama, all effect, situation, and surprise. To judge from the loud applause with which it was received by a crowded house on Monday night, a hit has been made in the right direction. Mr. Shirley Brookes, the author, has taken the subject of this piece, which is called "The Magician," from Scotian history. He has, however, departed from truth, as he acknowledges in the bills, for the purpose of improving the construction of his play. Poisoning and intrigue, terminating with the death of Charles of Anjou, and the triumph of Peire of Arragon, after the massacre known as the "Sicilian Vespers," are the chief points in the plot which is well put together, and shows that Mr. Brookes is as clever at building a melo-drama as a comedietta.

The three principal parts, those of Albert d'Anglarde, a young French noble, Genti Bruno, the court physician, and the Magician (who is no less a person than Pedro of Arragon in disguise), were very effectively performed by Mr. Leigh Murray, Mr. A. Younge, and Mr. Emery. But here our encomiums must stop; for the success of the piece was more than once jeopardized by the utter incompetency of the other performers to represent the characters allotted to them. We should except Mrs. Leigh Murray from this description, as her part was by no means suited to her. She is an excellent "walking lady," and, when Madame Vestris was ill, played Theseus capitally; but she lacks intensity for melodrama.

Some new scenery has been painted for "The Magician." Of this, the most artistic was an interior, with a carved oak cabinet—the counsel, some pillars between which was seen a transparent sky.

The applause at the conclusion was, as we have stated, very hearty and general, and Mr. Younge, Mr. Leigh Murray, and Mr. Emery received the curtain to receive the well-earned congratulations of the audience.

SURREY.

The present unfavourable weather, which is death to the hopes of Vauxhall [illegible] and literally to the ceiling, which the occupant of the last row of the gallery touches with his head. On Monday evening ten thousand people were in the house to see Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Fitzwilliam in "The Flowers of the Forest," which is performed here very cleverly. Mrs. R. Honner's Lennox is a remarkably effective and intelligent piece of acting, and Mrs. H. Vining's Cynthia a picturesque study. The success which has attended the production of this piece for the above duettes convinces us, more than ever, that only a little care and judicious liberality is necessary to make the Surrey the best theatrical property in London.

SOME excitement was created at Southampton on Friday last, by an amateur performance at the theatre, of "The Rivals" and "The Nervous Man," by gentlemen well known in the theatrical circles of London, including Sir Wyndham Anstruther, Mr. Arcedekne, Mr. Peter Thompson, and others. We allude to this performance for the sake of breaking of the most interesting event of the evening: the entering of Sir Lucius O'Trigger and Mr Sharne by Mr Maurice Power, a son of the lamented Tyrone Power, who was lost in the President. This gentleman has a rich brogue, a prepossessing appearance, and a very fair amount of humour, which he displayed to admirable effect. Of course he lacks experience as an actor; but it is said that his present intention is to perfect himself in stage business in the provinces, and ultimately to come to London with the view of taking his father's place, which has never been satisfactorily filled since we lost him. Mr. Maurice Power has been brought up to the bar; he has the advantages of a finished education, an intercourse with good society, and all the prestige of his father's position and reputation.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

QUARTET AND SOLO CONCERT. The admirers of classical chamber music had a great treat on the 11th instant, at the Mortimer-street Rooms; and, despite the lateness of the season, there was a good assemblage of well known amateurs and professors. The programme opened with No. 7 of Mozart's beautiful violoncello obligate quartets, excellently performed. A duet concertante, by Spohr, for violin and violoncello, played by Mr. Leaper and Mr. R. Hughes. Spohr's Quatuor Brillante, for two violins, viola, and violoncello, called forth the expressive powers of Mr. Cooper in the solo for the first violin in the slow movement. Mr. Hancock, in a concerto violoncello, by Stamitz, accompanied by flute (R. S. Pratten), two tenors (Mr. R. Hignes and Mr. M. Rice), violoncello (Lavenu), and double bass (Howell), gave the audience an opportunity to call forth the approbation of the patriarch Lindley, to whom the composer has dedicated his Concerto. Mr. R. S. Pratten's flute solo, opening the second part, was brilliantly played. Beethoven's Quintet, No. 10, and Onslow's Quintet No. 12, were ably rendered; and between these pieces there was a very splendid execution of an introduction air and variations, by Mr. Cooper, on the fourth string. The tenor playing of Mr. R. Hughes also merited unqualified praise.

ITALIAN OPERA IN ST. PETERSBURGH. The company engaged for the season 1848-1849, beginning October 1, and terminating the 27th of February, is as follows:—Prima Donna, Madame Persiani; Mademoiselle Corbari; Contralto Mademoiselle Angri; Seconda Donna, Madame Demi; Tenori, Signor Salvi and Signor Gardoni; Bassi, Signori Tamburini, Coletti, and Taglafico; Basso Comico, Signor Rossi; Secondo Basso, Signor Demi. The Musical Director and Conductor is M. Baven. *

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been dull; rain has been falling frequently, and the sky has been of a leaden hue. The following are some particulars of each day:—Thursday, August 10, the day was generally fine; the sky was for the most part cloudless, but at times it was covered by a thin cloud, and slight showers of rain fell; the direction of the wind was W.S.W., and the average temperature of the air was 58½°. Friday, the sky was partially covered by clouds till 3h. P.M., and the day was fine to this time; shortly after 3h. P.M. the sky was overcast, and rain began to fall, and continued till midnight; the average temperature of the air was 59½°. Saturday, the morning was dull, and some rain fell; upon the whole, the day was rather fine; the direction of the wind was E.S.E., and the average temperature of the air was 61°. Sunday, the sky was overcast; frequent showers of rain fell during the day, and heavy rain fell after 8h. P.M.; the air was calm till 10h. A.M., after which time the direction of the wind was W.S.W.; the average temperature was 64°. Monday, the sky was overcast all day; between the hours of 3 P.M. and 6 P.M. no rain fell; heavy rain was falling at all other times; the direction of the wind was E. till 3 P.M., and mostly S.W. after that time; the average temperature of the air was 62½°. Tuesday, rain was falling early in the morning; the sky was generally covered by a thick stratus cloud; the day was fine; the average temperature was 63½°. Wednesday, the sky was for the most part cloudy, particularly after 3h. P.M.; during the morning the sun shone for a considerable depth of time; the wind was mostly in the N.W. between 3h. 30m. P.M. and 4h. 30m. P.M., and a slight shower of rain fell at the latter time; the direction of the wind was E., but very light; the average temperature of the air was 63°; and that for the whole day was 62°.

The following are the extreme thermometrical readings for each day:—

Thursday,	Aug. 10	the highest during the day was 68 deg., and the lowest was 47½ deg.
Friday,	Aug. 11	.....	51½
Saturday,	Aug. 12	67	56½
Sunday,	Aug. 13	67	58
Monday,	Aug. 14	67	58
Tuesday,	Aug. 15	66	56
Wednesday,	Aug. 16	71	49

Hastings, Thursday, August 17th, 1848. J. G.

FOR THE MONTH OF JULY.

The average temperature of the air was 62°.

The average temperature of evaporation was 57°9.

The average temperature of the dew point was 54.2

The water mixed with the air was of such weight as to balance, on the average a column of mercury to the height of 0.428 inches, and so spread that there were 4½ grains to a cubic foot of air.

The degree of humidity was 75, when complete saturation is represented by 100.

Rain to the depth of two inches was collected during the month.

REMARKABLE TEMPERATURE.—(From a Correspondent.)—The temperature at Bristol at 3 and 15 A.M. on Wednesday, August 9th, was 58° Fahrenheit; at 3 P.M., 59°; at 6 P.M., 62°; while at 9 P.M. the temperature was 53°: the astonishing difference of 9° having taken place in three hours. The average evaporation during the day was 52°, and average dew point 49½°.

ON THE METEOROLOGY OF THE QUARTER ENDING JUNE 30, 1848.

To the quarterly report of the Registrar-General, an abstract of which we published last week, is appended the usual elaborate Meteorological tables, accompanied by remarks upon the weather during the months of April, May, and June, by Mr. Glaisher. The report says that the weather during the first month of this quarter was a continuance of the wet weather of the two preceding months, that during May was extremely fine; and that in the month of June was changeable, wet, and dull. The April 3 the daily temperatures of the air exceed the averages of the same days of seven previous years by 11°0, 12°8, 10°6, 10°1, and 7°2; on the 6th it was below the average, and for the most part continued below it. Next it rose to a great height from the 11th to the 30th of May the daily temperatures exceeded their averages by quantities varying from 2° to 16°. From May 30 to the end of the quarter the daily temperatures were below their average values, with the exception of eight days only.

The mean temperature for the quarter was 55°8, exceeding that of the corresponding quarter in the preceding seven years by 1°.

The mean temperature of evaporation for the quarter was 47°9, which is 0°2 above the average for the corresponding period of seven years

Therefore, the mean weight of water viz. 3.5 grains—was very nearly of its average value, and in consequence of the high temperature, the degree of humidity was less; its value for the quarter was 742, that of the same period for seven years was 801, where complete saturation was represented by 1000.

The fall of rain during the quarter was 9.719 inches, which is 0 038 inches less than the average of the before-mentioned seven years.

The rain fallen at Greenwich in the quarter was 7.3 inches, which is 2.9 inches above the average fall in this period, as deduced from the above-mentioned seven years. In April the fall was 1.3 inches, in May 3.7 inches, and in June 2.3 inches. The total amount fallen in this year till June 30 was 15.3 inches, which is nearly six inches above the average fall in this period, as deduced from the above-mentioned 7 years. A similar fall of rain on 7 days in the month of February, March, and April were so wet that the spring corn was sown with much difficulty. The month of May was distinguished by high temperature, cloudless skies both day and night for a long period, very small falls of rain, and by the average amount of water mixed with the air, notwithstanding the high temperature, so that the degree of humidity was small. The earth became sun-baked and so hard as to be almost unbreakable; vegetation was greatly checked. During the month of June the earth again became saturated; the crops improved, and at the end of the quarter there was every prospect of a full average produce.

A Quarterly Meteorological Table is appended, containing the results deduced from thirty-seven different places: this table is followed by remarks indicating the places where an excess or defect of any of the meteorological elements has existed, from this part of the report we take the following:—"The fall of rain during the quarter has greatly exceeded the average amount for the season. The places at which rain fell on the greatest number of days were Leeds, Nottingham, Worksop (near Blackburn); and on the smallest number of days were Thwaite, Scarve (Ireland), Holston, &c. The places where the most rain took place were Hereford, Stonyhurst, Southampton, York, Leeds; and the places where the falls have been the least are Saffron Walden, Cambridge, Newcastle, &c. Generally, the largest falls have been in Yorkshire, and the smallest in the counties north of Yorkshire. The various hygrometrical conditions have been calculated from Glaisher's Hygrometrical Tables, from the observations of the barometer, and those of the dry and wet-bulb Thermometers.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Royal assent was given by commission to a great number of public and private Bills.

To a question put by the Earl of LUCAN, the Marquis of LANSDOWNE stated that, in his opinion, the whole administration of the Irish Poor-Law Act should come under the consideration of Parliament in the next session.

STATE OF IRELAND.

On the motion to go into Committee on the Unlawful Oaths Acts (Ireland) Continuance and Amendment Bill,

The Earl of SHREWSBURY drew a picture of the present unhappy social condition of Ireland, and entered into an examination of its causes. He contended that justice had not been done by the Imperial Parliament to Ireland, because those remedial measures so often promised, and recommended by every pol tical writer during the last fifty years, had never been granted. The promises and conditions made at the time of the Union had never been fulfilled, and the government of Ireland was a government of force, and not one of public opinion. The noble Earl complained that the waste lands had not been cultivated, that municipal franchises had not been conceded, and that religious distinctions had been preserved. He particularly dwelt on the offensive forms of the oaths prescribed to be taken by Members of Parliament, and insisted that the Irish Parliament should be refused to its legitimate proportions. He considered that that Church had abundant property for itself if re-constructed, and for the Roman Catholic Church for the people, if established.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE regarded this Bill, in the strictest as well as the largest sense, as a remedial measure. To ensure the peace of Ireland, and to establish the security of life and property in that country, was the first thing necessary. Until the supremacy of the law and the power of the Government to put down the organised tyranny exercised in Ireland should be made manifest, it would be useless to attempt to introduce measures with the view of inducing capital to invest capital in Ireland. The delay of the remedial measures originated with Ireland herself, and not with the Imperial Parliament, and the bar to all improvements was the disposition of the Irish to rebel.

The Duke of WELLINGTON supported the Bill, as the complement of the measures proposed by the Government for the purpose of putting down rebellion. He knew something of military affairs, and he had no hesitation in saying that this Bill was absolutely necessary, and that it should be carried into execution with the greatest activity. Unless the organisation of clubs were put effectually down, the rebellion could not be suppressed without extraordinary and enormous bloodshed.

The Earl of GLENGALL approved of the Bill as far as it went: but, unless he was assured that the Government would prevent the re-formation of the Repeal Association, he could not feel satisfied.

After a few observations from the Earl of DESART, Lord REDESDALE, and the Marquis of CHANDOS, the Bill passed through committee, an amendment moved by Lord GLENGALL having been withdrawn.

The Parliamentary Electors Bill was read a second time.

The Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Act Amendment Bill, the Highway Rates Bill, and the Bankrupt Release Bill were read a third time and passed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock

THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—THE STRIKE OF THE ENGINE-DRIVERS.—Mr. THORNELY inquired of the honourable gentleman the member for Cricklade (Mr. Glyn), with respect to the recent disagreement between the directors of the North-Western Railway and their engine-drivers and assistants, whether any agreement had been come to between the men and their employers; and, if not, whether any efficient means had been taken by the directors to secure the safe working of the line? (Hear, hear.)—Mr GLYN had the satisfaction of being able to inform the House that the directors of the North-Western Railway had, on every previous occasion for the convenience of the line (Hear, hear.) A very considerable proportion of the old engine-drivers and their assistants had returned to their duty, and, with the aid of the experienced men whose services had been obtained from other lines, he was happy to state that from that morning every train would be worked as before by men fully competent to the discharge of their duty. He answered the question with the most entire satisfaction, that he was sure the House would agree with him in thinking that no surrender should have been made on the part of the company to the men who had taken that recent step. The entire affair originated with a club, who had sent down their orders the preceding night to the members of the club engaged on the northern portions of the line to quit the employment of the North-Western Company. Owing, however, to the vigilance of the officers of the company, the designs of the club had been frustrated, and the men had not left their employment. He could tell the House of many tricks which had been played by the men; but, without mentioning those details, he could only assure the House that the public service would be conducted with its usual punctuality and regularity. (Hear, hear.)

The Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, the Poor-Law Union Districts Schools Bill, the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act Amendment Bill, and the Boroughs Incorporation Bill were read a third time and passed.

The Militia Pay Bill and the Parochial Debt and Audit Bill passed through Committee.

The report of the Steam Navigation Bill was received.

After about an hour's sitting, the House adjourned to five o'clock.

At the adjourned sitting, Lord MAHON stated, in reply to Lord DUNCAN, that a system of fraud and depredations had of late prevailed in the New Forest, where timber had been cut and sold. An inquiry was in course of prosecution, and two persons had been already committed for trial.

To a question from Lord D. STUART, Lord PALMERSTON replied that the Russian force which had entered Moldavia was, when the last accounts sent to him left, about to retire. No portion of the Russian force had entered Wallachia.

SUPPLY.

On the motion to go into a Committee of Supply,

Lord G. BENTINCK moved an address to her Majesty, praying that she would direct the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine forthwith to transmit to her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies copy of the correspondence which had taken place between the Provincial Secretary of Canada and the Secretary to the Montreal Board of Trade, and would direct that the same be laid before the House. The noble Lord said he was anxious to have an explanation as to the omission of the recipient of the Secretary to the Montreal Board of Trade.

Lord J. RUSSELL objected to the motion, on the ground that it would imply a censure on Lord Elgin and Kincardine; but he had no objection to the production of the paper referred to, and the Under-Secretary of the Colonies would take the first opportunity to move that it be laid on the table. With this assurance he expressed a hope that the noble Lord would allow his motion to be negatived, and the House to go into Committee of Supply

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK acquiesced, and his motion was negatived without a division.

The House then went into Committee of Supply, and several votes of the miscellaneous estimates were agreed to.

In the course of the discussion the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER announced that Lord Shelburne, in pursuance of the recommendation of the Committee on Expenditure, had resigned his office as one of the Lords of the Treasury, and that it was not the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy.

A gratuity of £2500, given by the Government without the sanction of Parliament to Sir C. Trevelyan, the permanent Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury, for his extra services in carrying into operation the relief measures for Ireland, was the subject of animadversion at a very bad precedent

Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that he would go on with a Committee of Supply at twelve o'clock on Wednesday, that on Thursday the Diplomatic Relations with the Court of Rome Bill would be proceeded with, and that he would not move the third reading of the Sugar Duties Bill before Monday next.

The Common Inclosure Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Sheep, &c. Importation Prohibition Bill, and the Sheep, &c. Contagious Disorders Prevention Bill, passed through Committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Constabulary Force (Ireland) Bill and the Parliamentary Electors Bill were severally passed through committee.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Lord CAMPBELL moved that the House should not insist upon some of its amendments to the Public Health Bill, which had been objected to by the House of Commons, or the Bill, which he still considered some valuable principles, must be lost for another year.—The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH, though objecting to many of the amendments of the House of Commons, because they gave a power of jobbing to boards, nevertheless, was disposed to give an expense to the House of Commons for depriving the public of the advantages the Bill even yet contained. A short conversation ensued, after which the motion of Lord Campbell was agreed to.

The Unlawful Oaths Act (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock, and was chiefly occupied in Committee on the Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Bill.

Several orders of the day were disposed of, after which the House suspended its sitting until five o'clock. On resuming at that hour, an hon. member moved that the House be counted, and there being only 30 members present the House was adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock

At the early sitting, Mr. F. MAULE, in reply to Major BLACKALL, stated that the subject of separate accommodation for married soldiers, other than out of barracks altogether, was under the consideration of the Government, and he trusted that ere long that object would be effected

Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to a friend that it was the intention of the Government to cause a special inquiry to be made in Edinburgh, with reference to the Annuity Tax, for the support of the established Church of Scotland, during the recess

NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—Mr. F. O'CONNOR asked the Attorney-General whether parties holding season tickets from the North-Western Railway Company, who, from dread or caution in consequence of the existing disputes, travelled to their destinations by other modes of conveyance, had any remedy against the Company for the expense thus incurred.—The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said his answer to the question given on the instant would necessarily be unsatisfactory, and might prove injurious; to give an official answer would require great time, and to give it professionally would require greater.

SEEDS IMPORTATION PROHIBITION BILL.—The question of the third reading of this Bill afforded Lord G. BENTINCK the opportunity of giving his friendly thanks to the Government, or the Board of Trade, for the first retrograde step made in the matter of free trade, hoping that the present measures would not be [illegible] precautions [illegible] not, had [illegible] occasion [illegible]

[illegible]

Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Mr. Spooner, explained the circumstances under which the gratuity of £2500 had been awarded to Sir C. Trevelyan by the Treasury. The noble Lord further stated that, since the matter had been debated, Sir C. Trevelyan had expressed an earnest desire to repay the amount in question; but his answer to that gentleman was, feeling fully convinced of the valuable services performed, that he could not consent to any repayment being made. If the hon. member thought fit to bring forward a formal resolution of censure on the Government, that would be a perfectly constitutional course to take, and one which they were prepared to meet.—Mr. B. OSBORNE intimated that he should move the disallowance of the whole sum, when the civil contingencies out of which it had been paid were moved

SUPPLY.

The House having gone into Committee of Supply, and the vote for the salaries and expenses of the Foreign Office having been put,

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DISRAELI proceeded in condemnatory terms to bring the foreign policy of the Government under consideration, particularly with respect to Italy. The hon. gentleman strongly condemned the system of intervention or interference in the affairs of foreign countries; and, though approving of the concord of France and England, he was adverse to their co-operation in the system of intervention, as he considered it would only lead to a general war.

Lord PALMERSTON defended the policy of the Government with regard to foreign states, particularly Italy. With respect to the latter country, he said, "The honourable gentleman seems to be better informed than he wishes the honourable House to infer with regard to the mission and proceedings upon which my noble friend the Earl of Minto proceeded. Every one was, in some degree, aware of how my noble friend acted. The facts of the case are shortly these: Towards the end of the year, as it is well known, in consequence of the altered policy of the head of the Roman Government, principles of reform began to prevail, and constitutional demonstrations were promulgated over the whole surface of the country. Difficulties were experienced between the Government and people with regard to those events, there being on the part of the Government a desire to retain what the people wanted to abolish. These difficulties were nowhere more pressing than in the city of Rome. A communication was made to me from a quarter upon which I could rely, conveying to the Government of this country that it was the anxious desire of the Government of Rome that an efficient mission should be sent to Rome, to aid that Government, by its counsel and advice, in settling the disputes between it and its people. It was said there might be legal difficulties in the way of sending an accredited agent to Rome, but this it was suggested might be removed, by sending an individual to Rome, who, though not actually commissioned by this country, yet, being a person having the confidence of the British Government, and being one possessing diplomatic experience, might effect a great deal in bringing about the difficulties in question. Such a person we deemed Lord Minto to be He was at that time, on his own private business, spending some time in Italy; and I thought I could not better fulfil the intentions which were in view than by advising her Majesty to desire the Earl of Minto to proceed to Rome in that unofficial capacity, indeed, in which he had stated, but combining with it the weight of being a member of the Government, and possessing its entire confidence, giving him a discretion to act upon any sudden emergency that might present itself. My noble friend was instructed to take Turin and Florence on his way; and he carried letters of credit appointing him upon a special mission to those two courts, if he found it was the wish of those Governments so to receive him. To Rome, however, my noble friend carried no "official letter." The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House asked what were the objects whom my noble friend had in view. I can say, in the first place, that the interference was not insulting. My noble friend was to be asked to give such counsel as might tend to remove such difficulties as might be pointed out. This was the purpose of his mission—a purpose which he successfully accomplished. (Hear.) My noble friend, on the one hand, pointed out to the Governments that they might trust their subjects with the exercise of more constitutional privileges; and, on the other hand, to the subjects, that, however ardent they might be in the pursuit of constitutional freedom, it could only be attained by placing confidence in their respective Governments, and not urging them suddenly to change long-established institutions. In Turin and Florence [illegible] and has been successful. Great and important changes have taken place in [illegible] without the disturbance of the public tranquillity, or without the interruption of those harmonious relations between Sovereign and subject which it is such a desirable object to maintain. My noble friend was directed to the same objects, and were attended with the same success. The noble Lord then detailed the circumstances under which Lord Minto had been invited to Naples by the King of that country, and the mediation established between the latter and the Neapolitan and Sicilian people, and the manner in which the breaking out of the French Revolution of February had interrupted the negotiations when Russell almost to a satisfactory conclusion, and then stated, on the subject of the joint mediation of France and England in Northern Italy:—"What both Governments may unite together to do in this respect must be a work of peace. The French Government said to us, 'If you will offer mediation conjoined with us, we will suspend our decision as to any intentions which may lead to the adoption of other measures.' I say, sir, that the Government of this country would be traitors to their correspondents if they made offers which devolve upon them, if in such case they had not acted in the manner described. That, then, is the only motive which has led us to accept of this joint mediation. The principle is that of maintaining the peace of Europe. The means and objects by which this is to be brought about give rise to a question which resolves itself into a series of details, and which I feel it is my duty at present to refuse." (Hear, hear.) In conclusion he observed, "It is consoling to find those who are at present the organs of public opinion in the French nation, instead of turning loose, as was done in the first revolution, all the bad passions of the people for the promotion of war—it is consoling, I say, to find that they are occupying themselves instead with the internal interests of their own country, and are desirous to preserve order in France by consolidating French liberty and establishing French freedom. That, sir, does honour to these men, whatever may have been their previous associations, or in whatever course they have been antecedently embarked. As long as England and France act together for the peace of the world, so long will every effort they make to that end be adapted to insure and honourable purposes. It is impossible two such nations as France and England should unite for any purpose which is not universal in the face of mankind. We propose now one of that description; and I trust in heaven that our proposal may be successful. I trust that the efforts of two great nations for the happiness and advantage of mankind in the present instance, be attended with at all events, some benefit will be directed to that end; and, whether we succeed or whether we fail, I feel persuaded that the unanimous judgment of Parliament will think that we are right in making the endeavour." (Cheers.)

After some observations from Mr H. BAILLIE, censuring the course pursued by the Foreign Secretary relative to the affairs of Spain and Portugal, the House resumed, and adjourned till five o'clock.

The evening sitting was passed in the further discussion of our "Foreign Policy" and the passing of the votes of "Supply."—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships sat for a short time, and advanced several Bills on the table a stage.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock, and disposed of several Bills which stood for second reading, committee, &c., and then suspended its sitting until five o'clock.

IRELAND.

In the evening sitting, Sir G. GREY, in answer to Mr. MAHER, denied that any outrage had been committed by the troops in Ireland.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ROME

Lord PALMERSTON moved the second reading of the bill for authorising diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome

Mr. ANSTEY opposed the Bill on the ground that by it the Government sought to pay the influence of the Pope over the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland for their own purposes, and he moved it be read a second time that day six months.

Mr URQUHART seconded the amendment.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL defended the course the Government took in proposing the measure.

Mr. LAW opposed the Bill.

After a lengthened discussion, in which the Bill was supported by Mr. Gladstone, Lord Arundel and Surrey, and Mr John O'Connell, and opposed by Mr. Napier and Mr. Gilburn, the House divided.

For the second reading, 138; against it, 46: majority, 7

The Bill was then read a second time.—Adjourned.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge left the residence of the Duchess of Gloucester, Mr Richmond Park, on Tuesday, for Cowes, Isle of Wight.

MADEMOISELLE JENNY LIND.—A very elaborate and massive silver salver has been presented to Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, by the Committee of the Hospital for Consumption, bearing the following inscription:—"In the name of the sufferers relieved by her bounty, this humble memorial of one of her noble actions is presented to Jenny Lind, by the Committee of Management of the Hospital for Consumption, at Brompton, London, as a slight token of their esteem and gratitude, and in commemoration of the concert given by her on the 31st day of July, 1848, on which occasion, through the exertion of her unrivalled talents, £1705 was added to the funds of the charity, and a solid foundation laid for completing the fabric, the unfinished condition of which had excited her generous sympathy."

GRAND PARADE AT BERLIN, IN HONOUR OF THE VICAR OF THE EMPIRE.

THE COBRA DI CAPELLO.

THE subject of the present Engraving is probably the finest example of this famous reptile which has ever reached Europe alive. It was recently brought to this country by a gentleman in the medical department of the Hon. East India Company's Service, and has been fed on the eggs of birds during the time it has lived in his possession. It is now in the Menagerie of the Zoological Society, in the Regent's Park.

COBRA DI CAPELLO, AT THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDEN, REGENT'S-PARK.

The danger which accompanies the bite of this reptile, its activity when excited, the singularity of its form, and the gracefulness of its action, combine to render it one of the most remarkable animals of the class to which it belongs. When in its ordinary state of repose, the neck is of the same diameter as the head; but when surprised or irritated, the skin expands laterally, in the hood-like form which is well known to the inhabitants of India as the precursor of danger.

Notwithstanding the fatal effects of the bite of this serpent, the Indian jugglers are not deterred from capturing and taming it for exhibition, which they do with singular adroitness, and with fearful interest to the unpractised observer. They carry the reptiles about from house to house in a small round basket, from which they issue at the sound of a sort of flute, and execute certain movements in cadence with the music.

There are several varieties of the Cobra, differing in point of colour; and the asp of Egypt, famous in the story of Cleopatra, is said by Cuvier to be a near ally of this species, of which the natural range is, however, strictly confined to India.

The extremely venomous nature of the Cobra compels its being kept in a doubly secured cage, which rather interferes with the vision of the spectator; but we cannot regret a caution on the part of the Directors of the Society which prevents the possibility of an accident. In an adjoining cage in the same apartment with the Cobra we observed an immense African Python, or Boa, which is said to weigh nearly 70 lb., and which undulated with freedom through the branches of a dead tree, and gave a most formidable idea of the power of the ophidian structure when adapted for victory by crushing force, as contra-distinguished from the resistless venom of the poison fang, of which the slender Cobra, on the other hand, presents as good a type as can be selected.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the following:—

The deadly enemy of the Cobra di Capello is the Indian Mangouste. We have heard descriptions of battles between them from an eye-witness. The serpent raised itself on its tail, and, with neck dilated, its head advanced, and eyes staring, waited, with every look of rage and fear, the attack of its mortal foe. The Mangouste stole nearer and nearer, and crept round, endeavouring to get an opportunity of springing on the serpent's back; and, whenever it missed its purpose and received a bite, it ran off to some distance in the field, eat some mangouste grass, an antidote against the poison of the Cobra, and then returned to the battle, in which it was at length victorious, by leaping on the back of the snake and biting it across the head.

GRAND PARADE OF THE CIVIC GUARD, AT BERLIN.

THIS imposing demonstration took place on the morning of the 8th instant, on the Linden, in honour of the Vicar of the Empire. The scene is minutely described by the Times Correspondent.

The weather was brilliant, and the spectators included as many of the inhabitants of the city as could find standing room behind and between the armed ranks, from the King's Palace to the Brandenburgh-gate. The Guard began to take up their position at 9 o'clock. The Linden contains five roads side by side, two paved carriage-ways, two narrower roads for equestrians, and a wide gravelled promenade, sacred to foot passengers alone, in the centre. They are divided from each other by rows of lime trees, an English mile in length. When these reviews are held, the two exterior roads on each side are occupied by the double lines of troops, the centre promenade is left to the public, who have also the pavement in front of the houses. When the whole lines were formed, the view up and down the Linden was very fine, though it was but a semi-military spectacle.

The Burghers have progressed in some respects towards a better military equipment than they could boast in April last, since when they have not been brought together. In celerity and precision of movement they have still much to learn; but when once formed, and with nothing to do except keep the step, they get on exceedingly well. Their arms, it should be stated, are in perfect order. It is the moral and political influence of this organised body of nearly 30,000 of the élite of the citizens that gives them such weight. It is to be hoped that their military capability will never be tested.

At eleven o'clock a German and Prussian banner, side by side, were carried into the open space kept between the back of the Palace and the Lust-Garten; it was followed by the Commandant of the Guard, with his staff on horseback, by the Ministers of State on foot, by the municipality of Berlin, and the Deputies of the Chamber. The flags were placed about midway of the façade of the Palace, and the whole of the Civic Guard defiled before them, carrying arms as they passed, but no cheers were given. The battalions then turned off from the square, and marched to their several districts. The whole proceedings were conducted in a very business-like manner, but animation and enthusiasm appeared wanting.

The Illustration shows that stage of the spectacle at which the Civic Guard defiled past the German (tricoloured) and the Prussian (black and white) flags in front of the Palace.

THE MANGOUSTE, OR "EGG-BREAKER."

THIS very rare animal, the Mungous of Elliott, from India, has just been added to the Menagerie of the Zoological Society, in the Regent's Park, and is now, we believe, exhibited for the first time in this country. It is not more remarkable for its graceful form and action than for the display of its singular instinct, which has obtained for it the collateral name of the "Egg-breaker," and is happily shown in our Engraving. The study of the animal's habits during its feeding-time will also sanction our belief in the extraordinary stories related of the Egyptian variety of the Ichneumon family, with reference to its destroying the eggs of crocodiles, as well as its capability of contending with the most venomous serpents; rendering this Illustration a fit companion for that of the Cobra di Capello, likewise now in the Zoological Society's Menagerie.

Mr. Bennett, in his account of a specimen of Mangouste (Herpestes griseus), kept in the Tower, states that on one occasion it killed no fewer than a dozen full-grown rats, which were loosed to it in a room 15 feet square, in less than a minute and a half.

The story of the Ichneumon mungo, or mungos, Viverra mungo of Gmelin, having recourse to the plant Ilampoddis tanah, or mungo root, as an antidote when bitten by serpents in its encounters with them, is related by Kaempfer, who says that he had one of these animals which slept with him, and followed him like a dog through the city and fields.

ELLIOTT'S MUNGOUS, OR "EGG-BREAKER," AT THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDEN, REGENT'S-PARK.

THE NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.—The express train, which was due at Euston-square at 10h. 30m., P.M., on Tuesday night, did not arrive till 12h. 15m., being one hour and three-quarters behind time. The delay arose in consequence of the 10h. A.M. mail-train from London getting off the line at Warrington, thus blocking up the line for some time. The passengers escaped unhurt.

THE supplemental estimate of the further charges which will probably be incurred for payments to enrolled pensioners who may be employed on permanent duty, or in aid of the civil power, from April 1, 1848, to March 31, 1849, is £25,000.

ANTIQUITIES FROM BELGIUM.—A vessel has arrived in the river Thames from Ghent, having on board, as a portion of her cargo, several packages of antiquities, consigned to a firm in the metropolis.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION, AT SWANSEA.

SWANSEA AND THE HARBOUR, FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.

(From our own Reporter.)

WEDNESDAY.

The first meeting of the general committee took place on Wednesday, the 9th, at one o'clock, at which hour a large number of members had arrived. In the evening a very numerous meeting assembled in the Baptist Chapel to hear the President's address, which, after a short speech from Sir Robert Harry Inglis, on resigning the chair to the Marquis of Northampton, was delivered. It was in the main of the ordinary character of all such speeches: the progress of science was sketched out, and the prospects dwelt on with a feeling of much hope: and the natural features of the neighbourhood, and the applications of science to all the extensive smelting establishments which surround the town of Swansea, particularly examined. At the conclusion of the speech by the noble Marquis, a short address from Professor Grove, in moving a vote of thanks, in which he was seconded by Sir Henry de la Beche, closed the evening's proceedings, excepting an announcement of the number of members who had joined the Association by Professor John Phillips.

THURSDAY.

On Thursday morning all the sections were at an early hour in full activity, excepting (a most unusual occurrence) Section A, devoted to Physical Science; in which, owing principally to the non-arrival of its active members, there appeared a falling off. In consequence of this there was an unusually large attendance in Section B—Chemistry, and certainly so many ladies have never at any meeting lent their cheering aspects to the dry details of the Hermetic art.

In the Physical Section there was, therefore, no matter of particular interest. The following were the communications brought forward. In the first two cases the authors had sent their papers, neither Mr. Mallet nor Professor Powell being at the meeting.

Robert Mallet, Esq.: Notice of Reports on Earthquakes, and the Seismometer Professor Powell: A Catalogue of Luminous Meteors, from September, 1833, to July, 1848; Observations of the Annular Eclipse of Oct. 9, 1847; On a new case of Interference of Light; On an Explanation of the "Beads" and "Threads" in Annular Eclipses. Mansfield Harrison, Esq: On a Self-Registering Thermometer, with twelve months' tracings of its work. Georgs Roberts, Esq.: On a remarkable Tide in the Bristol Channel, Friday, 7th July, 1848. Rev. Thomas Rankin: On the Recurrence of the November Atmospheric Waves at Huggate from 1840 to 1848.

In the Chemical Section a valuable paper from Dr. Schunck on colouring matters was read, the principal point in which was the discovery that the colouring matter of madder was a peculiar salt, to which the name of alizarin has been given. This was followed by a notice of the progress of investigations on the influence of carbonic acid on the growth of ferns, by Mr. Robert Hunt. The object of these experiments is to determine if a larger quantity of carbonic acid existed in the atmosphere during the period of the coal formations. As yet, however, no satisfactory results have been obtained. This communication elicited a very animated conversation, in which Professor Grove, Dr. Faraday, and many of the scientific men present joined. A notice of a new galva[illegible]

Mr. Ward, and a communication on electricity closed the business of Thursday in the Chemical Section.

In that usually attractive section, the Geological, the following papers were read:—

Professor James Buckman's Remarks on the Plants of the Inest Limestone of the Lias Formation; Notice of the Discovery of some Cetiaceous Remains in the Lias of Gloucestershire. Captain L. L. B. Ibbetson: On the Position of the Chloritic Marl, or Greensand of Great Britain and Ireland, illustrated by numerous. Lovell Reeve: On a new species of Argonauta, with some observations on the animal of A. gondola, Dilwyn. Dr. Lankester's Report of Committee on the Registration of Fossiliferous Phenomena. John Blackwall: Birds observed in the years 1847 and 1848. Dr. Thomas Williams: On the Structure and Functions of Branchial Organs of the Annelida and Crustacea. Alfred Hancock: On the Boring of Bellona into Stone, and on the Removal of Portions of their Shells. Professor E. Forbes, and Robert McAndrew: On some Marine Animals from the Bristol Channel, with Living Specimens.

In the Mechanical Section interest was excited by the communication of Mr. Scott Russell on "The recent steps in the improvement of steam navigation." In this paper the author entered largely into all the details of the "wave line" and its modifications by ship-builders, and also explained the numerous improvements in marine engines. An animated discussion followed, in which some of the local engineers joined.

In the Statistical Section nothing of importance occurred

The crowning labour of the day was the Evening Lecture, by Dr. Percy, on the Chemistry of the Smelting Processes of the neighbourhood. It would be impossible in any report which we could give to do justice to this extensive subject. Every stage of the process of copper smelting was most particularly described and illustrated; all the recent improvements were dwelt on and explained; many suggestions thrown out for the still further improvement of many parts of this truly chemical process. In conclusion, Dr. Percy called attention to the immense value of copper bone and reduced, in many of its forms, and to the importance of some national establishment in which a mining education might be given. The Marquis of Northampton hoped this suggestion would be pressed on the attention of his Government, and that the Museum of Practical Geology would become a Government School of Mines of the best class. After a few words from Dr. Faraday and Sir Henry de la Beche, and a statement by Professor John Phillips that £300 had been received from Cornwall for this association, the labours of the first day of the eighteenth meeting closed most agreeably.

FRIDAY.

Among the papers read in the several sections on Friday which attracted most attention, we may name the following:—

Mr. Scott Russell, on the Effect on Sound of the Rapid Motion of the Observer. The peculiar phenomena particularly referred to were the discordant sounds heard when travelling on railways; which, according to investigations which have been carefully made by Mr. Russell, appear to be owing to an alteration in the note produced, owing to the motion of the observer interfering with the wave of sound, producing what he calls a parallax of sound. It has been calculated, that, however musical the sound produced, it would be discordant until we arrive at a velocity equal to about 150 miles an hour, when a pure musical note would be produced.

Professor Plucker, of Bonn, brought forward a very important communication on Diamagnetism, which went to support all the recent discoveries of Dr Faraday.

M. Gaudet read an interesting paper on the Daguerréotype, in which he described some very remarkable phenomena produced under coloured glasses upon the silver plates, and detailed several very great improvements in his practice of the Daguerréotype.

Mr. Hunt, in a short communication, described some peculiar cases in which light, so far from producing chemical change, entirely protects the most sensitive photographic agents from change; then proceeded at some length to the marked difference between the power producing the photographic phenomena and that which acts upon the optic nerve.

M. Palmer Budd described his plan, as the iron furnaces of Ystalyfera, of employing the hot air escaping from the top of the furnaces for the purpose of heating steam boilers, thus effecting a saving upon each boiler of £300.

Sir Henry de la Beche gave a lengthy account of the geology of South Wales, which was illustrated by splendid diagrams.

In the Natural History Section, and the section of Mechanics, the following papers were of the highest interest:—Professor Owen: On the Development and Change of the Teeth in the Kangaroos, and on the Homologies and Notation of the Teeth in Mammalia; on the Eustachian Tubes in the Crocodiles. Dr. Thomas Williams: On the Structure and Functions of Branchial Organs of the Annelida and Crustacea. Mr. F. Whishaw: Exhibition and Explanation of the various Applications of Gutta Percha; on the "Telakrophanon," or Speaking Telegraph. Mr. J. Scott Russell: On the recent Improvements in the Movement of Steam Navigation. Professor E. Hodgkinson: On investigations undertaken for the purpose of furnishing Data for the Construction of Mr. Stephenson's Tubular Bridges at Conway and the Britannia.

In the evening, notwithstanding the very unfavourable character of the day, a large party of the members proceeded to Singleton, the beautiful seat of Mr. Veryan, where they were received by that gentleman in a style worthy in the most handsome manner. Although the weather prevailed the promenade and amusements intended to take place in the grounds, yet the entertainments within were of the choicest description; and the discharge of artillery, by Lieutenant Carne, exhibiting his plan of saving shipwrecked seamen, attracted large parties out of doors, which, dispersed over these beautiful grounds, gave a most animated character to the scene.

SATURDAY

On Saturday all were awake early, to join one or other of the several excursions which were proposed, and every kind of vehicle was in requisition. The Geologists proceeded either by land or water to the remarkable limestone districts of Gower, in which is situated the Druidic Stone. Those fond of Antiquity proceeded to Cerric Cennen, which commands the whole extent of Swansea Bay. Another and the largest party proceeded to the Ystalyfera Iron-works, where they were received by Mr. Budd, who described to them the whole of the process of iron manufacture, and his own beautifully economic applications. From thence the party proceeded to Abercrave, and, having first dined at the Lamb and Fag, a large party of ladies and gentlemen descended the Anthracite Mine. Others, less adventurous, ascended the limestone hills, by means of the splendid inclined plane. The sun shone brightly, and all was joy in whichever direction you cast your eyes; and the sage philosopher for the day unbent himself, and joined in the hilarity of each group and scene.

MONDAY.

This morning the Sections resumed their labours to hear a paper by Mr. David Brewster, entitled "An Improved Form of the Stereoscope of Wheatstone." Sir David endeavoured to overthrow the established theory, that the idea of depth is obtained merely by experience, and that all objects appear to the unchanged eye as on the same plane. He mentioned several facts, connected with binocular vision; to show that there is a line of distance impressed naturally on the retina; and all the instances to the contrary, derived from the observation of those who had received sight for the first time. Dr. Lardner read a paper on the cotton manufactory, inasmuch as the eyes of such persons were not in a natural state immediately after having undergone the operation of couching. Dr. Wessel defended the Barker Mill, which was then considerably in question. A paper by David Brewster had been known before, and that they confirmed, instead of overthrowing, the factory.

In the Chemical Section, two papers by Mr. James Nasmyth were read, on the peculiar property of coke, and on the chemical character of steel. The property of coke indicated was that noticed by Dr. Faraday in a recent lecture at the Royal Institution, of apparently the hardness of the diamond, and the very great quiet capability of being applied for the purpose of glass cutting. The paper on the chemical character of steel was rather suggestive of further [illegible] than the result of what had been done.

Birmingham, stated that, in consequence of having heard that coke possessed the mechanical properties of diamond, he had withdrawn an order for diamonds, and he hoped to be able to save £200 per annum by substituting coke for diamond in his manufactures.

A paper by Mr. Randall, in the same section, "On Common Salt as a Poison to Plants," mentioned some facts that seem to prove of great value to the horticulturist.

After the business in the various sections had ceased for the day, the general committee met by adjournment to appoint the next place of meeting.

Invitations were read from Cambridge, Bath, Warwick, and Derby; and Birmingham was unanimously selected, the meeting to be held in September; Dr. Robinson, of Armagh, being appointed President.

In the evening Dr. Carpenter delivered, in the place for holding the general meetings, a discourse on recent microscopical discoveries. At its termination, Dr. Mantell added to Dr. Carpenter's account of the formation of chalk, that the bodies of the animalcula of the pleasure-grounds was employed on this occasion. In the bow of the boat a galvanic battery was placed, which, having connecting wires with a small retort filled with mercury at the stern, enabled the professor who steered the boat to connect or disconnect the circuit of the fluid as he planned. Near the centre was a solid cylinder, constructed of wood, but bound with copper, which revolved on its axis, and from which electric sparks were freely emitted. This cylinder was in a state of continuous revolution; and with the cylinder a rod was connected, which caused the fans placed at the stern of the boat to revolve. The boat is ordinarily paddled from the stern, with one oar; its progress is slow as compared with that of the Thames wherries. The battery required to work it is a powerful one, and yet the progress which it made, in its excursion round the lake, was not swifter than that which it would make with ordinary paddling. At present it is a scientific toy; but it clearly establishes the principle that electricity can be converted into a motive power [illegible] propulsion of vessels, thereby saving the space at present occupied by the [illegible] and fuel: and as the power can be indefinitely increased so as to meet [illegible] gained speed, the sole question is one of expense.

In the Geological Section, a paper by Professor E. Forbes, being a "Notice of Discoveries among Birds: Cryptidæ," excited much interest, which was increased by the splendid collection of Birds which Mr. Bradshaw had sent to illustrate the statements of the author of "The Vestiges of Creation."

In the Stat sical Section, an interesting discussion took place upon the important subject of education and its effects in the diminution of crime, in which Mr. Vivian, M.P., Mr. M. Milnes, M.P., and a number of other gentlemen took part. The chief facts elicited by this discussion were that in Prussia and Germany generally, many instances were known of parties who had forgotten the normal education in reading and writing which they had received. It appeared that similar instances had been known in the South Wales district; but it was generally considered that there was a peculiar advantage appertaining to Wales, in the circumstance that the scholar was compelled to learn two languages, and to translate one into the other. With regard to the discrepancy between the statistics of education and crime, it was suggested that physical circumstances, such as the regularity of employment, &c., had a material effect upon these returns in particular districts. Swansea and its neighbourhood was remarkable for regular employment, and for the circumstance that, owing to the cheapness of surface land, upwards of one-half the labouring population were not only their own freeholders, but had built their own houses. This result is probably without a parallel in any other portion of the British empire.

THE ILLUSTRATION.

The View of Swansea is from a beautiful Daguerréotype, by the Rev. Calvert R. Jones, and shows a portion of the town, with the harbour, from Mount Pleasant.

Swansea is the most important place in the Principality. It is happily situated between two hills, on the western side of the river Tawy, and has been much improved and greatly increased within the last twenty years; but there is still room for improvement, which the South Wales Railway will, probably, be the means of accomplishing. The bay is very fine, and has been compared with that of Naples. There are but few antiquities. There are three churches, and many meeting-houses

Of the public buildings, "the Royal Institution of South Wales," of which we annex a view, is a noble specimen. It was commenced in 1838; the architect being Mr. Long, of Liverpool. The principal front, which is of Bath stone, extends 160 feet from east to west, in the centre of which is a prostyle portico of four fluted Ionic columns, which order is continued round the portico, which has a low pediment, is elevated five feet and a half above the level of the pavement, which produces a good effect. The building contains a theatre, laboratory, three museums, reading-room, and library. During the last year has been the meeting of the British Association, the Section B (Chemistry) held their sittings in the theatre of [illegible] Institution.

The second view is from a Talbotype, by the Rev. Calvert Jones; negatived by Messrs. Henneman and Malone, Photographers on paper to the Queen, 192, Regent-street.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The continued unfavourable state of the weather has already influenced the Money Market. Anticipations of the necessity for a large importation of corn, which, in all probability, will affect the exchanges, added to an increased demand for money, induced a belief that the Directors of the Bank of England would advance the minimum rate of interest on Thursday. The Board, however, separated without making any alteration; but the leading discount houses are taking money upon call, and, in some instances, at improved rates. Continued bad weather affected prices at the opening of the market on Monday. Consols quoting 85¾ for money; but an improvement afterwards occurred, in consequence of some large purchases on account of the Court of Chancery, the closing quotation being 86⅛. These prices were maintained on Tuesday, an advance to 86⅜ having occurred during the day. A slight depression on Wednesday, the result of some money sales, reduced the last quotation to 86⅛. The seizure of armed Chartists affected the Market at its opening on Thursday, the first price being 85⅝, sellers. On the publication of the Queen's speech, with Lord Palmerston's speech of the previous day in the House of Commons, a better feeling prevailed, Consols advancing to 86 to ⅞. A degree of flatness has, however, since succeeded, Bank Stock starting for Friday's Exchequer Bill dividend the week has been unsaleable in large sums, except at a heavy depression. Extensive holders remember last October in reference to these securities, and are not inclined to be such friends of Government as they were on a discount in the case of small sums at that rate. At the close of business Bank Stock was 195½; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 86¼; Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, 86; New Three-and-a-Quarters per Cent. Annuities, 86¼; Long Annuities, to expire January 5, 1860, 8⅝; India Bonds, £1000, 24; Ditto, under £1000, 27; Consols for Account, 86⅛.

Business in the Foreign House continues exceedingly limited, Tuesday being the only day on which any animation prevailed, and that was chiefly owing to the settlement of the Account. Prices at the close of the week become nearly nominal, the only real variations having been in Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent, 68; Mexican Five, 1846, 17; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 44¼; Ditto, Four per Cent. Certificates, 70¾.

The Shares Market has been, with every tendency to decline. Although the Eastern Counties and Great Western pay the same dividend as the last half-year, no influence is perceptible in the prices of the Stocks. Great anxiety is evinced upon the declaration of other railroad dividends; and North-Westerns, it will be seen by the annexed list, are again lower. The closing prices are: Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 23; Birmingham, Derby, Dissington, and Sheffield, 24; Eastern Counties, 4¼; Ditto, Six per Cent. Guaranteed, 6¾; Ditto, Extension, Five per Cent., No. 2, par; East Lincolnshire, 24¾; Great Northern, 58¾; Great Western, 85; Ditto, Half Shares, 19; Lancashire, Preston, and Wyre, 34¾; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 28; London and North-Western, 113 ex div; London and South-Western, 40¾; Ditto, New, £50, 27¾; Ditto, Thirds, 5 dis; Midland, 97; Ditto, Half Shares, 12¾; Birmingham and Derby, 71; North British, Half Shares, 8; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 4; North Staffordshire, 8¾; Shrewsbury Union, 14¾; South Devon, 16; [illegible]rn and D[illegible]; Ditto, New, No. 4, 6¾; South Wales, 11¾; York, New Castle, and Berwick Extension, No. 1 (York and New), 16¾; Ditto, ditto, No 2 (New and Berwick), 10¾; Ditto, G. N. E Purchase or Preference, 8¾. Boulogne and Amiens, 6¾; Northern of France, 8⅝.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—The supply of English wheat received for our market this week has been tolerably good, and amongst it was to be noticed about 200 quarters of the present year's growth, in very middling condition. Owing to the unfavourable state of the weather for harvest work, the demand for all kinds of wheat—whether English and Foreign, or British, at an advance in the quotations of from 2s to fully 3s per quarter. Barley has moved off freely, at 1s to 2s per quarter more money whilst the value of malt has certainly improved. Oats is 2s per quarter more money whilst the value of malt has certainly improved. Oats is 2s per quarter more money whilst the value of malt has certainly improved. Oats is

GRAND SIEGE OPERATIONS AT CHATHAM.

CONSTRUCTING A PONTOON BRIDGE.

ON Friday, a series of very extensive Siege Operations took place on the practice ground, in front of St. Mary's Barracks, at Chatham. They included Pontoon Exercise, Escalading, Mining and Countermining, Attacks on Stockades, Attacks and Defences of Outposts, &c.; and the spectacle was witnessed by many thousands of spectators.

The operations were to be performed in the presence of the Court of Directors of the East India Company. At a little before one o'clock a considerable number of those gentlemen arrived, and proceeded to the quarters of Sir Frederick Smith, at Brompton, to partake of a collation. Among the directors were Major-General Sir James Law Lushington, K.C.B., Major-General Galloway, C.B., Major-General Caulfield, C.B., Major Oliphant, the Hon. Leslie Melville, Mr. Francis Warden, &c.; and in addition to these we noticed Sir John Burgoyne, and other distinguished naval and military officers.

It was intended that the operations should have commenced at one o'clock P.M. So enormous, however, was the crowd of spectators, and so densely had they spread themselves over the whole of the works, in the absence of a sufficient body of men to keep the ground, that it took Sir Frederick Smith nearly two hours to clear the lines and inner works before it was really safe to begin. A little before three, however, the attacking party having taken its station, the mimic siege commenced.

The ordinary works of a siege on a small scale having been carried on during the present summer for the practice of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of the Royal and East India Company's Engineers and Sappers and Miners, on the space between the left of Chatham Lines and the old Hornwork, which is bounded at one extremity by the Terrace Bastion, and at the other by Prince Frederick's Bastion, it was proposed to consider the trenches as having been brought to their present state by a besieging army and then abandoned and the siege raised in consequence of the arrival of a superior force of the enemy.

The attack was now, as it were, renewed by the following operations:—1st, the storming of the outer line; and, 2ndly, the re-occupation of the trenches, so as to admit of the more advanced works of the siege being pushed on by mining, and the formation of lodgments by the sappers.

Lieutenant-Colonel A. R. Harrison, commanding the Royal Artillery of the Medway district, co-operating in the arrangements for the day, directed the artillery operations; and the general arrangements for the attacks and defences were made by Colonel Sir Frederick Smith, K.H., Director of the Royal Engineer establishment.

In the first series of operations, the works of defence were lined with troops from the casemates in St. Mary's Creek, artillery being placed in the flanks and in the right branch of St. Mary's Hornwork. A squadron of cavalry, and detachments of the Royal and East India Company's Sappers and Miners, of the Royal Marine Artillery, and of the Royal Marines, constituted the garrison. The assaulting party consisted of three columns. The right column was covered by skirmishers, and preceded by an infantry pontoon bridge, carried by 100 men of the provisional battalion. This bridge extended across St. Mary's Creek. This portion of the operations is shown in the first of the annexed Engravings. The officer of Royal Engineers in command of the right column sent forward two parties of Sappers and Miners, each under an officer, to breach the stockade that closes the passage round the left of St. Mary's, and likewise to form a breach in the enclosure wall of the Fire Barns. The garrison occupied the Fire Barns, and only quitted them when they observed that powder was lodged at the foot of the enclosure wall, for the purpose of breaching it. The explosion to form these breaches was the signal for the advance of the right column across the creek. This column attacked and occupied the Fire-Barns, and the Sappers and Miners there provided themselves with tools and gabions. A squadron of Sappers sallied from the lines to take the assaulting left column in flank, and after harassing the infantry they retired within the works, and again debouched for a similar attack from behind the casemates. They finally withdrew to the inner line. As soon as the first parallel was occupied by the other two columns, the Sappers and Miners debouched from the Fire-Barns, and proceeded along the approaches to the third parallel. Simultaneously with the crossing of the creek by the right column, the centre and left columns advanced to the escalade of the outer lines, covered by their skirmishers; but they did not open their fire until they arrived at the counterscarp, when a brisk musketry fire was opened on the gunners and infantry lining the parapets. The skirmishers fired kneeling. When the assailants reached the fence on the glacis, the garrison opened a steady fire of artillery and a rolling fire of musketry, which they continued until the ladders of the besiegers were placed against the scarp, when the "Cease firing" was sounded, and the garrison retired to the reverse of the first parallel. There were two sets of ladders. Those first placed on the counterscarp were removed across to the scarp, and replaced on the counterscarp by another set, which remained there. As soon as the storming parties were formed in the ditch, and placed their ladders against the scarp, the skirmishers ceased firing, and closed to the ladders, descended the ditch, and formed the rear of the assaulting party. The left column formed on the ramparts, in column, of a distance, facing the inner line, and "formed square" to resist cavalry. The Royal Artillery, who were the first to mount the ladders, detached a party to man the captured guns, and removed them into the besiegers' batteries, previously firing on the cavalry and the retreating infantry. The garrison retired, disputing every inch of the ground, and supported by a fire of artillery from Prince Frederick's and the Duke of Cumberland's bastions. These operations are shown in the second Engraving.

The details of the remainder of the first series, want of space compels us to omit.

In the second series of the operations, the defence of the inner line was conducted by the former assailants, and the attack of the inner line by the former defenders.

A steady fire of artillery and musketry was kept up on both sides; under this fire the redoubt was taken by escalade and evacuated by the defenders.

Previous to evacuating, lighted port-fires had been placed in connexion with charges under the redoubt; and by powder the stockade was thrown down so as to open the gorge. The besiegers were withdrawn from the redoubt, to avoid accidents from the explosions of the charges fired by the garrison in their retreat. A breach was then made in the Duke of Cumberland's Bastion, which was entered by the assailants simultaneously with an escalade of the right face of the Terrace Bastion.

Colonel Sir Frederick Smith, K.H., Royal Engineers, had the general direction of the attacking and defending forces.

In the general arrangements of the various operations, Colonel Sir Frederick Smith, K.H., Royal Engineers, was assisted by Captain C. Fanshawe, Royal Engineers, the staff officer of the Royal Engineer establishment, Lieutenant Lane Fox, of the Grenadier Guards, and Lieutenant and Adjutant A. C. Gleig, of the Royal Artillery, who acted as staff officers in the attack.

THE PEACE OF EUROPE.

In his answer to Mr. Disraeli's attack upon his foreign policy, Lord Palmerston dwelt with much force and justice upon the gratifying fact, that pacific ideas are greatly more prevalent in Europe than they were at the epoch of the first French Revolution; and that events of as great or even greater magnitude than those which then convulsed all the civilized nations of the world, take place in our day without leading to such a sanguinary catastrophe as an European war. The foremost men of this day are proud to believe that it is not merely the large burden of debt which binds all European nations under heavy penalties to keep the peace towards each other, but the greater dissemination of Knowledge and Religion, and of all the arts of peace and civilisation which has distinguished the last thirty years above all previous epochs of modern history, which we have to thank for this happy result. War, though apparently the readiest and easiest mode of reconciling national differences, has never been the object of the praise of great statesmen. Even soldiers themselves, in the calmness of reflection, have condemned their own calling; and while acknowledging the evil, have merely insisted upon the unhappy necessity of appealing to the sword. Both soldiers and statesmen have agreed in calling it a necessity to be submitted to in sorrow, not to be resorted to in exultation.

We all remember the beautiful saying of the greatest soldier of modern times to a lady who shared unduly the foolish admiration of too many of her sex for military bravery, unallied with other virtues. "What a splendid thing," said she to the Duke of Wellington, "a victory must be!" "Splendid," replied the conqueror; "I know of nothing more dreadful—except a defeat." Even Napoleon, inspired only by desire of self-aggrandisement, and so far, immeasureably inferior to the man who saved Europe from the protracted career of such mad ambition, acknowledged the wickedness of war. In fact, all men agree that war is a mighty evil; and even in the rudest and most ignorant of ages it finds no defenders, except on the plea of uncontrollable necessity. Men deplore the fatality which forces them to employ it; and, if closely questioned, admit that, while a possibility of successful negotiation exists, it is wrong to have recourse to the sword and the cannon. It has been hitherto the curse of the world to admit this necessity too easily. When patience, charity, and mutual forbearance are the instruments required to unloose the Gordian knot of international difficulty, nothing, to the great majority of mankind, has seemed so facile as the sword to bring the difficulty to a solution. But the stupendous cost of former wars, the worthlessness of all the triumphs that have been gained by them, the instability of all treaties and arrangements of which victory and not justice has dictated the terms, as well as the education of the people of Europe in the industrious and wealth-producing arts, and the increase, let us hope, of Christianity contemporaneously with merely secular knowledge, have all combined to make the present generation more peaceful than its predecessors, and to justify the hope so well expressed by Lord Palmerston, that the present difficulties of Europe may run their course without a general conflagration; and that the nations may make a new settlement of their relations towards each other, without recourse to the ultima ratio infelicissima, to which both kings and people have in former ages been much too prone for the happiness of either. In these circumstances every tribute to

PRISONERS IN THE VAULTS OF THE HOTEL DE VILLE, AT PARIS.—DRAWN BY GAVARNI, FROM A SKETCH AFTER NATURE BY CHARLES CHANDELLIER.

Pitiless theorists, or cold-brain'd fools,
Or youth misguided in a high intent,
Who would reform the world with fire and sword,
And realise Utopia 'mid the smoke
Of murderous cannon—do ye ponder here,
In Lazarus-vile, the miseries ye have wrought?

If far-fetch'd wages for [illegible],
And reconstruction of [illegible],
Were all you wish'd for in the desperate strife,
Learn, in this evil day, that guiltless end
Can never consecrate the guilty means.
That, tho' 'tis noble to reform the world,
Yet reformation never springs from blood.
That, tho' 'tis wise to wish the good of man,
Yet men must make their happiness themselves.
That, tho' 'tis noble to indulge great hopes,
Yet it is wretched, criminal, and mad
To place such hopes upon the chance of war,
And think to gather crops of happiness
From seeds of murder, hate, and civil strife.

Reform the world! aye, fertilise the moon,
Or make a railway to the Pleiades!
Reforms are not the offspring of one age;
Their mighty roots lie in the foregone depths
Of dim Eternity; and we that seem
The busy actors in some great design,
Are not its masters, but its instruments.

Reform yourselves! Achieve the easier task
And all will follow that the good desire.
Let each man be a world unto himself,
And make that better.—Were we so to act,
The thought of poets and philosophers,
The aspirations of the truly wise,
The visions of the [illegible]

And Earth become Utopia, after all.—M.

the beauty, desirableness, and wisdom of peace, that come from a man who has it in his power to make war, is an advantage to humanity. In like manner every sentiment that falls from the [illegible] looked upon as an instructor of the [illegible] whose [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] whilst pained to see that a journal which calls itself, and is called by others, the principal journal of Europe, should assert so mischievous and so false a statement as it did the other day, that every man, woman, and child in France has been, and is, educated in, and shares a feeling of, hostility to England, we are all the more gratified when men in the position of Lord Palmerston give utterance to the nobler sentiment, that both the duty and the interest of these two great nations are coincident in Peace.

Unfortunately for themselves, the French are a military people. Their tastes are military; their traditions are military; and their aspirations, to some extent, are military also. But, the fact being so, it becomes all the more necessary to show them that, while we have no desire to [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] more than ours, is identified with the cause of Peace. The present head of the French Republic is a successful soldier. What he is, war has made him. But, like the Duke of Wellington, he does not admire his own art, or almost adore it because it is, as the sole salvation of the nations. The pacific speech of Lord Palmerston has been pacifically and kindly responded to by General Cavaignac. Words of peace were unexpected from his lips, and are all the more grateful. There is abundant reason to believe that they will produce good fruit all over Europe. There was danger to the world in the high position to which events had cast this distinguished man. It was to be feared that he would be ambitious of playing the part of a new Napoleon, in its later as well as in its earlier scenes; and that, with an overflowing, wrathful, excitable, dangerous, starving population threatening him in Paris, he would not have had that salutary horror of warfare which might have saved his country from still greater difficulties and perils in the days to come. These natural fears have been greatly allayed, if not entirely removed, by the speech which the Republican General delivered on Monday last in response to the address of Paris. It avowed in the boldest and frankest manner its determination to avoid war, if by any possibility consistent with honour it could be avoided; expressing his belief that the continuance of peace was absolutely essential for the well-being of France, as well as for that of all other European nations. "In certain situations," said he, emphatically, "it required more real courage to maintain peace than to urge a country into war;" and the vehement applause with which the sentence was received by the Assembly, showed a full appreciation on its part, both of the difficulties to be surmounted by the present chief of the Republic, and the public spirit which he manifested in doing his duty in spite of them. The General expressed himself as strongly in favour of the English alliance as the warmest friends of European peace could desire; and spoke of war with the detestation of a philosopher and a statesman—not with the appetite of [illegible].

We trust that the Peace Convention which is to be held in Paris in the middle of September will worthily and manfully labour in this good cause; and that, if it do no more, it will convince many Frenchmen who may be yet unconvinced, that in this country all jealousy of France has long since expired; and that the best and wisest men on our side of the Channel are looking as much as the peace, happiness, and prosperity of France—for her sake and that of civilization all over the world, as well as for our own.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been for the most part bad; the wind has blown strongly, heavy rain has fallen daily, and the sky has been mostly covered by cloud. The following are particulars of each day:—

On Thursday, the morning was fine; afterwards the wind began to blow strongly from the S.W.; the weather became rough, the night was stormy; the average temperature of the air for the day was 61°. Friday, the day was rather fine; the direction of the wind was E. at the former part of the day, and S.W. at the latter part; no rain fell, but the sky was chiefly cloudy; the average temperature of the air was 61°. Saturday, the sky was overcast till the evening; the wind blew strongly from the S.W.; a stormy day, with rain falling frequently till 5h. P.M.; the average temperature of the air was 63°; during this day the waves of the sea were higher than on any day of August. Sunday, the morning was fine and clear; towards noon the weather changed, and several showers of rain fell during the remainder of the day; the evening was fine; the average temperature of the air was 64°. Monday, the day was tempestuous, and very rough all day; very heavy rain was falling; till 1h P.M. the temperature did not rise so high as 57°; at this time the clouds became broken, and the temperature increased to 62°; the direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the average temperature of the air was 58°. The waves of the sea were very large, and the tide was unusually high. Thursday, the sky was overcast till 9h P.M.; after this time the sun shone brightly. The night was [illegible] till 7h P.M. the temperature was below 57°; it afterwar[illegible] increased to 65°, and its average value for the day was 60°; the direction of the wind was [illegible] Wednesday, [illegible] became clear, and the remainder of the day was fine; the wind was W., and strong; the average temperature of the air was 58½°; and that for the week during this day was 59½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Thursday,	Aug. 17, the highest during the day was 69 deg., and the lowest was 50 deg.
Friday,	Aug. 18,	 73	 514
Saturday,	Aug. 19,	..... 66½	 61
Sunday,	Aug. 20,	 67	 493
Monday,	Aug. 21,	..... 64½	 55
Tuesday,	Aug. 22,	 62	 52
Wednesday,	Aug. 23,	 69	 504

The harvest prospects are very indifferent. At some parts of this county much rain has fallen, the effects of which are becoming serious. The ears of grain are growing as they stand, and the seed leaves are making their appearance. From accounts now before me, from different counties, extending to Yorkshire, the prospects are no better. It seems that rain has fallen nearly every day, and the harvest operations have progressed very slowly. Wheat is a thin crop; barley is short, thin on the ground, and in general very backward; oats are [illegible] [illegible] where, and is progressing [illegible].

Hastings, August 24, 1848. J. G

THE CHOLERA IN EGYPT. The cholera has broken out throughout all Egypt with more or less intensity. It made its first appearance about the middle of last month in a town of Lower Delta, called Tanta, where at 8am cases occurred of which about 200 died. Alexandria, about 120; in most of the villages on the Nile there were daily cases, and it was noticed that the number would mark its increase during [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Ambassador is expected, and Lord Cowley has rented a house. In short, there is every prospect of a brilliant season.

A very large portion of the Assembly, and all the Germans who sympathise with the late movement, are full of the idea that the English press not only appreciates their doings, but is absolutely adverse to their cause, and jealous of the incipient unity of Germany.

RUSSIA.

From the Berlin newspapers received this week it would appear that "the pure Prussian blood" is not only averse to "Prussia resolving itself into Germany," but to the admission of the Rhine Provinces to the Ministerial offices in Prussia itself. On this head it is remarked in the Berliner Nachrichten:—"Loud complaints are made because the Ministers of Finance and the Interior have brought officials from the Rhine, and given them appointments here. Were the report true, we could not blame Ministers for taking such a step; for the re-organisation of our system of government requires an additional force. Nothing more natural in such circumstance than for Ministers to employ officers whose ability and political soundness are generally known to them. But the report is false; it is a weak invention of the reaction. Hitherto we have been accustomed to hear the Rhinelanders grumbling on account of their being deluged with officials from the old provinces." There is no news of any interest.

AUSTRIA

The Vienna Journals received this week are full of gossip about the Emperor The speech we have addressed by his Majesty to the students and deputations of the constituent diet, in Schönbrunn, have been published. "Gentlemen," said the Emperor, "you have deemed it necessary for me to come here; I have done my duty, and here I am." With these words he turned his back upon them, and retreated from the audience chamber to his private apartments. The Emperor walked daily without attendants in the garden at Schönbrunn, plainly dressed, and wearing a black, red, and gold ribbon over the shoulder and across the breast.

The probability of ministerial changes was publicly spoken of. The Republican party had been making great efforts against the Government; and though the populace gave encouragement to those attempts. The editors of three Republican and anarchical journals had been arrested, but had been ultimately set at liberty on bail.

Lord Ponsonby arrived on the 15th, and the conferences on the affairs of Italy were immediately commenced

In consequence of the heavy rains, storms, and partial rain spouts which inundated the country during the night of the 1st and 2nd of July, the greater part of the circle of Villach, in the government of Laybach, in Austrian Illyria, namely, in Tarcis, Kortschach, Spital, Griefenberg, and Upper Villach, has been devastated and destroyed to a most fearful extent, and hundreds of families have been brought to beggary and the utmost distress. A public subscription has been opened in Vienna by the city police authorities, and it is earnestly hoped that the distress will be mitigated by those who have been spared a similar visitation of Providence.

HUNGARY.

According to the accounts received, od Breslau, the Hungarian question is being hurried to a quick and bloody decision. All the Croatian regular regiments (about 18,000 men) are regarding by force 1 marches to the frontiers. The Ban of Croatia, Baron Jellalick, held on the 11th a review over the bodyguard of Orsova, who have lately returned from Peschiera. He addressed them somewhat to the following purpose:—

"Gallant Croatians! Europe admires your heroism! You are on the eve of another combat. We fight for a Centra. Government- for a constitutional monarchy, which must remain to the Imperial residence. The majority of the inhabitants of Hungary yearn for us, their liberators. The short space of four weeks will do much; in four weeks you shall return to your families. A strong and constitutional empire—a bulwark against all enemies, from the east and from the west, will reward the gallant Croatians and all loyal Austrians. We fight for the liberty of the Crown and of the people, for fraternity, for equality. This very week you shall have a battle!"

This speech elicited enthusiastic [illegible] for the Croatians and borderers doe on war and booty. The Ban's main forces are said to amount to 80,000 or 90,000 men a terrible force, which is now hastening to the rescue of the insurgent Sclavonians in Hungary

RUSSIA.

The cholera appears to be spreading rapidly on all sides. Forty "Governments" in Russia are at present visited by the disease. The number of deaths between the 26th of July and the 2nd of August amounted to 16. In Moscow there were, on the 26th of July, 1906 cholera patients on hand.

PRINCIPALITIES OF THE DANUBE.

Intelligence from Bucharest, of the 24th ult., states that ranks and titles had been abolished by the Provisional Government. The latter has invited the people to sign an address to the Czar of Russia, in which the sovereignty of the Ottoman Porte is admitted, with the reservation of an independent internal administration.

From Moldavia we learn that there were in the environs of that city on the 26th August 5000 well-disciplined Turkish troops (infantry and cavalry). These troops are commanded by Rifaat Pacha. The Baron de Richthofen, Consul-General of Prussia, and the Consul of France, have protested.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

All accounts still spoken of; so much so that some of its principal paragraphs are given in the journals of the German press. They are:—

"The dissolution of the present Provisional Government, and the appointment of a new one by the King of Denmark from a list of Schleswig-Holstein candidates, to be drawn up by the Diet of Germany. The evacuation of Schleswig and Holstein by the German troops, with the exception of four thousand Prussians, who are to remain. The Schleswig-Holstein army (about 16,000 men) to remain armed, and the Danes to hold the island of Alsen, with 3000 men

The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg passed through Flensburg on the 17th inst., on his way to the Meck-lenburg troops, which are stationed with the outposts of the German army in Schleswig.

A wish has been expressed by the Danes that the Schleswig-Holstein Diet should adjourn to the 15th of September a step to which that body were already previously advised by the Imperial Cabinet. On the question being put to the Diet, they voted the adjournment against a minority of twelve. The Federal forces in the duchies continue still to increase, in spite of all rumours still to the contrary. They amount at present to forty thousand men. The Danes, too, are on sea and land their vessels have had some smart cannonading with the batteries at Hohnis and Gluckshaven. The sale of the condemned German men-of-war, men, too, is still going on at Copenhagen.

HOLLAND

The Second Chamber of the States General at the Hague continues the discussion of the projects of law for the revision of the constitution. In their sitting of Saturday last, they adopted successively the second project concerning the Sovereign and the case in which the throne should become vacant, and the third project, which decrees the direct election instead of the system of indirect elections hitherto in vogue in the Netherlands. This latter measure met with an energetic opposition on the part of several members, who invoked the examples of the facts which have happened in France during the last general elections.

The overland mail brought, on the 21st of August, at the Hague, deplorable news concerning the expedition organised by the Dutch Government against Bally. After having operated their landing with success, and having taken possession of a fortress, the stronghold of the pirates, the Dutch troops were obliged to retreat before the superior forces of the enemy. The Dutch lost 4 officers and 103 European [illegible]. The First Chamber of the States General had been convoked for Friday (yesterday).

UNITED STATES.

Accounts from New York to the 8th inst. have reached us this week. Congress was to adjourn on the 15th inst

A proposition was before the Senate for the purchase by the United States of the territorial rights, privileges, and immunities of the Hudson's Bay Company and the Puget's Sound Company. The proposition was stated to be made by the State Department, and to be recommended to Congress by the Administration

The proposition is, to cede to the United States a tract of territo- larger than the state of New York, and for a comparatively trifling consideration The importance of the cession must be evident to all. It would secure to the country all the military posts on the northern banks of the Columbia river, and, says the Journal of Commerce, "for ever prevent any collision between the United States and England in regard to questions which are unsettled by the Ashburton and Webster treaty." This of course must refer to the Oregon, not to the Ashburton treaty.

In New York on the 7th inst., a meeting was held to ratify the union between the Provisional Committee and the "Young Friends of Ireland." The [illegible] 30,000 and 40,000 persons were present.

The New York papers discredit the intelligence which had reached them, of an insurrection in Cuba, later advices having been received in which mention is made of such an occurrence.

MEXICO.

From Mexico we learn that there had been another engagement, but with more decisive results, between the Government forces under Bustamente and the insurgents under Paredes, in which the latter were totally defeated. Padre Jarauta was taken prisoner and immediately executed.

Some doubt is thrown over the reported resignation of Arista, as Secretary of War, from the fact that no mention is made of it in the [illegible].

The Government troops were gaining some advantages over the insurgent Indians in the various disturbed districts

On the 17th there was a sufficient number of senators of Congress in the city to form a quorum; they accordingly organised their body for despatch of business. There was no quorum of the Chamber of Deputies.

The Monitor, published in the city of Mexico, states that of the 3,000,000 dollars received from the United States, only 1,000,050 dollars remains in the Treasury, and calls upon the Treasury department to account for the disbursement of the 2,000,000 dollars

From Yucatan we learn that the white inhabitants in the neighbourhood of Sisal have been gaining power, and are gradually subduing the Indians, but [illegible] shorter than what [illegible] has left. The poorer were already dropping off fast.

INDIA

Advices to the 1st of July from Calcutta and Bombay, and to the 9th from Madras, have been received in anticipation of the overland mail

The news from Moulmein, relative to the operations of the district officers in the field, is satisfactory. The force under Lieutenant Edwardes amounts to nearly 6000 men (Mahomedans). Respecting the revolt we learn that Lieutenant Edwardes succeeded in crossing the Indus and Chenab, and effecting a junction with the forces of the Rajah of Bhawulpoor. On the 18th of June the united forces came into collision with the army of Moolraj. They awaited his attack, and sustained a sanguinary conflict of nine hours' duration. The rebel army were completely defeated, and driven from the field with the loss of nearly all their artillery, six out of their ten guns remaining in the power of the British.

The cause of Moolraj is completely lost. Various conjectures were afloat at the time of the departure of the courier as to the course he would pursue. The utmost he could expect was to regain his fort in safety; but there is a more probable and a more fatal termination to such a career—namely, that his rebel chief will destroy himself or be put to death by his own people

Sir Lawrence Peel, Chief Justice in Bengal, has suspended Mr. Grant from his office of Master in Equity in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, in consequence of that functionary having been implicated in the transactions of the Union Bank as one of its directors.

The disturbances which had broken out among the Bheels in the Myc Counta district of Guzerat, a still unsettled portion of Western India, had been promptly suppressed by the energy of the Political Agent, Captain Wallace, who gave orders for the instant march to the scene of riot of a sufficient body of troops.

WEST INDIES

The Great Western steam-ship, arrived this week, has brought the usual West India mail. By it we have news from Jamaica to the 22d of July. Previous to the Great Western's departure, the Royal mail steamer Thames had arrived with the particulars of Lord John Russell's proposition for West India relief, and of the debate in the House of Commons on colonial affairs, to take out which the Thames was delayed four days at Southampton in June last, and judging from the tone of the Jamaica papers, the measures of Lord John Russell appear to have been considered unsatisfactory in their nature, and totally inadequate to relieve the extent of distress existing. The representations of the Assembly of the Jamaica press to the Ministerial measures, sugar, the staple of the island, advanced considerably in price, and was selling briskly at 17s. to 21s. per 100lb.; whereas the quotations, so recently as May 23, were so low as 12s. 6d. per 100lb

The weather had been fine at Jamaica, and favourable for the crops. On the 9th ult. a very severe shock of an earthquake, accompanied by an awful rumbling noise, was felt at Kingston. The shock was likewise felt at St. Andrew's and at Spanish town.

No disturbances had taken place amongst the black population in any part of the island. Rumours were in circulation that a movement of the negroes was contemplated on the 1st of August, but they were not generally credited, as they were supposed to be made current to serve party purposes.

In Hayti we learn by the accounts from Jacmel that many respectable persons had been arrested and cast into prison, some of them having been confined in irons. The General commanding the arrondissement, who had previously acted so praiseworthy a part in saving the pillage with which Jacmel was threatened, had been removed by the President Soulouque for performing his duty. At Port-au-Prince everything was tranquil, but the prisons were filled with political [illegible] whom it was thought, would be shot on the return of the president from his tour through the southern part of the republic

From Cuba we learn that the island was perfectly tranquil when the Great Western left, on the 27th ult. A slight disturbance had occurred at one of the coppers, but it had been repressed by the energetic measures of the Governor-General. The chief of the town, who was implicated in the revolt, had fled. This is, doubtless, the occurrence that has been magnified by the American papers into a revolution in Havana.

The Captain-General of Cuba had seized a slaver entering one of the ports, with 150 negroes on board. She had been brought round to Havannah. The blacks would be landed and apprenticed for seven years, and would then be entitled to freedom and permitted to leave the island, in virtue of the convention to that effect between the British and Spanish Crowns

Advices from Porto Rico, to the 24th of July, state that the inhabitants of Ponce were on the night of the 18th thrown into a considerable state of alarm, by the discovery of a plot existing among the negroes for a grand insurrection It was discovered by information given by one or two negroes to their master, who, on ascertaining the truth of it, immediately gave notice to the proper authorities. Three of the ringleaders were arrested, and, after trial, two were condemned to be shot, and the other to be sent to the chain gang for ten years. The plan was an extensive one, and included all the negroes on the south side of the island from Guayama to Mayagnez. The rise was to be simultaneous in the different parts of the island, and the day fixed was the last day of the month. They were to burn all the towns, kill all the whites, and make a second St. Domingo of the island. Since the arrest of the ringleaders confidence was entirely restored.

Business was dull throughout the island. There was a great amount of English shipping The estates had finished getting in the crops, and the weather continued favourable for the coming one.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE FESTIVAL IN THE ISLAND

[illegible] CAN'S WOMAN—OLD PROVERB

The pleasure venue in the Wight was changed, on Friday the 18th inst., from Cowes to Ryde. This was to be essentially an occasion of popular pastime, her Majesty having presented the Regatta Committee with twenty-five pounds, to be rowed for by watermen of the harbours of Ryde, Portsmouth, and Cowes. Unhappily, the morning broke "heavily with clouds"—the sable livery of St. Swithin. As the afternoon advanced, however, things looked better; and, when the distant booming of the Squadron House battery announced that the Fury, with the Royal standard at the main, was under way, the rain had ceased, and already the length of Ryde pier was densely peopled. About five, the Queen, Prince Albert, and the Royal children arrived, and the yacht moored abreast of the pier, about half a cable's length from it. Thereupon the sports began, and with very logically pursued all the three events were disposed of. The Royal party remained till half-past six, and then left for Osborne, under salutes from the R.Y.C. House battery, and the various yachts in the Roads. The day, strangely and sadly, with a whole gale of wind and rain, that threatened ruin to the husbandman. In the evening the Royal Thames Yacht Club had their annual dinner at that Club-house, at East Cowes. The Middle Bird. The night, in the absence of the Commodore and Vice-Commodore, was most shy and courteous. Sir Francis Scott, Sir Charles Ibbetson, Bart. A symptom repast, reflecting the greatest credit upon Mr. Drew, by whom it was provided, was honoured by the presence of about four-and-twenty members and their friends; and to the accompaniment of excellent music, it was unanimously voted that

Better wine never was'd down better ones

Monday had been fixed for the match for his Royal Highness Prince Albert's Cup, for large schooners of the Royal Yacht Squadron at Cowes. Accordingly, soon after 10 A.M., preparations were in progress, and the wind at S.W. was blowing a whole gale. After minutes to eleven the gun to "make ready" was fired; whereupon, without waiting for the signal to "start," the Brilliant, Evadne, and Wivern sloyd mooring and bore away eastward. A signal of recall was made from the Squadron House, which, misty weather, the little fleet continued its voyage. The Brilliant, however, presently bore up—the two others standing on, it being understood that the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Cardigan had a bet of £500 as to which of their vessels should first round the Nab Light. This the Wivern did (with the Enchantress close laid up); and, as she rounded, the main-rigging drew the dock-bolts, and away went her mainmast over the side, carrying one of the hands overboard also, who, happily, was saved. The Wivern, therefore, made for Portsmouth Harbour, and the other two yachts returned to Cowes Roads, the match having been postponed till Wednesday. In the evening Mr. Bell entertained, according to his custom during the regatta week, the members of the Royal Thames Yacht Club sojourning at the Isle of Wight, at Norris Castle. The banquet—also as customary—was one of princely magnificence, leaving the guests to settle the pleasant problem, which was most observable, their host's hospitality or his courtesy

With better auspices as to the weather, and under kinder "skesy influences," the second edition of the match for Prince Albert's Cup commenced on Wednesday forenoon. For at called the three crack schooners of the Royal Yacht Squadron, namely—the Fiirt, 185 tons, Sir Bellingham Graham, Bart.; the Vice-Commodore; the Capricorn, 318 tons, C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., M.P.; and the Enchantress, the Earl of Cardigan. The course out was to the eastward, round the Nab, for which, with the wind about west, the first two legs lay fair to run. Turning west, with a strong set of tide against them, the Capricorn kept to the northern shore, the other two "hugging" the island. As they passed Cowes for Yarmouth, the match was one of the most interesting ever seen. The Fiirt was the weathermost vessel, it was obvious; but as the Capricorn crossed her on the opposite tack, shroast of Egypt Point, it was close shaving; and a pilot, with a red nose, declared his opinion to be that the Queen's vessel was the Fiirt "like Newgate." At this time the Enchantress was a mile or so leeward. It was now 6 P.M., the atmosphere was chilly, people thought on dinner, and turned homeward. The match did not terminate till past eight o'clock in favour of the Fiirt, the Enchantress having the second place.

Why are the yacht courses so contrived that the least possible amount of the matches sailed is visible to the spectator? What good comes of sailing out of sight to the Nab and the Needles, when all the properties of sea-craft may be equally developed between Cowes, Calshot, and Ryde? Surely, future committees will reform this altogether

A few yachts departed after this close of the Island season for Plymouth; but "threshing" westward in such weather as then prevailed was anything but a treat. The yachting year 1848 has been one of the very worst within man's memories. may no worse evil come of it, and may we anticipate with a prophetic hope, that, in every sense, "there's a good time comin'.

COUNTRY NEWS.

THE CHARTISTS AND CONFEDERATE REPEALERS.—On Tuesday morning at the assizes in Lancaster, before Mr. Baron Rolfe, against William Hall, and a great number (46) of other persons, whom the indictment charged with conspiring, together with others, to incite dwellers of her Majesty's subjects to commit insurrection, riots, tumults, unlawful assemblies, and breaches of the peace, and to arm themselves for the purpose of thereby carrying on the said insurrection, &c., and obstructing by force the execution of the laws of the realm: and bench warrants were issued for their apprehension. These are Manchester Chartists. There were also bills found against 54 Ashton under-Lyne Chartists. In the course of the same morning the Grand Jury returned into court with a true bill against T. B. M'Manus, Lawrence Reynolds, Patrick Murphy, Francis O'Donnell, Joseph Cuddy, Matthew Somers, Robert Hopper, Edward Murphy, James Lafan, Martin Scahill, Thomas O'Brien, George Smith, Patrick O'Hanlon, Michael Fitzpatrick, James Campbell, and one or two others, for misdemeanour. A number of two or three young men of respectability and standing in Liverpool, whose connexion with the Confederate Clubs has been traced by books and documents which have been discovered.

COMMITTAL FOR "TREASONABLE CONSPIRACY." At Liverpool, on Wednesday, Mr Martin Boshill, connected with the firm of Messrs. Orr and Barbour, merchants, South Castle-street, was brought before Mr. Rushton and a full bench. After the examination of some witnesses, Mr. Rushton expressed his deep regret at seeing a young man of the prisoner's rank and station in life placed under circumstances like the present. He had been connected with a society as secretary, which had for its object a deep-laid conspiracy. He had been a most active member, and from his own knowledge was proved to be a member up to a recent date. He had no doubt that he had been the dupe of older and designing men, but his only alternative was to commit him for trial upon the evidence which had been adduced against the other prisoners with whom he was connected. The prisoner was then handed over to the custody of the Sheriff, to take his trial at the present Assizes.

ALLEGED DISTURBANCES IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.—Up to last night all was quiet at Ashton, but the authorities still deemed it prudent to continue prepared. On Tuesday evening about thirty men were seen on the road between that place and Hyde, and, on the bureau patrol from Ashton passing by, two of them ran after the pol ceman, but did not attempt any violence. The special constables and military were on the alert during the whole night. Two handkerchiefs of Brigh, the watchman, are stated by a Manchester paper to be Sligley and Milligan, two of the Ashton "National Guards." They have escaped, it is feared (along with Trainor and others, against whom warrants are out), to America, in some of the many vessels which sailed from Liverpool at the close of last week.

LIBERATION OF CHARTIST PRISONERS.—The sheriffs' officials of Renfrewshire have declared it their duty, after making the necessary investigations, to liberate Messrs. Burrel and Neilson of Greenock from the prison of Paisley, where they were confined for the last three weeks, on the charge of having committed a political offence.

THE EDINBURGH CHARTISTS. On Tuesday night, about half-past eight o'clock, Messrs. Jenkine, Walker, Cumming, Hamilton, and Grant, who were confined for some time ago by the authorities under the charge of using seditious language at political meetings, were liberated on bail. The bail bond in each case was £150, with the exception of Hamilton, whose bond only amounted to £50.

THE CHESTER AND HOLYHEAD RAILWAY.

We resume from our Journal of last week (page 100) the description of this important line of railway.

From Abergele, the railway keeps close to the sea-side for some distance, and then winds round to Conway, and crosses the broad expanse of the river through the tubular bridge, that wonder of modern engineering skill, which will be described in our next Number. On March 11, 1848. The lofty, stately walls of Conway Castle, one of the strongholds erected by Edward I., and one of the most glorious and impressive ruins it is possible to imagine, form a boundary on the land, which sweeps round in the form of a circle, the radius of which is fifteen chains; and the railway enters the town of Conway under a pointed arch constructed in the old walls of the town. This arch gives great picturesqueness to effect to the station, which adjoins it, as our illustration shows; and the castellated character of the wall is preserved by the battlements. The station is an extremely handsome [illegible]-style, with gabled wings, rising in steps, and projecting from the main [illegible]. The architectural details are in admirable taste, especially some decorated panels between the iron trusses supporting the covering to the platform, between the wings, which are one of the most beautiful characters. The station at Afor is small. [illegible] Bangor is a very large and elegant one, in the Italian style, consisting of a long building of two stories in height, having windows, enriched with mouldings, in each story, and a covering to the line of windows supported by iron trusses. The roof overhangs, and in the centre is a small turret-shaped erection, which, with the chimney-shafts, break the uniformity of line with great effect. The decorative portions of this station are very good; and not the least characteristics are pateræ, between the trusses, including a monogram of C and H, symbolic of the Chester and Holyhead Railway. At present, there is no station on the line between Bangor and Holyhead; and at the latter place only a temporary erection has been put up.

Though we have not as yet mentioned any tunnels as amongst the engineering beauties of the line, we must here state that there is no lack of them; there is, however, of very great length, the longest being that at Bangor, of 920 yards in length, cut through slaty rock and greenstone. This tunnel also is on a curve, as is the cut at Penmaen Mawr. At Penmaen Mawr, in fact there is a tunnel of 630 yards, and at Penmaen Mawr a short one of 220 yards in length, both cut through basalt rocks, and most impressive, from the situation of the rock, and the tunnels are pointed with the Gothic arch. The huge rocks rising abruptly from Beaumaris Bay, their sides dreary and rugged in the extreme, and presenting a most magnificent, yet awful appearance from the road, as the tunnels are pointed with the Gothic arch. The tunnels which the tunnels not mentioned above are pierced are as follows:—Chester Tunnel, sandstone; Penmaen Rhos, limestone; Conway, shale; Llandegai, slaty rock; Belmont, slaty rock and greenstone; Trefnisech, slate rock and clay. There are two viaducts, the Cefyn, of seven arches; and the Ogwen, of thirteen arches, fifty-four feet high. The latter we represent in one of our illustrations. At no great distance from Holyhead, the line crosses a small inlet, and, presenting to the engineers a most difficult obstacle to surmount

In order that the Chester and Holyhead line offers an admirable means of reaching easily the most interesting spots in North Wales—Conway, with its glorious old castle, being on the line; Carnarvon, within easy distance, as is also Snowdon's huge peak, with the Clwydian Vale, and many another valley of great beauty and celebrity, with its family of picturesque hills, waterfalls, and ruins. Nor is the Menai Bridge to be forgotten by the traveller along this line of railway; there is still more wondrous neighbour the Britannia Tubular Bridge, now in progress of erection for the use of the line—indeed, till the completion of which, a short part of the journey, about three miles and a half, is performed in carriages appointed by the company. The Britannia Bridge is truly a mighty construction in its proportions and its gigantic in the extreme, with an imposing Egyptian character, and will be a grand addition to the line of railway; and to several of the officials connected with the railway, for information respecting it, our acknowledgments are tendered.

THURLES ON MARKET-DAY.

THURLES.

[illegible] people who come into the town to chapel and to hear the news, and the soldiers who fill the shops where [illegible] porter, potatoes, eggs, salt, calico, linen, black-puddings, buttons, [illegible] d the officers and "heaps" of gentlemen who [illegible] and one another at the head hotel by ringing all the bells [illegible] told there would be no sign of insurrection in Thurles. [illegible] sets with country people, curious to ascertain [illegible] omer to Thurles, and who take round-about [illegible] y. There is the same philosophic amusement for [illegible] ise too busy, of watching and studying the detectives. [illegible] apel, where hundreds of the country people—the men [illegible] blue hooded cloaks: all of them in good condition as to clothes: hardly a ragged coat, or cloak, or stocking to be seen—a visit to the chapel, where some hundreds are always, in the early part of the day, on their knees, is about all [illegible] not what are the detectives doing to arrest the remainder of the insurgent leaders, or what is the light brigade of Major [illegible] neral M'Donald doing to help them, but how is Ireland to be saved from an annual potato rot, and the famine which that and a poor system of agriculture leaves her a prey to, which, being the question [illegible] [illegible] Chancellor's [illegible] measures.

Let us follow some of them.

To the neighbourhood of Macroom, in the county of Cork, Mr John Hinds was sent. A reference to the evidence taken by the Commission which inquired into the occupation of land in 1844, under the able Presidency of the Earl of Devon, shows us that up to that year the custom of farming in the Macroom district was deplorably wasteful. When I visited the district during the famine months of [illegible] lation working on the roads for relief out of the ten millions which was voted for the purpose by Parliament. Not a perch of ground on the ordinary farms was broken with a spade or plough at the end of March. And, had the relief works and wages not been stopped to all who were occupiers of land and relief [illegible] have been turned up, a grain of seed sown, or a plant planted in that district, as in others, except by a few of the gentlemen cultivators.

Being at last forced upon their own resources in 1847, the Macroom tenantry [illegible] pointed out to them as he went along, the defects of their old customs, and the advantages of the system which he recommended. He accompanied Mr. Coppinger, a poor-law guardian, over a large tract of country, near Mushera mountain; but he says it would be difficult to make anything of the poor creatures [illegible] swarming there. "But, strange to say," he adds, "some large farmers and gentry told me that it was now impossible to get farming labourers to work either by task or day upon the land, so completely are they demoralised and upset by the new system of labour that has been introduced among them (by the relief works). Instead of working at their own lands at home, or hiring themselves out as daily labourers, worthy of their hire, they now prefer working on the roads, like convicts [illegible] of hardly enough to support them, and their farms lying idle and neglected. If half the labour that is now spent on breaking stones could find its way back into the fields, and be employed in digging and deepening them, the country would soon feel the benefit of it. [illegible] vered in, must end in certain ruin."

To this I would add, by way of suggestion, that if one pound of meal per day keeps these people upon the [illegible] of Winchfield, Hampshire, found that he could get any number of men to work for him for nine shillings a week on going to that farm. He preferred to give them twelve shillings a week, and has continued to do so. He has had better workmen, and better work, and cheaper labour for his twelve shillings, than those farmers who continued to pay nine shillings.

Four half of nine shillings per week would be wages such as were never heard of about Macroom. If the half, instead of the fourth or the fifth of nine shillings per week, was offered for farm labour, the miserable men of Macroom would go to the farmer who offered it, and leave the rest to and the one pound of meal a day.

But it is not so certa hat those who have their five, ten, or fifteen acres of their own farm would leave the pound of meal to cultivate for themselves. If they borrow money at Macroom to buy seed or obtain food while the crop is growing, they must have two or three names to a bill, and [illegible] cent. for six months. So bad is their security deemed to be, th[illegible] nor any other interest that they may promise (they will [illegible] obtain loans for them since the prevalence of the potato rot, consequently their land lies untilled. It is beyond the power of human foresight to devise a plan by which these people are to be made men of substance, unless the plan of Lord Clarendon, of teaching them how to make land fertile and their crops profitable, be followed out, and sufficient funds made myself be [illegible] the numbers who crowded round me for information. Only for the assistance of the clergy of all persuasions, I would not be able to struggle on at all in these vast tracks; but indeed they are doing their duty, and the people are everywhere beginning to feel the benefit of it."

Then again he says: "I held meetings in Muskerry, which were well attended by the farmers; but, somehow or other, the gentry held back, and more is the pity, for all along the valley of the Lee the country is beautiful, the land fine, the people quiet and industrious. What they principally want, is instruction and co-operation from their superiors of wealth and resources."

It is satisfactory to know, however, that the gentry became more favourable to the industrial mission as the season advanced.

GOING FOR A LICENCE TO KEEP FIRE-ARMS.

Mr. Matthew Grace, who was sent as instructor to the Dingle district in Kerry, says the Rev. Owen M'Carthy, parish priest of Ballyheigue, "offered every assistance in his power to bring me in contact with the poor wretched inhabitants. He hopes to be able to get some seeds, and that I will be able to interest them in cultivating them." Under the date of May 6th, he gives the following deplorable picture:—"The Reverend Mr. O'Sullivan, P.P., of Kilgobbin, accompanied me over a large tract of poor desolate country, where I met several families digging their stubble land of last year and preparing for potatoes. The great difficulty here, as elsewhere, is the want of seed. Mr. O'Sullivan told me he had known some of these poor people sell their beds, and carry them away privately by night from shame, in order to procure the seeds—and those who could not do so have only to let their land lie idle and to die themselves alongside it. Mr. O'Sullivan has himself procured four acres of turnips, in the hope that the people will follow his example; but it is vain to expect anything from such broken down and dejected poor creatures as these."

On visiting Dingle a second time, Mr. Grace saw the good results of his first visit manifest. Land was prepared for green crops. The Rector introduced him to his congregation, to teach them how to dispose of the seeds sent them by the Society of Friends. At Castleland he says his meetings were well attended by clergy, and gentry, and the pauper tenantry. A committee was formed to get seeds and implements proper for the poor farmers. "Unless something effective be done in this respect," he says, "it is quite useless to be trying to get the poor creatures to alter their system, or to improve it, by bare advice or instruction."

Mr. George Jordan, who was sent to the Swineford district, in the western county of Mayo, found it useless to instruct them while the wretched occupiers of the soil had not an ounce of seed nor any means of obtaining it, "unless it dropped down from heaven." Small tracts on husbandry sent to the instructors for distribution were everywhere eagerly sought for.

Mr. Thomas Wynne Boggs, who was sent to what he truly calls the splendid county of Roscommon, says: "With the assistance of the clergy, I have been endeavouring to ascertain the quantity of tillage land in this splendid county of Roscommon, and we think it is about five acres tilled for forty-five acres untilled and lying idle. The great part of these idle and untilled plains is covered with weeds and rushes. The people are wandering about, seeking for foreign food for breaking stones; their families starving; and that beautiful land, that ought to support them all and as many more, is lying idle like themselves and useless" (as grazing meadows).

Since coming to the county of Tipperary, I have visited and observed some of the good effects following the instructions of Mr. Samuel Shouldice, who was appointed to the district of Ardfinan. Mr. Prendergast, Secretary to the Farming Society, guided him through the district about Market-hill. The farmers had sown their wheat crops, but in a defective way, great waste being caused by the numerous furrows and the small narrow ridges. Mr. Prendergast proved strongly on his tenants the necessity of adopting the instructor's advice; and to enforce it by example he caused to be sown in their presence in the field to follow his instructions, and to lay down the land strictly in accordance with them.

Mr. Samuel Barton, of Rochestown, took the instructor among his tenants, and provided some of them with seeds and implements, who seemed inclined to follow the instructions. He called on Mr. O'Connor, the parish priest of Ardfinan, and found him with five boys at work, preparing to sow potatoes alone. The value of a more varied system of cultivation was explained, so [illegible] of one crop failed others might succeed, and the [illegible] entomism, in the kindest manner, immediately [illegible] plough, harrow, and seeds at the instructor's disposal, to treat it as he thought proper. This act of confidence on his part had the best effect towards enlisting the feelings of the farmers, and inducing them to follow his example.

This was with the Catholic priest. Immediately after, the Protestant rector of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Mathews, sent for the instructor, and asked him to lay out his farm for him, which was [illegible]

The competition for land—[illegible]ering no other scope for industry—leads the people to give such high rents as to offer for the [illegible] possession to outgoing tenants, as it is when they constitute of capital to cultivate the land when they [illegible]

I have not room [illegible] space by alluding to more of the districts to which the instructors were sent. Their reports are all interesting. By a misfortune, not new to Ireland, the public press has not brought projects so simple, practicable, and really effective, worthy of [illegible] I have, therefore, been the more particular in making special inquiries of [illegible] and in bringing these beneficial services to Ireland fairly before the [illegible]

I may add, that while the instructors were sent are twenty-nine in number. To sixteen of them they were provided free of expense to the localities; to the remainder the localities contributed half the expenses. The payments were limited to £14 per for each instructor, the districts over which they travelled being extensive. The Lord-Lieutenant began the fund by a subscription of £100, and afterwards obtained £1,000 from another source in England. The whole sum expended was £2433. Owing to the insurrectionary movements, all the instructors have been called in. If funds can be provided, it is intended they shall be sent out again in October, to direct the people during the winter and spring.

The weather continues wet, and every heart seems sinking at the unhappy prospect for the harvest. There have only been three entire dry days in the last fortnight; still most of the corn is safe, though it may not be [illegible] quality, if the weather should brighten up. The peasantry come here early in the morning with buttermilk, potatoes, and scanty gallanings of grass [illegible] and linger in the market-place over their small sales all day; but the greater number who come seem to have nothing in hand of business kind.

We can hardly get them into conversation on the most ordinary topics, as they think every stranger is a detective policeman. Even though innocent of insurrectionary sympathies, they fear an accusation. To a man standing near the railway I put some questions a little time ago about the crops, and the localities over which he had travelled. He trembled when I spoke, and became so suspicious that he could scarcely answer me. Sorry to see his uneasiness at being addressed by a stranger in such a perilous time, I left him, that he might be at ease, so far as I was concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House met at 12 o'clock

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE COURT OF ROME BILL. The discussion on the clauses of this Bill was resumed, and ultimately they were all agreed to, ... and the Bill was ordered to be reported.

TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF THE "OCEAN MONARCH" PACKET SHIP, AND GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.

This ship was destroyed by fire on Thursday, about five or six miles to the eastward of the Ormshead, in Abergele Bay. Mr. Littledale, Commodore of the Royal Mersey Yacht Club, who had been to Beaumaris regatta, was returning to Liverpool in his yacht, when he observed flames proceeding from the Ocean Monarch, when, of course, immediately bore up and proceeded to render all the assistance in his power, and was fortunately the means of saving 32 persons from a watery grave

The flames were bursting with immense fury from the stern and centre of the vessel. So great was the heat in those parts, that the passengers, male and female, men, women, and children, crowded to the fore part of the vessel. Their piercing, heart-rending shrieks for aid were carried by the breeze across the intervening waters. In their maddened despair women jumped overboard with their children in their arms, and sank to rise no more. Men followed their wives in frenzy, and were lost. Groups of men, women, and children also precipitated themselves into the water, in the vain hope of self-preservation, but the waters closed over them for ever. No pen can describe this awful scene. The flames continued to rage with increased fury. In a few minutes the ruin must went overboard a few minutes more, and the inanimate shared the same fate. There yet remained the foremast. As the fire was making its way to the fore part of the vessel, the passengers and crew of course crowded still further forward. To the jibboom they clung in clusters as thick as they could pack, even one lying over another. At length the foremast went overboard, snapping the fastenings of the jibboom, which, with its load of human beings, dropped into the water, and in the most heartrending screams, both of those on board and those who were falling into the water. Some of the poor creatures were enabled again to reach the vessel; others floated away on spars, but many met with a watery grave.

The Ocean Monarch had on board about 400 persons, including the crew and emigrants, of whom about 400 have perished. The vessel is a hulk, burnt down to the water's edge

Several other vessels rendered assistance, amongst which was the Brazilian frigate Alphonse, which rescued about 160 persons. Sixteen, also, were saved by a fish-ng-boat.

THE CHARTIST TRIALS.

These trials took place at the Central Criminal Court on Friday. Mr. Baron Platt presiding. The attorney-General desired George Shell to be placed at the bar. The prisoner, aged 23, described in the calendar as a shoemaker, was indicted for a misdemeanour, in having attended, and used seditious language at, an unlawful meeting at Woolwich-common, Blackheath-road. The Attorney-General then detailed the facts attending the prisoner's apprehension, and remarked on the seditious speech he uttered at an open public meeting. Witnesses were called, who sustained the charge, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." Sentence deferred.

James Maxwell Bryson was then put upon his trial, charged with a misdemeanour of a like nature. After the evidence had been gone through, which was but a repetition of what was given at the police-office, the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty."

MINISTERIAL VISIT TO IRELAND.—Lord J. Russell will start for Dublin in a day or two. He goes, not to supersede, not to control, nor to direct Lord Clarendon. But Lord J. Russell goes himself to observe the state of our distracted island, to see its real grievances, to examine their causes, and to confer upon their remedies.—The Times

ARREST OF CHARTISTS.—At Bradford, on Wednesday night, the police, acting under the orders of the magistracy, paid a round of visits to the various clubrooms of the Chartists and Confederates in the town of Bradford. Most of them were found out, but in Kershaw's-yard, Manchester-road, in Victoria-street, nine men were found, half a dozen of them being woolcombers, two weavers, and a tinner, and they were all marched off to prison, a number of books and papers in the care of the secretary being taken by the officers of justice. At the house of John Smyth, in Thomas-street, a number of papers were also found, and he, too, was conveyed to prison.

STATE PROSECUTIONS.

O'Doherty, of the Tribune newspaper, who had already escaped conviction by the jury's disagreeing, was again brought to trial on Thursday (last week), and has again escaped, from the same cause. The trial was not concluded until Saturday morning. The jury were locked up from twelve o'clock till five, when they were discharged. Two of the number complained of illness; and a physician having been called in, pronounced that their condition was such that further confinement would injure them very seriously. The Court, therefore, consented to their discharge

Mr. J. A. Curran applied on behalf of the printers of the Nation news, that, to have them discharged from custody, as the Attorney General had not sent up any bills of indictment against them. The Attorney-General said he was satisfied to allow them to be discharged on their giving security to appear again when called on. The Court then ordered them to be discharged on each of them giving two securities in £10 each, and themselves in £20, to appear again when called upon.

SENTENCE ON MARTIN.—When the jury had been discharged on Saturday evening, Mr. Martin, of the Irish Felon, was called up to receive sentence. Having had permission from the bench, he addressed some remarks to the Court, at the conclusion of which the Chief Baron passed sentence of ten years' transportation upon him.

Mr. Martin's brother, after a salutary lecture, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment in Newgate for having entered the dock of the forum of the jury who convicted his brother, immediately after the trial, and challenged him to a duel. His ready and deep apology enabled the court to deal with him so lightly.

POSTPONEMENT OF THE TRIAL OF MR. WILLIAMS.—On the application of the Attorney-General, the trial of Mr Williams, the second proprietor of the Tribune, against whom bills had been found for felony, was postponed until next commission. The court then adjourned until the 21st of October.

A special commission will issue, immediately that the Crown arrangements are concluded, for the trial to be decided on the indictments, to sit either at Clonmel or Nenagh, more probably at the former town. Mr. Smith O'Brien and Mr Meagher, with Mr. Duffy, will take their trials in the first degree, and the other prisoners to be afterwards dealt with.

A writ of error in Mr. Martin's case has been submitted to the Attorney General.

TREASONABLE DOCUMENTS.—The folly of Smith O'Brien was never more apparent than in his retention, in a careless manner, of treasonable documents, deeply implicating many persons in his insurrectionary designs. A large portion of this correspondence was kept in a travelling-bag which he left at Cashel, and when arrested, O'Brien, in the bridewell of Thurles, wrote a letter to his correspondent at Cashel, suggesting that the correspondence in question should be destroyed. Of course, the letter fell into the hands of the authorities, and the disclosures thus arrived at are most important. On Mr. O'Brien's person was also found a letter from Charles Gavan Duffy, of the Nation, relative to insurrectionary measures, and in what providers assistance could be looked for; and, in consequence of this, the trial of Mr. Duffy for felony will not be proceeded with, but he will be prosecuted for high treason. Rumour says that many of the letters found in Smith O'Brien's portmanteau, and promising him countenance and help from various influential priests and laymen, are forgeries. That such letters exist there is no doubt, but the denial of their authenticity may be made for a purpose

ARRESTS. Four young men in the haberdashery warehouse of Messrs. Cannock and White were arrested on Saturday, under warrant from the Privy Council. They were taken at once to the Lord Mayor, and thence to Newgate. They were prominent members of the late clubs, especially of that known as "The Mercantile Assistants." The names of three of them are Mulhare, Lombard, and M'Kenzie. Mr. M'Kenzie is a Scotchman, who has been in Ireland some years. He is, it is said, a relative of a celebrated Canadian leader of the same name, and of a well known gentleman in Glasgow. Jaffe, a young gentleman for whose arrest a warrant was also issued for some time, was taken in Tipperary on Friday night week. Mr. Shea Lalor is said to have been placed in arrest. If so, we shall have another removal to [illegible]

REMOVAL OF STATE PRISONERS.—The number of arrests which have been already reported would prepare us for learning that the prison of Newgate was so that of Kilmainham, and is a very crowded state. Not only were the parties incarcerated subject to inconvenience, but medical men predicted that disease would probably be generated by the overcrowding of prisoners. Those parties who were first arrested were treated with consideration and kindness. They were allowed to have their own beds and other matters of convenience and comfort. But they were placed at the disposal of the governor of the prison, and as soon as room became filled so as to afford no additional accommodation. The transit at sea was then necessarily resorted to, and here, of course, all extra accommodation was impossible. Here, then, the prisoners accumulated so fast, that so many as twelve were compelled to sleep in one cell. The Government, with considerate humanity, immediately set about clearing those prisons to some extent, and on Friday (last week) sixteen of those imprisoned under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, but who, it is probable, will not be subjected to any further punishment than duresse, were removed to the House of Correction at Belfast, in the Leonard Government steamer. This movement was effected most respectedly, at an early hour in the morning. Six were taken from Newgate, and ten from Kilmainham, in the police van, to the Kingston Railway [illegible] by the first train down. The Royal Standard, Hawk Road, Dublin, of 6 o'clock A.M. The names of those removed from Newgate were Messrs. [illegible] and Brennan, said to be charged with treason; and Messrs. [illegible] Tuffy, barrister; P. Donnelly, arrested in Kildare a few days ago; [illegible] proprietor of the Drogheda Argus; and from Kilmainham [illegible] the Irish side-de-camp to Feargus O'Connor in all his movements [illegible] en route to an armed rendezvous: Barrin, recently from America; [illegible] Baker, of Pim's haberdashery house; E. O'Reilly, late a correspondent and ambassador of the Nation at Paris; and Mr Walsh, and some other parties unknown to notoriety. Mr. Dillon, it is now generally understood, has escaped to America.

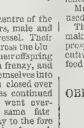
THE POTATO BLIGHT. The failure appears to be as complete as that of 1846 Reports from Tipperary, Carlow, Cork, Sligo, Limerick, Derry, Antrim, Down, Louth, Armagh, Monaghan, &c., unhappily all concur in representing the pestilence as universal.

Mr Burt sent a hostile message to the Solicitor-General for some words he used at the late trials, but the matter was satisfactorily explained

The Irish Government, under the agency of the Poor Law Board, have been making very urgent inquiries as to the actual condition at present, and future prospects of Ireland in respect to food; and the result, as committed to me is positive, may be surprised, in any case, namely, "that there is barely food in the country to support the population till the first week in January."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE MOORE



Few families have suffered more fatally in the service of their country than that of this distinguished officer, Brigadier Moore being the seventh member, in one generation, who has fallen a sacrifice to the climate of India alone.

Colonel Moore was the seventh son of Edward Moore, Esq., of Stradwell House, Surrey, and descended, it is stated, by a junior branch, from the celebrated Chancellor, Sir Thomas More. He entered the army as a Cadet at the age of 16, the bearer of the Cape of Good Hope, being placed at the head of the Cadets In 1805, he sailed with the secret expedition under Sir David Baird, and assisted in the year 1804, under the influence of his uncle, Peter Moore, Esq., M.P. Upon arriving in India he obtained a commission in the 1st Bengal Regiment N. I.; and on the augmentation of the army, he was appointed to the 59th Bengal Native Infantry, of which he became Major-Commandant. In the Nepaulese war he served under Sir David Ochterlony, and, though still a subaltern, was invested with the command of 3000 men, a command in which he so distinguished himself as to call forth the thanks of the Commander in-Chief. During this period he volunteered for the leading of a "forlorn hope," and the storming party were on their march, when the fort surrendered. Presently afterwards [illegible] Grenadier battalion, attended at a division

PRIZE FRUIT GROWN AT BLENHEIM.—PAINTED BY G. LANCE.

PRIZE FRUIT GROWN AT BLENHEIM.

PAINTED BY G. LANCE.

This beautiful picture has been painted by Mr. Lance for his Grace the Duke of Marlborough; and many of our readers will recollect it as one of the first-class attractions of the West Room, in the late Exhibition of the Royal Academy.

The composition is an almost matchless assemblage of magnificent fruit, for which prize medals have been awarded by the Horticultural Society. The principal object in the composition whether considered with regard to size, weight, form, or colour, is a stupendous pine-apple: the original fruit weighed sixteen pounds, and measured twenty-four inches in circumference, and nineteen inches from the stalk end of the apple to the extreme end of the crown. The other fruits, especially the grapes, peaches, and cherries, were upon an equally grand scale. In the background of the group are the ducal arms; and in the distance is the noble palace of Blenheim.

This is, certainly, one of Mr. Lance's finest works, and the Duke of Marlborough was highly satisfied with the picture. His Grace immediately forwarded to the painter a cheque for two hundred guineas.

In this class of painting Mr. Lance certainly has no rival

WAR-STEAMERS IN KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

During the insurrectionary movement, "the noble asylum harbour of Kingstown," on the south side of Dublin Bay, has been a scene of constant activity. Large war-steamers, as the Druid, Cyclops, and Birkenhead, have been variously employed for throwing in reinforcements of troops, &c. The preparation of these vessels has presented some remarkable instances of celerity; thus, we learn that upon one occasion the Druid has been fitted out, manned, provisioned, and coaled complete for sea in the short space of six hours.

We perceive that the Admiralty has just issued orders that the new packets Banshee, Llewellyn, St. Columba, and Cuvadoc shall in future leave Kingstown for Holyhead at eleven o'clock each morning.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Stock in Trade Bill and the Out Pensioners Bill were read a second time.

The Turnpike Acts Continuance Bill, the Steam Navigation Bill, the Poor Law Union Charges Bill, and the Poor Law Union District Schools Bill passed through committee.

The Insolvent Debtors Court Bill, the Money Order Department (Post Office) Bill, the Registrar of Sasines, &c. (Scotland) Bill, and the Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill, was read a third time and passed.

The Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill was brought up from the Commons and read a first time. The second reading was fixed for Thursday. Lord REDESDALE urged the Government not to press so important a bill at so late a period of the session, when there was not time left to give it proper consideration. Lord BROUGHAM condemned the practice lately adopted by the House of Commons of disfranchising boroughs, or suspending their representation, as a dangerous innovation, at which their Lordships should look closely. The Duke of WELLINGTON also expressed an opinion that a bill of so important a character should not be urged forward when the House was thinly attended SLAVE-TRADE.—Lord DENMAN gave notice that he would on the next evening move an address to the Crown, praying her Majesty to give directions to have the Slave-Trade treaties strictly enforced.—The Bishop of OXFORD said he could not be present that evening, took the occasion to say that he was convinced the Slave-Trade had received great encouragement from the sugar measure introduced by the present Government, and that he believed there would be no chance of stopping it unless the blockade of the coast of Africa should be vigorously maintained.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock,

The report of the Wolverhampton Curacy (No. 2) Bill was received.

The House went into Committee of Supply, and several votes were taken.

The Labouring Poor (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Millbank Prison Bill was read a second time.

At half-past three the House suspended its sitting till a quarter after five o'clock

At the resumed sitting—

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.—Mr. HUME asked the Prime Minister if he was determined to conclude the grant of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company, intimating that, if such were his determination, he (Mr. Hume) would move a call of the House on Friday night, and take the sense of the House on the question. Lord J. RUSSELL said, he understood from Earl Grey that it was his intention to propose the grant to the Hudson's Bay Company, on the strict condition that they would take all the necessary measures, and do everything in their power to promote colonization. If the Company should accept the grant on these terms, then it was Earl Grey's intention to lay all the papers before the Committee of Privy Council, and it would then rest with the Privy Council whether the grant should be confirmed or not. Mr. GLADSTONE remarked that the restriction would be ineffectual, because the Hudson's Bay Company was fundamentally unfit for colonisation.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

On the motion to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. G. A. HAMILTON moved, as an amendment, that a humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she would be pleased to direct that such a modification of the system of National Education in Ireland might be made as should remove the conscientious objections which a very large proportion of the Clergy and laity of the Established Church entertain to that system as at present carried into operation; or, otherwise, that means might be taken to enable those of the clergy and laity of the Established Church who entertain such conscientious objections to extend the blessings of Scriptural Education in Ireland. The hon. member contended that the principles of toleration which characterised the system of education established in Ireland were not made tenable to the clergy and laity of the Established Church in Ireland. He asked the Government to remove the anomaly by which the clergy of the Irish Church were placed in a false position, and made to appear to be acting in opposition to the Government, when such was not their intention.

Sir W. SOMERVILLE thought the House should pause ere it assented to the motion, which would in effect to the extent of making that the mixed system of education so long established in Ireland, and from which so much benefit had been derived, should be given up. The right hon. gentleman opposed the motion.

Captain JONES, Mr. Gregan, and Sir W. Verner supported the motion

Mr. B. OSBORNE charged the Bishops and clergy of Ireland with a systematic opposition to the national education system, and called on the Government resolutely to maintain the system.

Mr. NAPIER entered into a minute examination of the mode in which the national education plan is carried out in Ireland, to show that it involved a violation of conscience on the part of many clergymen and others. He could not see why one principle of education should be established in England, and a totally different one in Ireland

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the system of national education in Ireland had been established as an experiment by Lord STANLEY in 1832, and had been extended by successive Governments. It now counted 4000 schools and 400,000 scholars; and having arrived at that magnitude, and having conferred undoubted benefits on the Irish population, there were very good grounds for making a modification of the system. The principle of the system was that of doing the greatest practicable good in the way of general education. The noble Lord commended those who established Church schools; but declared that he saw great difficulties in agreeing to any vote of public money in aid of Church schools while the national system was in operation.

Mr. S. Crawford, Mr. Hume, and Mr. Reynolds addressed the House, and a division took place:—

For going into Committee of Supply, 118; for Mr. Hamilton's amendment, 15. Majority against the amendment, 103.

The House went into Committee of Supply, and several votes were agreed to.

The Chairman then reported progress.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Lord DENMAN moved a series of resolutions with respect to the slave trade, and in doing so expressed his regret that a decidedly forgiven conclusion had been allowed to creep into the deliberations of the Committee appointed by the House of Commons to investigate the subject, to the effect that all interference with the wilfulness traffic must necessarily fail, and that it ought, therefore, to be left entirely to itself. He was of a totally different opinion, for he believed it could be suppressed, though he would not say extinguished. It had been said that the attempts at its suppression had aggravated the horrors of the trade; but this he believed to be one of the most hasty and unfounded positions that could be taken up. The noble Lord concluded by moving that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to take such measures with Foreign Powers for the suppression of the slave trade should be enforced, and that British subjects, directly or indirectly engaged in carrying it on, should be prosecuted to piracy.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE opposed the motion, chiefly on the ground that the Government had not had time to examine the evidence taken by the Committee upon the subject. The noble Marquis concluded by moving as an amendment the previous question

After some observations from Lord BROUGHAM, the previous question was agreed to without a division.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL

On the motion for the third reading of the Sugar Duties Bill, Lord GEORGE BENTINCK again brought forward the clause which had been rejected in committee, for the purpose of putting the British refiners on a footing of equality with those of Belgium and Holland. The noble Lord produced to the House a sample of English refined sugar which had been sent to Holland, and from thence imported to England as Dutch refined sugar, in order to have the advantage of the difference of duty, a state of things which he contended should not be suffered to continue

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER regretted the noble Lord should have thought it necessary to bring his clause forward a second time, and said that, however desirable it might be to have a general and uniform system, yet there were so many difficulties in the way, that at that period of the session it was impossible to deal with them. He hoped, however, in the next session to be able to introduce a measure upon the subject.

Mr. GLADSTONE said the interests of the sugar growers had been too long trifled with, and the discussions which had taken place in that House had been productive of the most ruinous consequences to that trade. He believed, unless a different system of legislation was adopted with respect to the sugar-growing colonies, they would not retain them three years long

Mr. GOULBURN regretted that Government had not introduced some general measure on so important a subject, rather than have waited the time of the House with measures which were imperfect and unsatisfactory

Mr. HERRIES, in supporting the clause, said that the course pursued by Government was a flagrant act of legislation on the most important principle. Every packet brought intelligence of the ruinous effects of their legislation on the West Indian colonies, and yet the Government were content to say that they would consider the subject, and see what could be done next session. The Government had, however, involved themselves in a dilemma, and therefore they resorted to the paltry expedient of passing the Bill upon the table

Mr. LABOUCHERE opposed the clause, and deprecated the speech of Mr. Herries, which was a general censure on the policy of the Government, without a single argument in support of the proposition for which he was about to vote.

Mr. HUME supported the clause

Mr. H. BAILLIE had formerly voted against the clause, but from what he had since heard, and considering the injustice about to be done to the sugar-refiners of this country, he felt bound now to support it

Mr. MOFFATT, in supporting the clause, said he was at a loss to find any one reason why it should not be adopted.

Mr. MACKINNON opposed the clause

Lord J. RUSSELL said the Government during the recess would take the whole question into its consideration; but he could not pledge himself to bring in any measure on the subject, unless there was a prospect of overcoming the many difficulties in the way of any general measure, which he was assured was no easy matter by Sir T. Fremantle, the Chairman of the Board of Customs.

After a few observations from Mr. G. THOMPSON and Mr. WILSON, the House divided, and the clause was negatived by a majority of 70 to 40.

Two other amendments moved by Lord G. BENTINCK were likewise lost upon divisions, and eventually the Bill was read a third time, and passed

Several orders of the day were disposed of, after which the House adjourned until five o'clock.

In the evening sitting.

Lord G. BENTINCK moved for some returns, showing in contiguous columns the importations of sugar from British colonies and foreign states respectively, as given in the monthly returns of the Board of Trade, and in those of the Customs, for the months of September, October, November, and December, 1847. He was anxious those documents should be produced, for he found a difference of 10,000 tons of sugar between the two returns in the short space of two months. It was, therefore, of great importance to those engaged in the sugar trade to know which returns were authentic

Mr. LABOUCHERE said the discrepancies complained of were not mistakes, and the trade could not possibly be misled by them. He explained how they occurred, and hoped the noble Lord would not think it necessary to persevere with his motion

Lord G. BENTINCK said he was by no means satisfied with the explanation given, and would move for a committee on the subject next session.

After considerable discussion the motion was withdrawn, on the understanding that Government should furnish such information as would prevent either the House or the trade from facing into any error on the subject.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS

Mr HERRIES then called the attention of the House to the reports of the committees of either House of Parliament on commercial distress, and moved that the House should, early in next session, take the same into its serious consideration. The right hon. gentleman entered into a lengthened historical statement of the circumstances which led to the Bank Charter Act of 1844, and, after alluding to the events that followed, contended that it was clearly established that the act of 1844 was a total failure, and the House ought soon to decide whether it should be permanent in or otherwise. Three years' experience had shown that the objects sought to be attained by that act had not any one of them been secured. It had only accomplished the predictions of its opponents, while it entirely disappointed the expectations of its promoters; and if an additional argument were required to prove its inefficiency, it would be furnished by the fact that during the last year the Government were compelled to suspend its operation. He then adverted to the reports presented to both Houses of Parliament, and said that it's Commons' Committee had, in direct opposition to the preponderance of evidence, ignored the fact that the passing of the Bank Charter Act of 1844, and, after alluding to the events that followed, contended that it was clearly established that the act of 1844 was a total failure, and the House ought soon to decide whether it should be permanent in or otherwise. Three years' experience had shown that the objects sought to be attained by that act had not any one of them been secured. It had only accomplished the predictions of its opponents, while it entirely disappointed the expectations of its promoters; and if an additional argument were required to prove its inefficiency, it would be furnished by the fact that during the last year the Government were compelled to suspend its operation. He then adverted to the reports presented to both Houses of Parliament, and said that it's Commons' Committee had, in direct opposition to the preponderance of evidence, ignored the fact that the passing of the Bank Charter Act of 1844, and, after having examined numerous witnesses before them, had reported that the act required amendment. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Government would see the necessity (as he was too late in the session) of taking this subject into its serious consideration, and would pledge itself to bring the subject forward as early as possible in the next session of Parliament.

Mr. HUME thought Government would be wrong to pledge itself to any act for next session, for he entirely despaired of ever seeing the currency question permanently settled.

Mr. NEWDEGATE contended the whole currency question a system that was rotten to the core, and one that would be fraught with the most frightful calamities to us should another famine afflict us this year.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, while he admitted the importance of the subject, thought Mr. HERRIES' motion would be most fruitless if adopted. The best course the Right Hon. gentleman could pursue would be to bring forward his measure next session, when the House would give it its earnest attention, unless it should happen to be occupied with more momentous business. The Right Hon. gentleman had not stated one reason why the House should pledge itself now as to the course it should adopt next session, nor had he removed a single objection to such a course as he proposed. He would not meet the proposal of Mr. HERRIES with a direct negative, but he would move the previous question; and he contended the course he intended to pursue, he proceeded to defend the Committee of the House of Commons from the charge of having given a report against the weight of evidence. He defended the general tone of the act, and deprecated the course adopted by the opponents of the Bill in putting the construction they had done on the relaxation that had been authorised by the Government during the late distress.

Mr. GOULBURN followed in the most temperate manner, in defence of 1844 and 1844, and defended his own views on the subject, at the same time expressing himself open to conviction.

Sir R. PEEL went at some length into the currency question, to show the fallacies of Mr. Spooner's views, and could not see how anything could be gained by adopting the motion before the House. He deprecated the idea of the Government giving a pledge as to the course they would pursue, as it might be considered equivalent to giving a promissory note at six months. At the proper time for discussion he would be most willing to maintain the propriety of adhering to restrictive clauses of the Bank Charter Act, notwithstanding the pressure and the danger of a political panic, in addition to the monetary pressure in April last. With respect to the recommendation of the Lords' committee, he should be prepared, at a proper time, to bring forward a measure to prevent that which had been proposed would be to invest the Bank of England with a discretionary power to relax the restrictive clauses of that act. The proper course to adopt would be for the Government to take the responsibility of relaxing those clauses, as it would be safer for all interests concerned

Mr. MUNTZ said, the act of 1819 was so imperfect, that it caused a great deal of fluctuation. The act of 1844 was a proper measure, the bill of 1844 was a necessary part of it, in order to carry it out fully. Although it was asserted that the distress was not aggravated by the restrictions of the act, it was singular fact that the very day Government announced it relieved the distress, and the next day the whole country felt the benefit of it. He believed the day would come when the right hon Baronet would come down to the House and acknowledge that he had been mistaken; and when that day arrived the country would have cause to rejoice.

After some observations from Mr. HUME in support of the motion,

Mr HERRIES said he was satisfied with the tone the debate had taken, as it was now manifest the question could not rest where it was. He would, therefore, be content that the motion should be negatived without a division.

The motion was accordingly negatived without a division

The House was subsequently "counted out" at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

DUBLIN ELECTION.—Lord R. GROSVENOR reported from the Dublin Election Committee that Messrs. Reynolds and Grogan had been duly returned, stating also special circumstances

NAPLES AND SICILY. Lord J. RUSSELL, at the instance of Sir I. WALSH, explained the cause of the appearance of the British fleet in the Bay of Naples, which was in consequence of the Neapolitan Government having threatened British subjects resident in Naples in common with its own with the imposition of a forced loan. On Sir W. Parker's arrival, however, he found that a forced loan had been abandoned, and interference on his part therefore became unnecessary. As between the King of Naples and his own subjects, the Admiral had received no instructions that would lead him to take any hostile measures as against either party

SUPPLY. The House having gone into Committee of Supply, and the vote of £40,700 for Polish refugees having been, at Mr. B. OSBORNE moved its disallowance, on the ground that the time had arrived when it should altogether cease. After some discussion, on an assurance from the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER that no person should from henceforth be relieved in the event of his own or his wife's or infirmity prevented from returning to his own country, Mr. OSBORNE withdrew his amendment, and the vote was agreed to.

On a vote being put on the sum of £1695, the amount of the Regium Donum, Mr. G. LUSHINGTON, on behalf of the great bulk of the Dissenters of England and Wales, who considered the gift to their ministers in the light of a degradation, and a vote expressive of the voluntary principle, alike offensive to their independent sentiments and religious convictions, moved a reduction in the amount of the vote by the sum of £500. After some discussion the Committee divided, when the amendment was negatived by a majority of 32—the numbers being 38 to 60.

The Chairman then reported progress, and the House temporarily adjourned. On its resuming,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to Sir J. TYRELL, stated that the Mint Commission would conclude its labours within a month, and then report.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN. Lord PALMERSTON, in answer to a question from Mr. W. Miles, stated that the present Danish Government had a right to blockade the port of Hamburg, and contended that inasmuch as the British Government was engaged in an attempt at mediation between the Danes and the Germanic Confederation, it was not intended to interfere in reference to the blockade

A discussion on the subject of colonial bishoprics followed, at the instance of Mr. HUME, after which the House went into Committee of Supply, short debates arising on the grants for the Founding Hospital and Female Orphan House in Dublin. On the vote for defraying the expense of non-conforming, Presbyterian, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland being put, Mr. CRAWFORD moved that it be reduced from £36,837 to £305, the amount payable for the support of the widows and orphans of ministers of the synod of Ulster. After a discussion the committee divided, when the amendment was negatived by a majority of 32—the numbers 13 to 45

The vote for civil contingencies was stated at a million, Mr. B. OSBORNE moving that it be reduced by the sum of £5695, the amount awarded by the Government to Sir C. Trevelyan and other persons for extra services performed in carrying out the relief measures for Ireland. The Committee having divided, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 99—the numbers 14 to 73. The grants for distressed unions in Ireland, in aid of the rates, until the harvest, and for emigration to the British North American colonies, were agreed to, when, these being the last votes in supply, the House left the Committee, and the House resumed amidst loud cheers.—After some discussion, the Poor Removal (England and Scotland) Bill was read a second time Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE moved the second reading of the Bill

Lord REDESDALE would not oppose the second reading, provided the Government would declare itself not to proceed further with it this session. In that case he should move a resolution embodying the principle of the Bill, and pledging their Lordships formally to consider any measure of the kind which might be proposed next session.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE assented to the noble Lord's proposal.

The Bill was then read a second time

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

Lord MONTEAGLE, in moving for papers connected with the proposed grant of this island to the Hudson's Bay Company, inquired into the circumstances connected with that grant

Lord GREY explained, that the island, if not colonised from Great Britain, would be occupied by squatters from the United States, and that, as there was no probability of voluntary emigration to it from this country, the Government had thought it expedient to make a grant of it to the Hudson's Bay Company, to form a settlement thereon under certain conditions

The Fisheries (Ireland) Bill passed to the House. No sufficient reason had been given for the necessity of such a measure. He had the strongest objections to the provisions of the Bill, and therefore felt bound to oppose it in every stage. The hon. member concluded by expressing a hope that the noble Lord would withdraw the Bill. If not, he should move an amendment, that the committee be postponed until that day three months

Mr. CRAWFORD seconded the amendment

A long debate ensued, in the course of which Lord PALMERSTON ably defended the Bill. On a division, the motion for the committee was carried by a majority of 111 to 34.

The House then went into committee, and the discussion of the clauses occupied the remainder of the evening.—Adjourned.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Mr. Stephens, wounded at Ballingarry, and now dead, is the "young engineer" who went with Mr. O'Brien to summon the police at Mullinahone to surrender. It was he who was supposed to be Dillon.

It is said that Mr. O'Gorman, jun., was actually on board the steamer searched for him at Kilrush, on the 3rd instant. He is said to have worn the dress and assumed the appearance of an old lady, in which disguise he had the honour to lean on the stipendiary magistrate's arm while ascending to the quays.

A house was destroyed on Monday, in Queen's-place, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, in a very extraordinary manner. A tall stack of chimneys was blown down, and, falling upon the roof, carried it away, and forced down every floor, demolishing the whole of the furniture, and nearly killing a child, the only person in the house at the time.

It is stated that Mr. J. B. Dillon, one of the chiefs of the insurrectionary party in Ireland, has arrived at Havre.

By a decree of the French Executive Government, dated the 18th inst., the sequestration which had been placed on the Orleans and Centre Railways has been removed, and their management restored to the respective companies.

Lieut. Turner, of the Royal Artillery, has been appointed aide-de-camp to his father, Major-General Turner, commanding the Cork district.

The encampment at the Phœnix-park, Dublin, has been broken up, and the 5th Regiment has gone into barracks.

Colonel Sir W. Colebrooke, K.C.B., who was gazetted last week as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Barbadoes, St. Vincent, Grenada, Tobago, and St. Lucia, has also been appointed to the Vice-Admiralty of those Islands, vice Lieutenant-Colonel Reid, R.E.

The man of colour, Cuffy, a well-known member of the National Convention, was brought before Mr. Henry, at Bow-street, on Saturday, charged with "wilfully and feloniously compassing, imagining, inventing, devising, and intending to levy war against her Majesty, within that part of the United Kingdom called England, in order by force and constraint to compel her said Majesty to change her measures and counsels, by certain overt acts committed by him." The case was remanded to the 31st inst.

On last Monday the long vacation of the Court of Chancery commenced. The vacation judge, Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, has intimated that he will sit in Lincoln's-inn one day in the week, of which notice will be given, to dispose of such matters as may be preferred. Mr. Tinney, the vacation master, will sit at his chambers in the public office, the whole of the other masters having closed their sittings.

An American court has recently decided that marriage contracts made on a Sunday are valid, on the ground that they come under the head of "works of necessity and charity."

The immense falling off in the traffic on the Great North Road is shown by the fact that a few years back the tolls at the Markham Moor toll-bar, near East Retford, were let for the sum of £1300 per annum, whilst the same bar was let at the White Hart, Retford, on Saturday last, for £290.

The Prefect of Police of Paris has just published his periodical bulletin, in which he says that the number of unemployed operatives in Paris is reduced to 8403. The offences against property are 8, and robberies 6 per day. The total number of victims of the insurrection of June now amounts to 141.

The disturbances in Ireland being sufficiently quelled to admit of the withdrawal of some of the slops upon the coast, the Admiralty have issued orders to Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Napier to take under his command the ships and vessels comprising the intended squadron of exercise placed under his orders prior to leaving Spithead, and proceed with them on a cruise to try their qualities of sailing, manœuvring, &c.

Several emigrants have recently arrived at Trinidad from Martinique, not thinking their lives secure during the present unsettled condition of the French West India colonies.

Quarrels in America are rather serious matters. An affray lately occurred at Nelson court-house, Virginia, between Clayton C. Harris, a lawyer, and Wyatt Haro, a wealthy citizen of that place. It resulted in Haro's shooting Harris dead, and immediately surrendering himself to the law.

The whole of the Chartist prisoners who were examined at Bow-street on Friday were removed privately afterwards, under a strong escort, to Horsemonger-lane, instead of to the House of Detention, where prisoners under remand are accustomed to be sent. This was done by order of Government, in consequence of an intimation that an attack would be made on the latter place in order to release them.

The schooner Amethyst, one of Messrs M'Arthur's superior line of traders between Glasgow and Liverpool, was totally lost on Thursday (last week), off the Isle of Man. The crew took to the boats, and were picked up.

Intelligence has been brought by the American packet Europa, that the parties implicated in the late forgery on the Manchester firm, in which Mr. Alexander, M.P., is the principal partner, and by which £3000 was obtained from the Bank of England branch, are in custody at St. John's, Newfoundland; and an arrangement has been made with the Manchester police force, to send a police inspector over to convey the prisoners to England for trial.

PLAN OF A SLAVE VESSEL.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

THE motion in the House of Lords made by Lord Denman, on Tuesday night, has naturally revived the interest of the measures for the extinction of this vile traffic of "man-selling and man stealing." The close of the session is marked by these humane exertions, as was its commencement, in the comprehensive speech of Lord George Bentinck, in the House of Commons, on February 8. His Lordship then laid in his hand a communication from Captain Pilkington, of the Royal Navy, on the subject of the slave-trade, accompanied with a plan of one of the slave vessels (which we now Engrave). They were sitting longitudinally, and in rows, seven across the ship, with their legs crossed, so that they might be stowed within the less space. The sketch came into Captain Pilkington's hands in 1823 and 1824, and was similar to a schooner taken by her Majesty's ship Stanley (Captain O'Brien), on the Isle of Pines. Captain Pilkington said—"When captured, several of the slaves were dead, others dying; and when the remnant was removed into the Stanley, their flesh was found to be mortified, and covered with maggots, owing to the long confinement and sitting posture. I have seen subsequently slaves recently imported, brought into Havannah, with similar marks upon them. I was never employed on the coast of Africa, but the street-fronts of the slave-yards can be fully detailed by hundreds who have witnessed them in that locality. I may, however, here remark, that in slavers, when captured on the coast, their cargo is comparatively fresh to what it becomes on arrival at Brazils or Cuba. It is here that the effects of the 'middle passage' and its horrors are developed; and any one who has visited the slave market at Rio Janeiro or Havannah, as I have done, can bear testimony to such scenes of brutality as revolting as they are disgraceful to the whole Christian world. . . . A deep and sworn confederacy exists. Whilst we are lopping off the branches on the coast the root is flourishing anew, and cherished in the Havannah and Brazils. Enterprise is not dormant. Funds are not wanting. The cultivation of sugar now demands more labour, since the late tariff. . . . We have not but the right nail on the head. We must strike deeper and harder than our beautiful little brigs are capable of striking. All the skill and ingenuity of our ship-builders—all the horse-power of London and Glasgow—the lives of our best and bravest officers and seamen, will evaporate and disappear in the pestilential tornado, whilst advancing one single step towards accomplishing an object which is continually vanishing like a phantom before our eyes. ('Hear, hear,' from Mr. Hume.) It is to Rio Janeiro and Havannah, Lisbon and Madrid, we must turn our attention, and break down these hitherto irresistible barriers by compulsory treaty and guarantee. They have too long frustrated the feeble endeavours of civilisation and humanity."

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE, AT SWANSEA.

TUESDAY.

As this was to have been, according to the preliminary announcements, the last day of the Sectional Meetings, there was an unusual press of communications in all the Sections. Among the most important we may mention the following:—"Report of Progress in the Kew Observations and Experiments." The value of these meteorological observations, which are most carefully made by Mr. Ronalds, aided by the admirable instruments of Professor Wheatstone, lead us deeply to regret that the funds at the disposal of the British Association are insufficient for the support of the Kew establishment. The expenses are exceedingly limited; the objects are dissimilar to those of any of our observatories, and all of the utmost value to society. A small grant from Government would preserve to the Association and the public a most important auxiliary aid to the advancement of knowledge.

Several communications on electrical science were made by Sir Wm. Snow Harris, Professor Thomson, and others; and a very curious paper one by Sir David Brewster, on the compensation of impressions moving over the retina as seen in railway travelling, in which all the phenomena of disturbance produced in the eye by the rapid passing of images over the retina, and the means by which this might be compensated by moving the hand rapidly to and fro before the eye, the whole exemplifying many of the more remarkable effects of vision, were particularly described. Professor Wheatstone detailed and exhibited his new and beautiful instrument for determining the true solar time by means of the plane of polarisation of the sky at the north pole. It is not easy to describe this most ingenious application, which promises to be of the utmost importance as a practical point; but the principle upon which it depends partakes of that simplicity by which, almost invariably, all important discoveries are distinguished. The maximum point of the polarisation of light in the northern sky is always a point which represents an angle made between it, the sun, and the eye of the observer; thus, as the sun progresses in its apparent path, this point constantly varies, and by examining the sky for this with Professor Wheatstone's instrument, we may always discover the true solar time.

In the Chemical Section the most important communication was one by Dr. Percy, on the extraction of silver from its ores, by the wet way, which was thought to be of so much value to the silver refiner, that the paper is to be printed entire in the Transactions.

Professor Rogers, of Pennsylvania, brought three communications from his brothers of Virginia College, of great chemical value, particularly one which proved that the diamond could be converted into carbonic acid by the action of chromic acid. By this means an examination of steel-graphite and plumbago can also be more effectually made than by any known method.

Dr. Smith's report on the air and water of towns drew attention to the numerous sources of deterioration to which these important elements of health are subjected. The conclusion to which he arrives is, that organic matter is a more common source of impurity than any gaseous compound. This report, which it is impossible to give any abstract of, will appear entire in the Transactions.

Dr. Moffatt communicated a paper on the presence of ozone in the atmosphere, and sent a great number of test papers which had been changed by the presence of the curious gaseous body in the air. It has been observed by Dr. Moffatt, and also by Professor Schönbein, that any increase of ozone was invariably attended with catarrhal affections. It therefore became important to examine this question with great care.

In the Geological Section, Professor Rogers created great interest by a very elaborate description of the geological formations of Pennsylvania.

In the Zoological and Botanical Section, the Sub-Section of Ethnology, and the Section of Statistics, there was scarcely any communication of popular interest.

On Tuesday evening, L. L. Dillwyn, Esq., the Mayor of Falmouth, entertained about two hundred of the principal members of the British Association at the Assembly Rooms, where a dinner exhibiting the most profuse hospitality was most elegantly served. The usual toasts were drunk and responded to, and the entertainment enlivened by some most exquisite performances on the national instrument, the harp, much to the delight of all assembled. From the dinner table the company retired at an early hour to the School-rooms, where the conversazioni were held.

WEDNESDAY

On Wednesday, as the Geological and Natural History Sections were unable to finish the business before them, they each held meetings; but as a great number of members had left Swansea that morning by the Lord Beresford steamer, and others were examining the works in the neighbourhood, the Sections were very slightly attended, and the papers communicated were of small general interest.

A dinner, given by Lewis W. Dillwyn, Esq., who is himself one of the oldest members of the Royal Society, may be regarded as the close of the proceedings.

The last General Meeting was held in the afternoon, when it appeared, that, notwithstanding the inferiority of Swansea as respects population, this meeting has added considerably to the funds of the Association.

In concluding our notice of an Association which numbers among its members all the most eminent men in every department of physical and natural science, we cannot but express our satisfaction at the business-like character of this meeting. It is true that it has not startled the world by the announcement of any great discovery; but it will be found, upon examination, to present a fair average rate of progress. The vulnerable points have been less apparent than hitherto; and by the exclusion from the sections of all subjects which were not purely scientific, and by particularly avoiding those communications which have frequently been introduced as mere trading advertisements, of which we witnessed but one, that on gutta percha, which in our opinion should not have been received, the Association has placed itself upon exalted ground, and enlarged the sphere of hope for the future, and given a promise of still increasing utility.

THE TOWN AND FORT OF MOOLTAN.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent with the annexed plan and details of the scene of our recent successes in India.

The inside of the Fort of Mooltan has been in a ruinous state since it was sacked by the Sikhs; but the outside walls, which are faced with masonry, are in good repair, and remarkable for their great height and numerous round towers or bastions. The Fort is built on an artificial eminence formed by the ruins of an ancient city, and rising very abruptly in the midst of an extensive alluvial plain subject to the periodical inundations of the Chenab, it appears from a distance an imposing object. The ditch is easily inundated from the river which flows near it during the rainy season. There are four gateways and one wicket to the Fort, and a spacious area between it and the town, with which it is connected by a wall, making the two form a complete fortification. Beyond extend the suburbs, excepting on the north side, where the ground is cultivated; here is a large brick-kiln, the site of which, together with the Masjid of Shums-ool-Tabreeze, on the north-east angle of the Fort, and nearly equidistant from it, afford favourable points of attack to a besieging army.

When visited by Captain (now Sir C. M.) Wade's mission to Bhawulpore, in 1838, the Sikh garrison consisted of only 350 men. It was taken by surprise in 1810, by Maharajah Ranjeet Singh, after three sieges and a noble defence made by Moozuffer Khan, the Afghan ruler of the place, who, with two of his sons, died fighting in the breach. Two others, named Surfaraz Khan and Zoolfeear Khan, were wounded, and taken to Lahore, where they received a pension and honourable treatment from the Sikh Government. The Fort itself is a strong place, and was kept by the Maharajah with great jealousy from the inspection of strangers; but a private order by a special messenger was sent to Dewan Sawan Mull, then the Governor of Mooltan, to show it to Sir C. M. Wade during his visit. At that time there were few guns mounted on the works. The principal buildings inside are the Mahal, or palace of the late Chief; and two Mosheers, or tombs of Mahomedan saints, one of great celebrity, in the area of which is the tomb of Moozuffer Khan, to whose valour Ranjeet Singh paid a worthy tribute, when, some years afterwards, in visiting the Fort, he went to the tomb, and paying his respects to the memory of the deceased, said "Ah! Moozuffer Khan, you were a brave man, you would not leave the fort alive, nor have you dead."

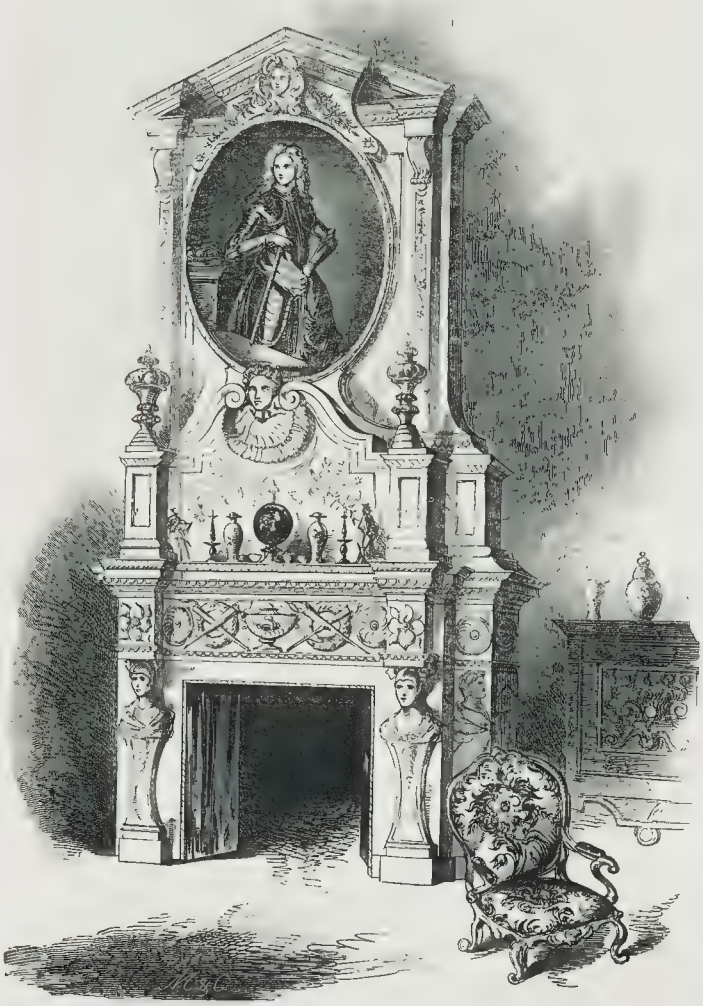
The Fort also contains a famous Hindoo idol, to which, and the tombs of the Mahomedan saints, pilgrims of both sects annually resort in great numbers from the neighbouring countries.

In the time of the Emperor Aurungzebe, when the navigation of the Indus was open, vessels of 200 tons burden used to have ascended to Mooltan by that river from the sea. It is now an emporium of trade between Central Asia and the north-western provinces of India, the communication with which has lately been improved by the construction of wells and caravanserais across the Indian desert, through the territories of Bhawlulpur, the Nawab of Bhawulpur, and the Lugs of Jhanjeana, one of the states of Hurreeana.

Sir C. M. Wade remained encamped before the place for several days to inquire into its commercial resources and influence with the adjacent states of Beejwa, Siwana, Khan, and Mutlaubur; the object of his mission being, on the accession with that of Lieutenant-Colonel, now Sir H. Pottinger to Scinde, to assist to form treaties with the native states on the banks of the Indus and Sutlej, and re-opening the navigation of those rivers; and to encourage the merchants of those countries to adopt that route, which had, of late years, become almost extinct, from the predatory habits of the people consequent on the anarchy which followed the dissolution of the Mogul Empire.

Mooltan and Talloomba, the ruins of an old city on the Ravee, about ten miles from Mooltan, are rivals for the honour of being the site of the stronghold of the Malli (of Alexander's historians, before which that conqueror was opposed and wounded by an arrow in his breast.—(Vide Quintus Curtius.)

THE SALE AT STOWE.



CHIMNEY-PIECE IN THE TAPESTRY-ROOM, WITH PORTRAIT OF FIELD-MARSHAL VISCOUNT COBHAM, BY KNELLER.

THE Sale at Stowe has this week been of the utmost interest, from so many articles of the richest design and greatest rarity having been submitted to public competition. In many instances, the prices realised have been very high, especially in the Sèvres china and majolica ware. A great quantity of the carved and gilded furniture and inlaid tables have been disposed of, and chiefly at good prices.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS

In this Number of the Journal shew various interesting items in the sale, and we resume our brief notices of them, and of the general contents of Stowe House.

The scene depicted at page 120 is one of the picturesque glories of "the Gardens" -the Lake and a Palladian Bridge; and that at page 122, the Temple of Ancient Virtue; both drawn by Mr. Dodgson.

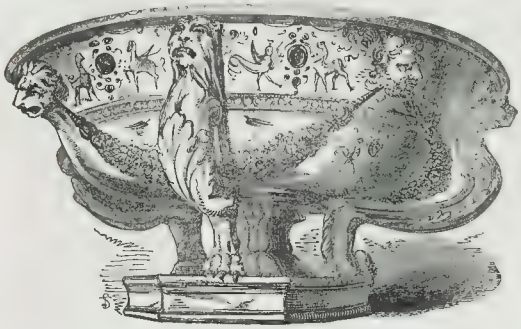
One of the Engravings represents the fire-place in the Tapestry Drawing-room; the best specimen of its kind in the house: in the oval compartment over the fire-place is a portrait, as the inscription on the picture asserts, of Richard Temple, Lord Viscount Cobham, Field-Marshal, &c.; it is a fair representation of the warrior. On the mantel-shelf were ranged many pieces of fine old Dresden, and an ancient blue glass bottle, richly mounted in metal gilded—a most elaborate and beautiful work.

The bust of Prior (lot 751) excited much notice, and the biddings for it were very spirited—Mr. Graves, of Pall-mall, endeavouring to gain it, against the biddings of the auctioneer, who was understood to have a commission for it from Sir Robert Peel: Sir Robert, however, became the purchaser for the sum of 130 guineas, and the bust will be highly prized by him, as he has in his collection the companion bust of Pope, which originally belonged to Mr. Bindley, of the Stamp-Office. This bust is one of the best works of the famous Roubiliac, and has, perhaps, never been surpassed for delicacy of chiselling and truly characteristic expression. It forms the subject of one of our Illustrations.

The beautiful oviform vase represents lot 1240. The vase is of white marble, about twenty inches in height, and is spirally fluted, whilst round the body of the vase is a frieze representing female figures dancing. This frieze is most exquisitely sculptured, the figures being chiselled with great delicacy.

Two arm chairs (lot 2 3), made of solid ivory, quaintly carved and of fine specimens of Eastern luxury—are also represented in our pages. They were the property of Tippoo Saib, and were sent by the celebrated Warren Hastings as a present to Queen Charlotte—at the time, we believe, when his trial was impending. The chairs have five legs, and they and the backs are ornamented with carving, in low relief, and partly gilded; on the ends of the arms are the tigers' heads of Tippoo. These objects of vertu sold for forty two guineas.

A cistern of majolica or Raffaelle ware (lot 641), of most magnificent design and proportions, is one of our subjects. The bowl of the cistern rests on legs, formed as chimeræ, and is ornamented with festoons and lions' heads boldly mounted, and its surface is painted with arabesques: on the inside, a subject from Roman history is delineated. This superb cistern fetched the sum of sixty-four guineas, on the fifth day's sale.



MAJOLICA OR RAFFAELLE WARE CISTERN.

BUST OF THE POET PRIOR, BY ROUBILIAC.

The tankards represented in our pages are fine specimens of carving in ivory; they are lots 638 and 641 of plate. Lot 638, a small tankard, represents a battle between the Centaurs and Lapithæ, and is beautifully executed, the roundness of the limbs of the figures being produced with marvellous delicacy. The borders, above and below the battle piece, are admirably sculptured; and the whole is a very fine example of the work of the early part of the 17th century. The tankard, lot 641, which is considerably larger than its neighbour, is of a much more recent date, the style of carving as well as subject indicating the latter end of the 17th century as the period of its manufacture. The incident represented upon it is a conflict between the Austrians and Turks, and the figures are carved with very great spirit and expression. Both these tankards are mounted in silver gilt, and the mountings are in fine taste.

SCULPTURE AND BRONZES.

On Monday last the antique and modern sculptures, hitherto scattered through the rooms and in the corridors and hall, were disposed of, and some of them realised high prices. Some of the marbles are of the highest class, and all of them interesting.

A statue of Venus arranging her hair, and known as the Marine Venus, is the most beautiful of the productions of the chisel, and is of great purity of outline and wonderful softness and delicacy of workmanship, if we except a portion of the arms, the hands, and head, which seem of modern character: they are, perhaps, restorations, and certainly inferior to the rest of the statue in point of expression. This statue was found in excavating the Baths of Agrippa, at Rome, and brought to England by the present Duke of Buckingham, when Marquis of Chandos. The competition for this statue was highly exciting: at 157 guineas the hammer fell, and Mr. Gruner became the purchaser, it is reported, on behalf of Prince Albert.

A group of three female figures supporting a vase, on a truncated column of grey marble, is highly interesting as a relic of antiquity; but, though good, is decidedly of inferior execution to the Venus. A goat tied to a tree is a piece of very beautiful Grecian sculpture, and full of spirit—the animal endeavouring to release his horns from the bands which confine him to the tree. An antique chimera, in white marble, is remarkable for the singularity of its form, and presents an ancient testudo, or lyre, supported on the outspread wings of a swan. This singular work of art was found in a tomb near the Villa Adriana, by the Marquis of Chandos. The antique Roman sarcophagus (lot 745), a representation of a portion of which we gave in our last week's Journal, a very fine work of art, sold for 31½ guineas. Two other sarcophagi, inferior to the one just referred to in delicacy of workmanship, though highly interesting, sold for sixteen guineas each. One of them, lot 746, was discovered by the present Duke, when Marquis of Chandos, in 1817, on the Via Appia, near the tomb of Cecilia Metella; the sculpture upon it representing a group of figures lamenting over a corpse, placed on a couch in the centre of the piece. The other sarcophagus was ornamented with figures of Cupids hunting wild animals.

Two white marble vases, each three feet ten inches high, of exquisite design and elaborate decoration, sold for small sums considering their beauty, only seventeen and twenty-two guineas respectively; but this may be accounted for by the circumstance that both have had several pieces of marble let into them to restore fragments lost or injured. The first one, lot 738, purchased by Lord Nugent, has twisted handles of exquisite form, springing from masks and on the front of the bowl of the vase is a bas-relief of a faun pursued by a bacchante; the same subject, altered, being repeated on the reverse. The socle of the vase is sculptured with rich foliage. The companion vase, lot 739, has handles formed of serpents; the bowl is ornamented with Cupids intermingled with vines in relief, beautifully wrought, and the neck of the vase has the Grecian honeysuckle pattern upon it. Both these vases were discovered in the Villa Adriana, and have been engraved by Piranesi. There were also two beautifully sculptured and well designed figures of small size, one representing a faun carrying a goat on his shoulders, and the other a bacchante holding a young faun, which sold for rather large amounts, and are now the property of Mr. Beaufoy, of South Lambeth. The head of the faun is full of expression, and well carried out. A fine statue of Hygeia, of full life size, deserves some mention on account of its beauty; but, unfortunately, the head and hands are modern restorations. Lord Nugent was the purchaser of this lot for 51 guineas. Some antique busts, of no great merit as works of art, realised but poor prices. Of the modern specimens of sculpture, the head of Prior, by Roubiliac, before mentioned, is unquestionably the finest work of art. The numerous other busts, chiefly by Cornolle and Trentanova, having no claims to notice further than as mementos of departed statesmen, and members of the Buckingham and Grenville families, met the usual fate of secondary works of art in realising but small sums, with two exceptions, the busts of William Pitt and Philip Stanhope Earl Chesterfield, which Sir Robert Peel obtained a

TEMPLE OF ANCIENT VIRTUE, AT STOWE.

£27 6s. and £28 7s. The others were mostly purchased by the Earl of Ellesmere, Earl Bathurst, Lord Chandos, Sir A. Grant, &c. Two groups, one by Scheemakers, the other Delvaux, which once adorned Caronn, the seat of the great Duke of Chandos, were sold for moderate sums, 89 and 82 guineas each. The groups represented Venus and Adonis, and Vertumnus and Pomona.

Amongst the modern figure pieces in marble, which, by the way, were chiefly copied from the antique, or celebrated works, the small copy of Canova's admirable recling figure of the Princess Pauline Borghese, Napoleon's sister, from the delicacy of handling and truthfulness of imitation, attracted great notice and spirited competition; the copy is the work of Trentanove, and Mr. Nathan purchased it for Mr. Beaufoy for the sum of 71 guineas. We may have observe that this fine example of female beauty, and exquisite art, was sold with the statues were also sold some magnificent bronzes; the truly grand group by Carbonneaux, of the celebrated group of the Laocoon, the size of the original antique, from its masterly execution of design, and finishing upwards, realised £112 as may be supposed, it is a splendid specimen of bronze casting, and merited the high price it obtained.

CHINA.

The specimens of Sèvres porcelain already sold are of the chest and most varied character; and many of the coffee and chocolate cups and saucers are of wonderfully exquisite finish and detail. On last Monday's sale it was put up at 150 guineas, and the biddings quickly reached to 460, Mr. Hume of Barnes-street and Mr. Brown of University-street being the principal competitors; and, after much excitement, Mr. Hume secured it at the sum of 540 guineas. It is believed to be purchased for the Duke of Hamilton. The bronze copy, the size of the original, of the well known and beautiful figure by Giovanni di Bologna, of a young rising and spinning upwards, realised £112 as may be supposed, it is a splendid specimen of bronze casting, and merited the high price it obtained.

PORCELAIN

Two repositories for bijouterie, [illegible] 463, are most exquisite specimens of carving in wood. They are of pear tree, and the pier tables supporting them, are the finest design and delicacy of sculpture it is possible to imagine. The tops of the tables are square, ornamented with masks and trophies; and on a centre-piece, supported by a framework of elaborate and fantastic shape from leg to leg of the table, is a family of arms of the most beautiful workmanship. The repositories themselves are scarcely in keeping with the design of the tables; for though of admirable character and workmanship, the rigid horizontal lines of mouldings in the three tiers of shelves, of which they are composed, and the pillars tapering to the base, scarcely harmonise with the exquisitely flowing lines of ornamentation of the tables: they are, however, together, fine specimens of the decorative furniture of the last thirty years and more.

Several of the most celebrated of the pieces of furniture, &c. from Fonthill Abbey have been conspicuous amongst the adornments at Stowe; and amongst other things, a cabinet of ebony, inlaid with tortoise-shell and ormolu of a temple, is deserving of especial mention. The centre compartment has a pediment; and four pillars of rose antico support an upper story, above which is the frieze of lapis lazuli and between the pillars are groups of Neptune and marine deities, with figures and animals in relief, within circular-headed niches. The side compartments have drawers in them, the fronts of which are composed of lapis lazuli, and enriched with rubies and emeralds. Terminal figures of chased ormolu add to the enrichments of the whole; and the cabinet stands on an open frame-work of six legs, the upper portion of which has Lelarge crimson cups in — Mr. Beckford's symbol. Three small tables, or rather slabs, of pietre dura, in very plain and unornamented stands, were also from Fonthill: they displayed on their surfaces groups of shells, coral and pearl, and butterflies and flowers, in different coloured jaspers, with lapis lazuli, &c. inlaid with great taste and effect.

Amongst the many rarities which have graced the state rooms, the beautiful tables of malachite, having been removed from their splendid position, must not be lightly passed, all of them being magnificent specimens of art, and one in particular, in which, in the centre of the malachite, is a boar hunt, in mosaic, of the most surpassing delicacy of tint and finish. The tops of these tables, or vine leaves, in mosaic, is no less beautiful than the central piece. The tables of inland marbles, pietre dure, &c., are of charming variety of style and pattern. One table, in which the colours of malachite and lapis lazuli are chiefly used, is extremely rich in effect; the prismatic hues of the feldspar harmonising delightfully with the rich and tortuous veining of the malachite. All of these tables fetched exceedingly high prices, and indeed, they deserved the utmost of admiration of all who examined them. They were all mounted on stands carved and gilded.

We now proceed to specify the prices realised for some of the finest lots.

Lot 483 was the great feature on Friday. It consisted of an oviform vase, painted with a battle after the most beautiful design by Raffaelle. Its form is thought to approach in beauty to that of the Portland Vase. The subject was admired by the late Mr. Beckford, and the Duke of Buckingham always valued it as one of his choicest relics. After much competition it was purchased by Mr. Redfern for 21 guineas.

Lot 568. A pair of beautiful columns and pedestals of alabaster sculpture in the most perfect antique Greek taste, with a date—1738. These columns were brought from the Abbey of Panthemont, in French Flanders, since they formed part of a shrine destroyed by the French army under Napoleon. The fragments were purchased some years since by Mr. Webb, of Bond-street, who sold this pair of columns to the Marquis of Chandos from Flanders, from which circumstance, there can be no doubt they are of Italian origin, the beauty of their design indicating the pure style of the artists of that country. The lot was ultimately sold for 52 guineas.

The following lot (682) on Monday excited much interest: A magnificent octangular hall lantern, the frame of ormolu, mounted by a ducal coronet, and glazed with coats of arms and crests of the Earls of Buckingham, and marked the history of the Buckingham family, and is of the most beautiful manufacture. It is stated it realised was perfectly ridiculous, when compared with what it must have cost. The lot number is 1 in the catalogue. Fonthill Abbey is engraved, in one of our Illustrated Numbers of the Royal Visit, in 1845.—See No. 143.)

Lot 809. A beautiful table, with a circular slab of Florentine mosaic in pietre dure 2 inches, with a border of ormolu in a carved pedestal of white marble and oriental alabaster inlaid with birds and flowers. Sold for 45 guineas.

Lot 811. A superb table with a slab of verde antique, [illegible] 2 inches, with a border of ormolu in a carved pedestal of white marble in the Greek taste, with bulls' heads and festoons. The legs and front ornamented with slabs of verde antique. Sold to Mr. Redfern at 54 guineas; Mr. Manson, who was bidding, declining it to be one of the cheapest on the list of purchases.

Lot 813 A magnificent table, composed of an oblong slab of jasper and fillets of lapis lazuli and rosso antico, with egg and anchor mouldings of Carrara marble. Mr. Redfern, purchaser, 50 guineas.

Lot 817. A table, the slab of malachite of the most beautiful description. In the centre is a boar hunt in mosaic of the finest Roman work, with a border of masks, lizards, and vases, also in fine stone mosaic. The pedestal is carved in very handsome old taste. Mr. Redfern, 130 guineas.

Lot 824. A beautiful vase, formed of a noble block of rock crystal, of compressed oviform, deeply engraved with arabesques, in fine old Italian taste. This beautiful vase was purchased by Messrs. Garrard for 40 guineas: it was engraved in our Journal, last week.

Lot 851. A superb table of marqueterie with carved legs and mounted with masks in ormolu. The top of this beautiful table is ornamented with the subject of Alexander and Diogenes, in mother-of-pearl and coloured woods. Mr. Redfern, 150 guineas.

On Wednesday, there were several lots of Oriental and European table china, of a great rarity. Among a hundred and three pieces were marqueterie and bulls. Among the greater rarities were: —Lot 881. A marble bowl and cover, with upright handles of Oriental enamel, consisting of sacred symbols on copper, the legs, elephants' heads; the mountings ornamented by superb heads of Ganesh's head. This magnificent bowl is, in truth, a censer, once used in the celebrated Joss-house in Golden Island, and brought from Nanco by Captain Mile Johnson, R.N., who commanded the ship Belle Isle in the late Chinese expedition. It was given by the gallant captain to the Duke of Buckingham. The censer is formed of the richest imperial enamel, with the five-clawed dragon, and it is an object of great curiosity and beauty. It was sold for 60 guineas to Mr. Owen, of Bond-street.

Lot 882. A pair of superb candelabras, the stem and pedestal of Sèvres blue en fond, mounted with gilt metal, the pedestals supported by bulls' heads at the handles, and feet of marine horses, from the vases spring branches of poppies, with nozzles for five lights each, eight feet six inches high. They were purchased by Mr. Martin for Mr. Fores, for 230 guineas.

Lot 1012. A beautiful oval tank of glass, said to have been formerly the property of Queen Anne. This was bought by Mr. Stone, for £11.

Lot 1021. A fine armorial, of the time of Louis XV. of turtle-shell and buhl, with subjects from "Ovid" in brmolu in relief, in the pure taste of Louis XIV. This was the principal feature in the state dressing-room. It was, after a sharp competition, knocked down for 45 guineas, to Mr Redfern.

Next week we shall resume our Illustrations

THE SUGAR TRADE IN FRANCE.—The Administration of the Indirect Taxes has published the returns of the produce and consumption of beet-root sugar during the last season, from which it appears that 308 manufactories were in operation on the 1st of August last, that the quantity of sugar manufactured amounted to 68,759,965 kilogrammes, and that sold for consumption to 11,169,162

ELDERLY OF the thirty-seven policemen [illegible] on the assassination of General de Bréa and his aide-de-camp are to be [illegible] by a court-martial, and the [illegible] others have been ordered to be transported. It has been ascertained that the aide-de-camp was shot at the moment at which [illegible] unbuttoning his vest from the head, displayed a fine gold chain to which a gold watch was attached. The insurgents then cried "To death with him! to death!" The watch and chain have disappeared.

PROCRASTINATIONS.

If Fortune with a smiling face
Strew roses on our way,
When shall we stoop to pick them up?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But should she frown with face of care,
And talk of coming sorrow,
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those who've wrong'd us own their faults,
And kindly pity us,
When shall we listen and forgive?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But, if stern Justice urge rebuke,
And warmth from Memory borrow,
When shall we chide—if chide we dare?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If those to whom we owe a debt
Are harm'd unless we pay,
When shall we struggle to be just?
To-day, my love, to-day.

But if our debtors sue for grace,
On pain of ruin thorough,
When shall we grant the boon they seek?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

If Love, estranged, should once again
Her genial smile display,
When shall we kiss her proffer'd lips?
To-day, my love, to-day.
But, if she would indulge regret,
Or dwell with sprightly sorrow,
When shall we weep—if weep we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

For virtuous acts and harmless joys
The minutes will not stay;
We've always time to welcome them,
To-day, my love, to-day.
But Love, Resentment, anger, woes,
And unavailing Sorrow,
Come far too soon, if they appear
To-morrow, love, to-morrow.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

On Sunday morning the Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the younger branches of the Royal family, and by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg, promenaded early in the grounds and park at Osborne. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness, attended by the Lady-in-Waiting and Gentlemen of the Household, attended Divine service at Whippingham Church, the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Protheroe.

On Monday morning the very unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty and his Royal Highness, or any of the Royal Family, from taking their accustomed exercise. His Serene Highness the Prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg and Prince Victor Hohenlohe took leave of their Majesties and the Princes, and left Osborne. His Serene Highness returns immediately to Germany. The Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg and the Princesses Elisa, Adelaide, and Feodora remain at Osborne.

[illegible] the Queen and Prince Albert, with the guests and family, attended the regatta at Cowes.

On Wednesday morning the Queen and Prince took their usual early walk, and the younger branches of the Royal family walked and rode in the grounds at Osborne, after the distinguished visitors at present remaining at Osborne. The [illegible] dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anne Maria Dawson, and the Baroness de Speth

The Queen held a Privy Council on Friday (yesterday) at her Majesty's marine residence, Osborne, Isle of Wight, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

TUTOR TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.—It is rumoured in well-informed quarters, that the choice of a tutor during the early period of the Prince of Wales's education has fallen upon one of the Assistant Masters of Eton College, from whose name the engagement of the Royal Duke, as well as the confidence of parents, the best results may be anticipated in the more prominent sphere to which it is proposed to transfer him.

THE NEW FARMER.—The Duke of [illegible] of the New Forest, has received during the week at Minstead Manor House, near Lyndhurst, on [illegible] C. Compton, Esq., one of the members for South Hants. His Royal Highness was attended, as far as the weather permitted, daily exercise in different parts of the forest, in the affairs of which he appears much interested.

SATURDAY (this day) Prince Albert enters his 29th year. The day is to be celebrated at her Majesty's residence in the Isle of Wight, with more than ordinary effect. A rural and marine fête, similar to that given in celebration of the birthday of Lord's birthday, last week, but on a more extended scale, is to be given; and, to guard against the inclemency of the weather during the present, a number of artisans in the Lord Chamberlain's department, at Windsor Castle, have been busily engaged for some days past in repairing and refitting a number of tents and marquees recently brought from the Pavilion at Brighton.

WINDSOR THEATRICALS. We are informed that the private theatrical performances which are to take place at Windsor Castle are now finally arranged. They are to begin on the Thursday after Christmas, and are to be continued on the four Thursdays succeeding. The first piece will be "King Lear," which will be followed by the "Merchant of Venice," "All is the Wrong," and the "stranger." The entertainments are to conclude with the "Spoiled Child," a play of the "Housekeeper," with a farce of Mr. Kenney's, probably "Sweethearts and Wives." The whole is to be under the management of Mr. Charles Kean, and the actors will be "picked men" from the different London companies, so that the plays may be cast as well as possible.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

A vague feeling of uneasiness pervaded the Money Market during the week, arising from the critical state of the harvest, as well as the still unsettled position of affairs in France, Italy, and the North of Germany. The probability of the harvest being considerably deficient, and the general inefficiency of the harvest here, at a period when, without the interposition of such a powerful cause, the exchanges are already in favour of the exportation of gold to Hamburgh, Paris, and New York, naturally creates alarm. It is true that any pressure arising from a restriction of the currency, induced by this cause, is not to be immediately felt; but the events of last year are so keenly remembered, that the fear of a recurrence of the same kind of misfortune will run any risk may lock up capital to so great an extent as to create an artificial scarcity where none actually exists. That a feeling of preparing for such an event is increasing there cannot be any doubt. Large sales of Exchequer Bills and other floating securities have been quietly making for some weeks past; hence the gradual decline in prices at a period when capital, as at present, so over-abundant. These considerations may have influenced the English market during the week, creating heaviness, and causing a slight decline in prices. On Monday Consols opened at 85¾ for money, but slightly improved during the day, closing at 85¾ to ⅞ for money on the September account. This price continued on Tuesday, until the sale of £100,000 reduced quotations to 85⅝; but a rally afterwards closed prices at ⅞ for money, and ⅞ to ¾ for Account. On Wednesday Consols opened at the improved price of 86⅛ for Money, and 86⅜ to ½ for Account; not varyin[illegible]

Thursday was a dull day, and [illegible] hence to 86¾ to ⅞ was current.

Bank Stock, 196½; Reduced, 85¾; Consols, 86⅛; New Three per Cents, [illegible] per Cents, 87½; Long Annuities, to expire Jan. 5, 1859, 8 15-16. India Stock, 264; Ditto, Bonds, £3,000, 93; Ditto, Small, 88. Exchequer Bills—£1000, 2¾d, March, 32s; June, 25s; £500, June, 25s. Small, June, 23.

Both Monday and Tuesday were nearly blank days in the Foreign Market, business being limited to a few transactions in Spanish Stock, and consequently producing no change in prices with the exception of Brazilian, which advanced to 72. There was rather more business on Wednesday, but the alterations were but trifling, and closed much the same as on Tuesday. The only interesting topic has been the communication from the Mexican finance Minister to the agents of the bondholders, that no portion of the first instalment of the indemnity from the United States has been handed over to defray the arrears of the solemn contract made with the bondholders two years back, and within now amount to 5,000,000 dollars. The Finance Minister does not question the claim, but, unfortunately, there are three years' arrears on the receipt of the letter to which his communication was an answer, Congress had passed a law "prohibiting" the government from disposing of the amount in the manner proposed. Thus, between the Finance Minister and Congress, no probability of a dividend can be for a moment entertained. At the close of the week prices were Mexican Five, 1846, Account, 19½; Peruvian, 80; Portuguese 4 per cent, 33; Ditto, 5 per Cents, 19½; Spanish, Three per Cents, [illegible]

[illegible]—Half per Cent., 44¾, Ditto, Four per Cent. Cert., 71.

[illegible] railway shares last day during the past week have not produced any increase of confidence on the part of the public, nor does such an event seem probable, until shareholders display more decision in compelling directors to close the capital accounts, and thus test what real dividend can be paid. The branch lines, amalgamations, and leasing of lines, at large profit, to scheming directors, have most seriously damaged the best of the established lines, but not past repair, if shareholders will strenuously exert themselves to prevent any further calls, whether in the shape of extensions or [illegible] till this be done, the share list will display the same depression that characterises the annexed quotations of bargains last week:

SATURDAY MORNING. There was but little doing in the English Funds [illegible]; Consols quoting, during the day, 86⅛ to ¼, and closing at ⅛ to ¼. The Foreign Market offered no new feature, but shares were a trifle [illegible]

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Scarcely any English wheat has been received fresh up to our markets this week, coastwise or by land carriage. To-day the show of samples was trifling at the entire exclusion of foreign, and the demand, from the somewhat active, at an advance in the quotations of Monday last of fully 1s per quarter, and at which a good clearance was effected. In free foreign wheat only a moderate business was transacted, yet the late improvement in value was well supported. A large quantity of wheat is said changed hands, at 1s to 2s per quarter more money. All kinds of barley were in good request, and the turn higher. There was an improved sale for malt, the prices of which rose quite 1s per quarter, with a limited quantity on offer. The show of oats was small. Generally speaking the oat trade was firm, and the currencies advanced 1s per quarter. Both beans and peas were 1s per quarter dearer. Indian corn was 1s to 2s per quarter, and small in per barrel. Flour—A steady business was done to-day in flour, at my full price.

LIVERPOOL, English wheat, 2700 barley, 330; oats, 200 Irish oats, —. Foreign, wheat, 2400 barley, 220, oats, 3,960 beans, —. Flour, 1300 sacks; and, 1,070 quarters. English—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 51s to 57s; ditto, white, 57s to 63s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 50s to 56s; ditto, white, 56s to 62s; grinding barley, 24s to 26s; ditto, fine, 27s to 28s; distilling ditto, 29s to 31s; malting ditto, 32s to 36s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 58s to 60s; brown ditto, 46s to 52s; Hampshire and Wilts, 52s to 54s; Chevalier, 62s to 68s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 20s to 22s; potato ditto, 22s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 19s; ditto, white, 19s to 23s; fine Youghal, new, 22s to 24s; ditto, old, 24s to —; grey peas, 33s to 42s; maple, 36s to 42s; white, 41s to —; beans, 42s to 48s, per quarter. Town-made flour 35s to 38s. Suffolk, 31s to 44s. Stockton and Yorkshire, 40s to 42s per 280 lbs. Foreign—Dantzic [illegible]

[illegible] to 40s per bbl.

The Seed Market.—There is a better demand for canary, tares and rapeseed, at weekly prices. In all other seeds as well as cakes, nothing doing.

LINSEED, English, about 2700 barley, 330; oats, 200 Irish oats, —. Foreign, [illegible] barley, 220, oats, 3,960 beans, —. Flour, 1300 sacks; and, 1,070 quarters. English—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 51s to 57s; ditto, white, 57s to 63s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 50s to 56s; ditto, white, 56s to 62s; grinding barley, 24s to 26s; ditto, fine, 27s to 28s; distilling ditto, 29s to 31s; malting ditto, 32s to 36s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 58s to 60s; brown ditto, 46s to 52s; Hampshire and Wilts, 52s to 54s; Chevalier, 62s to 68s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 20s to 22s; potato ditto, 22s to 24s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 19s; ditto, white, 19s to 23s; fine Youghal, new, 22s to 24s; ditto, old, 24s to —; grey peas, 33s to 42s; maple, 36s to 42s; white, 41s to —; beans, 42s to 48s, per quarter. Town-made flour 35s to 38s. Suffolk, 31s to 44s. Stockton and Yorkshire, 40s to 42s per 280 lbs. Foreign—Dantzic [illegible] per bbl.

Imperial Gazette.—Wheat, 51s 0d; barley, 30s 3d; oats, 21s 5d; rye, 31s 11d; beans, 39s 7d; peas, 36s 2d.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 6d, barley, 29s 10d; oats, 20s 11d; rye, 31s 11d; beans, 39s 7d; peas, 36s 1d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 49s 6d, barley, 29s 10d; oats, 20s 11d; rye, 31s 11d; beans, 39s 7d; peas, 36s 1d.

Duties on Foreign Grain.—Wheat, 4s 0d; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 2s 0d; rye, 3s 0d; beans, 3s 0d; peas, 3s 0d

TEA.—On the whole, a steady business is doing in this market; but we have no improvement to notice in the quotations.

SUGAR.—The good-looking parcels of raw sugar are firm, at extreme prices; but the middling qualities are a slow sale. Refined goods are quoted at 51s to 52s for brown, and 53s 6d to 54s for fine and finest lumps.

Coffee.—Our market is in a somewhat sluggish state, at last week's alteration in value.

Rice.—Prices remain as before, and the demand is limited.

Provisions.—The supplies of Dutch butter are large. Most kinds are a slow sale at late [illegible]. Fine Friesland is quoted at 90s to 94s; fine Holland, Kiel, and Holstein, 80s to 88s; [illegible] and sprits, 56s to 84s per cwt. Irish butter is a dull inquiry.

[illegible] Carrick, 80s to 84s, and Waterford and Dublin, 8[illegible]

[illegible] Limerick, 80s to 84s per cwt. Bacon is a dull sale, at 52s to 56s for Irish, and 54s to 58s for fine Iowas. Hams are in good request, at 60s to 72s for fine Irish, and 70s to 80s for fine Iowas. Pork is in fair demand, at late prices. Lard is in moderate request, at 48s to 52s per cwt. Waxed cloths, 12s to 13s per piece.

Cheese.—All kinds of cheese are in steady request, at 44s to 44s 3d per cwt. for P.Y.C. on the spot. For forward delivery sales have taken place at 43s 6d per cwt.

Oils.—There is a better feeling in this market, but we have no alteration to notice in prices.

Spirits.—Rum is very slow in sale, and in some instances the quotations have receded 1d per gallon. Brandy and geneva are quite without alteration.

Hay and Straw.—Old meadow hay is worth £2 2s to £3 10s; new ditto, £2 8s to £3 10s; old clover, £4 0s to £5 5s; new ditto, £3 0s to £4 0s; and straw, £1 4s to £1 8s per load.

Hops (Friday).—Although most of the reports received this morning represent the weather as favourable for nearly the whole of the plantations in Sussex and Kent, the state of the bine is considered to have somewhat improved. A moderate business is doing in [illegible] at full last week's quotations. However the demand is to a very sluggish [illegible] Duty, £186,000 to £185,000.—Sussex pockets, £2 2s to £2 8s; Weald of Kent, ditto, £3 3s to £3 10s; Mid and East Kent, ditto, £4 8s to £5 5s per cwt.

Coals (Friday).—Hastings's Hartley, 15s; New Tanfield 12s; Tanfield Moor, 14s; Edon Main, 14s; Hetton, 15s; Lambton and Hetton, 15s; Wylam, 14s 6d per ton.

Smithfield (Friday) With beasts the general quality of which was by no means first-rate, the supply was tolerably moderate to-day. On the whole, the beef trade was in very sluggish state, at prices about [illegible] per stone less than were paid on Monday last. The highest figure for the best Scots not exceeding 3s 4d per stone of 8lbs. As well as we can learn, the supply of sheep stock was tolerably extensive. There was a most unfavourable falling off in the number of calves imported into that town on the several preceding Fridays, owing to which the demand for that kind of stock was somewhat active, and in some instances the primest old Downs produced a trifle more money. In trade a decidedly dull one was transacted, at extreme rates of [illegible] The primest of Scots sold at from 3s 8d to 3s 10d per stone. Inferior ditto were very dull at [illegible]

Middling cows sold at from £15 to £18 each, but the primest [illegible]

PARIS FASHIONS.

PARIS FASHIONS.

THE fashions for these latter days of summer must be sought at watering-places, especially in bathing towns; but Paris alone gratifies the thousand caprices of pretty and elegant travellers. In all parts the beautiful emprées receive cases filled not only with barège dresses, ornamented with graduated ribbon velvet, which has the most charming effect; but also ball and evening concert dresses, consisting of tulle, crêpe lisse, or tarlatan, decorated with a wreath of little leaves, blades of asparagus, sprigs of barberry, or bunches of currants, formed of velvet, with or without ligatures of gold and silver cord. These lovely dresses are the more valuable on account of their being equally pleasing by daylight and candle-light. Tarlatan embroidered, in light designs, executed with fancy straw, is a tasteful novelty. These dresses are made very simple; a bodice à trois pièces, trimmed with a berthe, and the skirt composed of three flounces, the first of which falls from the waist. The berthe and the flounces are cut in festoonings of straw "mate," and a light garland of straw flowers ornaments the edge of the berthe and the flounces above the festoonings. Barège dresses are worn with silk slips of the same colour. In the country, and by the sea-side, the most elegant ladies wear straw bonnets à la créole, with deep borders; a simple velvet ribbon is placed round the bonnet; the edges are left loose, and are only trimmed with a straw beading; the strings are of ribbon velvet, and are attached inside the poke, whilst a fastening of flowers or a ribbon rosette suffices to hide the place where the strings are attached.

Our Engraving displays three mises for the country, very distinguée. The first consists of a peignoir, of printed batiste, two shades of pink in stripes formant liserais. This peignoir, made high, is festooned around the throat with a crêle de coq of pink silk. A morning collar and chemisette, a rich silk band, with long ends, fringed; a pink gros de Naples slip, braided; and a morning cap, trimmed with goffered ribbon, and large rosettes at each side, complete the dress.

The second is composed of white muslin, embroidered in wool, with large coloured spots. The mantle, à fabula, is silk, to match the spots on the dress. The bonnet is rice straw, of a round shape, meeting under the chin; a sprig of African nasturtiums ornaments the side.

The third presents us with a dress of taffeta with flounces pinked; the bodice is open, so as to show a chemisette richly embroidered, or trimmed with rows of narrow lace. The mantle is of taffeta d'Italie, with two rows of gimp or braiding, trimmed with a deep fringe of flax tassels. The bonnet is of white crape; a very open shape, with a fall of "tulle illusion;" and bunches of fleurs-de-lis are placed in the interior, with long ringlets.

COLONIZATION OF VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

THE grant of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company formed the subject of a very striking debate in the House of Commons on Friday evening. It appears that the Governor having requested of Government the grant of the British territory west of the Rocky Mountains, and specially of Vancouver's Island, lying along its southern coast, the Colonial Secretary has favoured the application, the justification being that "the island in question has not advantages enough to ensure its voluntary colonization, and that if we did not make provision for occupying it in some manner or other, we should probably be anticipated in such proceedings by parties ready to avail themselves of our neglect."

On Friday, Mr. Christy called the attention of Parliament to the proposed grant, which was opposed by Mr. Gladstone, on the ground that investigation, deliberation, and caution were demanded before the confirmation of the charter. Mr. Hume was of the same opinion; but, eventually, the hon. member's motion for an address to the Crown, to stay the grant of the charter, was lost by 88 to 76.

During the debate, the importance of the island as a field for colonisation was geographically illustrated by more than one of the speakers. Mr. Wyld observed that Vancouver's Island stood in a peculiar position: it was the sentinel of the Pacific Ocean. Its local position, with reference to China, Australia, New Zealand, and other important places, made the possession of it a matter of great moment. Its numerous harbours made it also of great value in that part of the world; and the time, he believed, was not far distant when Vancouver's Island would command the trade with China. Again, its agriculture was by no means to be despised, and it produced spars of the finest quality. Mr. Hume quoted a report from Mr. Douglas, a public officer of the Hudson's Bay Company, which stated there to be an abundance of timber on the island; that its coast was indented with bays and inlets, having good anchorage; that the soil had great capabilities for agriculture; that two-thirds of the whole surface (250 miles long by 80 broad) were prairie land, and other parts were covered with valuable oak and the finest timber; that the climate was mild and pleasant, and that there might be grown upon the land any kind of grain that was raised in England. Sir George Simpson, in a letter dated the 21st of June, 1844, said that the country and the climate were "remarkably fine; that the soil was fit for agriculture and the rearing of domestic cattle; and that the place would become important, and was better calculated for a dépôt for trade than any place in its neighbourhood." Sir George also stated that American whale ships had resorted there, and that he thought it likely to become a dépôt for that purpose, as it was much nearer the fishing ground than California. Mr. Hume added:—"The Columbia river, which the Americans had, was obstructed by bars; Vancouver's Island, so available for trade, was distant from China only a voyage of 15 days. Plenty of men and plenty of capital would go there if the settlers were to be independent. There were coal-fields covering 50 square miles in the island, the coal cropping out at the top and coating but little to raise: it was lamentable, therefore to think that, anxious as we were to promote colonisation by self-governing settlers, we should surrender such an opportunity to this Company."

On Monday night, Lord J. Russell announced that it was intended to accompany the grant of the island with certain conditions which would make it imperative upon them to do all in their power to promote colonisation; and his Lordship added that the concluding of the grant would still be left to a Committee of the Privy Council.

The Hudson's Bay Company have already a settlement upon the island, and a Correspondent has sketched this portion. The fort itself lies some little distance inside the harbour; it is stockaded, with an octagonal tower at two opposite angles, with three or four guns mounted in each. All the buildings were originally inside; but they have been extended outside, and it is intended to enlarge the stockade. To the left is a little village.

The reader will find, by the way, a good account of the Company's settlement in Mr. Ballantyne's lively volume entitled "Hudson's Bay," lately published.

ROYAL WESTERN YACHT CLUB OF ENGLAND.

THE beautiful Vase, of which we give an engraving, has been most graciously presented by her Majesty to the Royal Western Yacht Club, at Plymouth, to be sailed for to-day (the 26th), in honour of the birth-day of his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

HER MAJESTY'S CUP, PRESENTED TO THE ROYAL WESTERN YACHT CLUB OF ENGLAND, 1848.

The Prize is from the establishment of Messrs. Garrard, of the Haymarket. Its height is twenty-eight inches. The design is very characteristic of the scene of the contest. The vessel is a superb claret jug, ornamented with hippocampi, and dolphins at the base.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—It is now understood in official quarters that the business of the session will be brought to a close, if possible, by Friday, the 1st of September, and that her Majesty will prorogue Parliament in person on the following day; and will afterwards proceed to Woolwich and embark on board the Victoria and Albert Royal yacht, when, attended by the Black Eagle, Admiralty steam-yacht, and other vessels composing the Royal squadron, the Queen and Prince Albert will proceed directly to Dundee, en route to Balmoral shooting lodge, Aberdeenshire. Morning Herald.

DEPUTATION TO THE FOREIGN-OFFICE ON THE AFFAIRS OF THE RIVER PLATE.—On Monday a deputation of members of Parliament had an interview with Lord Palmerston, at the Foreign-Office, to present a memorial signed by the Mayor and a number of highly respectable merchants of Manchester, with reference to the continued interruption in the trade of the River Plate. Mr. Milner Gibson read the memorial, which set forth the inconvenience and loss suffered by the long-pending disputes between the states of the River Plate, and urged the Government to take such steps as might be proper to bring about the restoration of peace. Lord Palmerston was very frank in his communications with the deputation. The first attempt, he said, at an arrangement through the negotiation of Lord Howden failed, because Rosas, the President or Dictator of Buenos Ayres, refused to consent to the free navigation of the rivers which empty themselves into the River Plate. Another attempt was made by Captain Gore, who was sent out specially to co-operate with M. Le Gros, the French envoy, and the efforts of these gentlemen seemed to promise success for a time. Oribe, who was possessed of the country outside the city of Monte Video, had consented to certain conditions; and the Monte Videans, who had possession of the city, and who are carrying on the war with him, were also on the point of consenting to a peace, when the news of the French Revolution arrived and induced them to break off negotiations, in the belief that the Republic would give them more decided assistance than Guizot had been willing to render them. The news of the Revolution also had its effect on Rosas. He refused to treat with Le Gros, on the ground that, as a new Government, or no Government at all existed in France, the acts of its envoy might not be sanctioned; and Captain Gore also thought it best to wait till further instructions came from France. The next packet brought no instructions to Le Gros, whereupon that gentleman returned to France. Captain Gore remains at Monte Video; but negotiations are suspended, until the French Government decide upon the course it will take. Lord Palmerston informed the deputation that he would communicate with M. de Beaumont, the French Minister in London, on the subject; and he hoped the two Governments, between whom the most cordial feeling existed, would be able to unite in some more successful effort to bring about a termination of hostilities on the banks of the River Plate.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 333.—Vol. XIII.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1848. [Sixpence.

THE SALE AT STOWE.

The intrusion of the sheriff's officer and the auctioneer into the high places of Aristocracy, the dispersion of all the costly treasures and precious heirlooms of an illustrious House, and the ruin of one of the greatest of the hereditary magnates of the land, are circumstances which are, fortunately, of rare occurrence. That such an event as the sale at Stowe should excite wonder among the vulgar, and sympathy and commiseration among the refined, is but natural. That it should be used to "point a moral and adorn a tale," is natural also; and might not only be natural, but pardonable and praiseworthy, if the tale were told with truth, and in a generous and kindly spirit; and if the moral were pointed without wounding the feelings of the prostrate and defenceless, and adding gall to the bitterness of a sufficient degradation. In alluding to the present downfal of the House of Buckingham—a downfal which has been made notorious by the law and the law's officers, and by those inevitable echoes of every great personal calamity, the gaping curiosity of the idle and the busy comment of the multitude—we wish to point no moral at the Duke of Buckingham's expense, nor to adorn any tale by the recital of his ruin. We wish rather to point out for reprobation the vulgar "snobbishness" of a portion of the press, and of one print in particular, which boasts of following and reflecting public opinion, in making these misfortunes the topics of their ill-natured lucubrations, and of singling out the Duke for the object of their lectures upon the evils of extravagance and the disgrace of insolvency, at a time when he was making all the amends in his power. In an article, remarkable for its bad English, its gross exaggeration, its pedlar spirit, and its contemptuous insolence towards the fallen, the Times talks of this sale as only comparable in importance to "the overthrow of a nation or a throne;" as "a deplorable and most disgraceful event;" and as "an event of peace, than which it has known nothing more serious and lamentable." It then proceeds to read the Duke a lecture, not alone upon his extravagance and folly in running into debt, but upon the means he has chosen to get out of it. We are not of the number of those who think that such subjects are never the fit themes for a journalist. On the contrary, we believe that occasions may frequently arise when great failures, either of Dukes or merchants, ought to be commented upon, for the sake of the public interest, and the amendment of a faulty law. We maintain, however, that the case of the Duke of Buckingham is not one of this kind, and that no journalist had anything to do with it, beyond purveying such news of the sale itself as the public curiosity might reasonably demand. Upon the personal conduct of the Duke of Buckingham the befitting course to take was a respectful silence. No public principle was involved or could be aided by discussion. If the Duke of Buckingham, after having run a career of wild extravagance, had sheltered himself behind his rank and his privilege, or availed himself in any way of his high position to avoid the payment of his just debts, there would have been a fair case for any journal to hold him up to reprobation. It might have used the language of the Jew pedlar without any offence, except against good taste, and drawn up its catalogue of the treasures of Stowe, which were not available to meet the demands of his creditors. It might have expatiated upon the "60,000 ounces of gold and silver plate set out in the state dining-room," and upon the "forests of vases, chandeliers, épergnes, groups, goblets, tankards, and every other variety of plate, set out on a table twenty yards long, and on a dozen sideboards;" upon the invaluable "lock of silken hair in a glass case," upon which it was so pathetic the other day; and upon the pictures, the statues, and the bijouterie of Stowe, and have asked why a man who would not, or could not pay his debts, should be allowed, untroubled by the law, to possess such valuables as these? It might have contrasted the fate of some poor Jenkins or Jones, in a similar though meaner predicament, compelled to part with his very bed to satisfy his creditors, with that of a "Buckingham and a Chandos" setting his creditors at defiance, and living at his ease and in his usual magnificence, undisturbed by the misery or bankruptcy of the ignoble herd whom he had defrauded. Such an opportunity would have been a legitimate one for showing that the law for the poor was not the law for the rich, and that there were privileges and immunities for the patrician few which were the source of wrong and suffering for the plebeian many. But nothing of this kind has taken place. The fate that would have befallen Jones or Jenkins has befallen the great Duke of Buckingham. He has had no privilege, no immunity. He has been made, as the Times admits, "an absolutely ruined and destitute man." He has erred, and he has paid the penalty—a penalty all the greater from the family ties, associations, and traditions with which he was connected, and the disruption of which could not have been felt with anything like the same intensity by one not placed so high, not liable to fall so low.

But no public principle being involved, no necessity existing for the public mention of the case beyond the record of the sale, no charge of dishonesty having been made against the Duke, no pretence being alleged that here the law-maker was a law-breaker, a journal of great circulation and influence took its opportunity, while reading a homily that was not needed, and preaching a false morality, to tear open the wounds of a bleeding man, to trample upon the fallen, to lift a hand against the prostrate, and to insult the miserable and heart-stricken. While it did all this, it omitted the obvious and only moral deducible from the circumstances, which is, that no rank or position, however splendid, can shield the possessors from the same penalties for reckless extravagance, personal or inherited, as those which befall the humble. The Times deplored that in "the midst of fertile lands and an industrious people, in the heart of a country where it is thought virtuous to work, to save and to thrive, a man of the highest rank, and of a property not unequal to his title, has flung all away by extravagance and folly, and reduced his honours to the tinsel of a pauper and the baubles of a fool." But in this same land and amongst the same people, it forgot to mention that it is thought equally virtuous to make all possible amends for an evil that has been done; and that, when debtors voluntarily yield up all they possess for the benefit of their creditors they have disarmed the hostility of the generous and the good, and silenced all tongues, except those of the vulgar, the envious, and the prejudiced.

But the Times, it seems, has a different code of morality, and would have been better pleased if the Duke of Buckingham had sheltered himself behind the Law of Entail, and prevented his creditors from receiving so large a dividend as they are at present likely to obtain. It deplores and condemns that the Duke, "by the use of a passionate and overpowering persuasion, induced his amiable son, now in his 25th year, to cut off the entail of all the property in which the Duke was interested;" never imagining, in its foolish zeal for the wealth of the aristocracy, that, if the Duke, by his extraordinary plea, had, as it says, "brought discredit upon the order to which he unfortunately belongs," he had done it honour, by going even beyond the law in his efforts to do justice, and to pay every man to the uttermost farthing which he owed him. The gratuitous insolence of holding up the Marquis of Chandos to public pity, is even more disgusting than the rest of the article. A generous writer, while remembering the fact that the Marquis of Chandos has been to be envied; and that he may enjoy an unspeakable amount of the purest gratification, in having been called upon to make a sacrifice, and upon having been in the position to make it in behalf of one so near and so dear to him; and that he neither has had, nor probably ever will have, in this life, a purer source of happiness than in the reflection which the deed may afford him. But true vulgarity measures everything by a money standard: it has no notion of the priceless value of the affections, and of the inner repayment which they receive for the sacrifice which they so cheerfully make. If the Duke has struck a blow at aristocracy by his insolvency, as the Times insists, there is this consolation, that the Marquis has added a new lustre to it by the nobility of his self-sacrifice.

THE CATHEDRAL FESTIVAL AT COLOGNE.

On the 15th ult., the ceremony of consecrating the finished portion of the Cathedral at Cologne was performed by the Archbishop. The King of Prussia arrived on the previous evening, and, accompanied by the Archduke, was received with a torchlight procession.

Next morning the ceremony of consecration commenced at seven o'clock, during the service the Cathedral was closed; and several schools, religious societies and brotherhoods assembled in the Domhof, alternating chants and prayers.

Between eight and nine the procession was formed on the Neumarkte, to accompany the King and the Archduke to the Cathedral, to attend high mass. A detachment of the Civic Guard kept the space from the western door to the entrance of the choir clear. At 10 o'clock the Archbishop, attended by the Bishops and Chapter in their full robes, with crosiers and mitres, came down the aisle and waited the arrival of the procession. Soon after 10, the King and the Archduke entered together, followed by a numerous suite of officers. They were received by the Chapter with due honour, and remained standing while the Archbishop delivered an address of some length. At its conclusion, the clergy, preceded by banners the crucifix, and incense bearers, moved on, amid chanting and the deep tone of the Cathedral bell, to the choir, followed by the Royal guests and attendants. High mass was then celebrated, closing with a grand Te Deum sung by the choir and congregation.

From the conclusion of the Cathedral service till dark the day was a blank; but with night came the illumination. The Rhine bridge was one long line of light, the tower of the Stadthaus was bright to its very point of the spire with coloured lamps; some of the churches were similarly illuminated. In the narrow streets, usually so sombre, the effect was magical; houses of six, seven, and eight stories high, with their gable-ends to the street, had rows of lamps at every window. The transparencies were not very numerous The suburb of Deutz, on the opposite side of the Rhine, was even more brilliant than the city itself. The garden of the Bellevue Hotel, which fronts the river, and the whole line of wharves and buildings, were marked out in light; coloured fires were burned at intervals, and salutes of cannon discharged all the evening till nearly midnight. The whole population was on foot, and many of the streets were almost impassable. The persons who did not provide themselves with lights until nearly the last lampion had burned down to the socket. The evening was calm and favourable to the display.

In the illumination it was expected the Cathedral would have been lit up; after waiting some hours all was still dark, the people began to retire, when at midnight the crimson Bengal fires were lighted among the pinnacles and on the parapets: for a few minutes the whole mass was seen enveloped in the ruddy glow, which made the minutest ornaments of the tracery visible; in another moment all was dark again, and the magnificent pile was wrapped in a deeper gloom than before.

A banquet was given during the afternoon, at which the King and all the members of the Cathedral were present. Next morning the King left by railway for Berlin, and the Archduke departed for Frankfort.

"The festival (says the Times correspondent, from whose graphic letter we quote these details,) has assembled here many of the most celebrated men of Germany; Munich has sent Cornelius, the first living painter of the age; his pupil, Kaulbach, is also here, with the sculptor, Rauch, from Berlin. Von Humboldt and the Chevalier Bunsen accompany the King. The man who did the most to draw the attention of Europe to the great beauty of the Cathedral, Sulpitis Boisserée, is present at the festiva. which celebrates the realization of a part, at least, of his dream of composing the immense design."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The Legitimist agitation of last week has completely subsided, and the adherents of Henry V., whatever their designs may be, have ceased to tease the public with their manifestations. The calm, which has been so maintained as to the issue of the debate in the National Assembly on the report of the Committee of Inquiry into the insurrectionary movements of May 15 and June, have not been troubled, and Paris, throughout the present week, continued tranquil, General Cavaignac maintaining, however, all the precautions previously organised for the prompt suppression of any disturbances which might arise.

On Friday (last week) the National Assembly sat continuously, with the exception of two short intervals of adjournment, from twelve o'clock at noon to six o'clock on Saturday morning, during the whole of which the subject of the Insurrections of May and June were under discussion.

During the whole of that period, although the precincts of the Assembly were open and usual to circulation, no one was permitted to stand, nor any groups allowed to collect: the moment one or two individuals were seen to stop, a policeman was at their elbow to desire them to move on.

During the night strong patrols were maintained throughout all parts of the capital. General officers, with their staff and aides-de-camp, followed by orderlies, were constantly seen passing and repassing.

Within the Assembly, the Salle des Pas Perdus, usually the resort of journalists and others for conversation and the interchange of news, was kept cleared. Persons furnished with tickets were allowed to pass through, but not to stop in it.

The business was opened by the President, M. Marrast, exhorting the Assembly to observe order, and to avoid indulging in any language likely to produce irritation or personal offence. Several members then successively addressed the Assembly, objecting to different points in the evidence where they were personally referred to. Admiral Cary and Colonel Charras objected to the deposition of M. [illegible]. The latter ascended the tribune and re-affirmed his statements. MM. Portalis and Landrin, former Procureur-General and Procureur de la République, objected strongly against those parts of the evidence of M. Arago in which they were respectively implicated. M. Arago then, with the greatest firmness of language and determination of manner, maintained his assertion, which he declared he had repeated the month of M. Ledru-Rollin himself. This declaration excited a great explosion, which was not dismissed by some words pronounced by M. Ledru Rollin, having a tendency to attenuate the assertions of M. Arago. The report was then successively attacked by MM. Quinet, Bunne, Rapeillin, Larabit, Martin, and Raynal. M. Bac complained strongly of the publication of the documents of the parliamentary club of the rue Caulgrière (the ultra democratic). Several members disavowed their connexion with this club, on the lists of which, however, their names figured. M. Jules Favre denied what had been stated of the secret councils held in the Ministry of the Interior when he was secretary-general. The scattered and unconnected nature of the debate fatigued the Assembly, and at the conclusion of the addresses of Ledru-Rollin, Caussidière, and Louis Blanc, which were marked by no one feature of novelty, the Assembly, on the proposition of M. Flocon, resolved unanimously to pass to the order of the day, instead of proceeding to discuss the report of the Committee of Inquiry.

The President then announced that he had a communication to make to the Assembly. This announcement was followed by the most profound silence, and the President read a requisition of the Procureur-General of the Court of Appeal demanding authorisation of the assembly to prosecute Louis Blanc and Caussidière as accomplices in the insurrections of the 15th of May and 23rd of June. After some observations, characterised by more or less violence, from MM. Ledru-Rollin, Lagrange, and other members of the extreme left, General Cavaignac rose and announced that the present application was made by the law officers of the Government not in consequence of the proceedings of the committee on the insurrections, but in consequence of judicial proceedings which had been taken simultaneously with the political inquiry. "The Government (said General Cavaignac) desired that this question should be promptly considered, and promptly terminated, nor do we desire that the application for authorisation to prosecute should lead to another debate." He was understood to intimate that the Government had only postponed their demand in order to give the parties implicated, officially by the report of the committee time and opportunity to deliver their defence in the tribune. Upon this Louis Blanc rose and declared that there was not an honest man who in his conscience doubted his innocence, and that he was impassioned, not because he was supposed to be guilty, but because of his political opinions.

At two o'clock in the morning, M. Corne, the Procureur-General, rose to support the demand for authorisation in presence. He said, that three things had gone on concurrently to enlighten the law officers—the judicial instruction on affairs of May 15; the military instruction on the insurrection of June, and the judicial investigation on the affair. Therefore, the facts were well known.

It was then proposed that the law officers of the Republic should be authorised to prosecute MM. Caussidière and Louis Blanc for the part which each of the division was as follows:—For granting the authorisation, 504; against it, 292: majority, 202.

The same proposition having been put to the vote in Caussidière in the same affair, the division was as follows: For the authorisation, 477; against it, 208: majority, 269.

It was then proposed to grant the authorisation to allow proceedings to be instituted against M. Caussidière for being implicated in the insurrection of June, which would have the effect of delivering him over to the Council of War. The following was the result of the division:—For the authorisation, 470; against it, 438: majority against it, 88

It was observed during the night, in the Assembly, that not one of the numerous ladies who occupied the ministerial gallery quitted her place or slept till the determination of the debate. The other sex, however, showed more susceptibility or lassitude, several of the members of the Assembly, and among them General Cavaignac himself, having been seen asleep on their benches.

In consequence of the above decision of the Assembly, the arrest of Louis Blanc and Caussidière was considered so certain, that all the journals of Saturday evening and Sunday morning, with the exception of the Journal des Débats and the Réforme, published circumstantial accounts of their apprehension and committal, first to the Conciergerie, and thence under a strong escort to Vincennes. But these accounts were premature. Ledru-Rollin and Caussidière had contrived to escape the hands of the police. Government was not prepared with warrants for their arrest on Saturday morning. M. Ducoux, prefect of police, who was present, facilitated the escape of the former, as he [illegible] and the Judge d'Instruction charged with the investigation of the affair of the 15th May, were sent for. The two delinquents, meanwhile, availing themselves of these delays, left the house, and immediately afterwards absconded. Their escape was not to have been connived at by the Government.

The two papers mentioned above published the following letter from M. Louis Blanc:—

"Assailed—not as a guilty man, for that was impossible, but as an enemy—by men whose political passions have silenced every sentiment of equity, I withdraw, the better to protect against the insensate rage of its foes the cause of the empire of force. I cannot believe that France is of a humour to permit that the regular course of justice shall remain suspended much longer. When the day of real calm arrives, I shall be present.

"Paris, Aug. 26."

On Saturday morning he left by the Northern Railway, taking the train not at the usual station in Paris, but at the little station at Pierrefitte, near St. Denis. It is said that he was himself the exclusive subject of conversation among his fellow-travellers, who, however, did not know him.

On Sunday afternoon an extensive encampment was erected in the grand square of the Champs Elysées. At noon that vast area presented its wonted appearance of a level and vacant square; and at five o'clock it was literally covered with tents and soldiers, and the whole of the right and left of each tent was erected on the opposite side of the river, on the esplanade of the Invalides, and a third on that portion of the Quai d'Orsay which extends from the Invalides to the Pont des Invalides. The gardens, the Tuileries, the Chamber and its dependencies, and the hotel of the presidency, were also quite filled with troops, including a great quantity of artillery. Orders were placed before the entrenchments, and the gates were concealed by the columns of the vestibule.

A statement which had been very generally circulated to the effect that General Cavaignac had prohibited the publication of the protests of certain journalists against the power assumed by the Government to suspend newspapers and to imprison the editors without trial, which had recently been exercised by the Chief of the Executive Government—has turned out to be erroneous. The protest in question was presented to General Cavaignac on Sunday by a deputation of the subscribers to it, whom he received in the kindest manner. He stated to them, that he had never intended to resort to, he has not been under a sense of imperative duty. In protesting against it, they (the [illegible] are to that document) had no doubt been similarly influenced. Their protest was one unmeaning outcry against a supposed imminent danger, in case of need, was not the less certain.

There was some agitation at Lille on Friday (last week) among the [illegible], but it passed off without any outbreak. Numerous and large groups of women assembled in different places, and uttered terrible threats; but they were completely overawed by the imposing military force which was called out. Numerous arrests were effected. The distribution to the workmen of the assistance voted by the Municipal Council, in consequence of the dissolution of [illegible] nationaux, which took place on Friday, greatly contributed to restrain them from committing any outrage.

The Paris papers mention that the Prince de Beauveau had accidentally shot dead his brother-in-law, M. de St. Aldegonde, at the seat of the Duke de Montebart, on the 26th ult.

The Moniteur publishes the returns of merchandize imported into France in July, from which it appears that their exportation evinced a slight improvement during that month. The imports duties produced 7,265,976f. These amount in the corresponding month of 1846 had been 12,957,914f.; and in 1847, 11,507,482f. The receipts of the first seven months of 1846 only amounted to 45,436,454f. They had been, in 1846, 57,694,654f.; and in 1847, 77,464,186f.

The great question which occupies the five Parisian clubs, composed of representatives of the people, is to decide whether the National Assembly shall dissolve itself immediately after the vote on the Constitution, or whether it shall vote a code of laws before its dissolution. It is said that the club of the Rue de Poitiers, of which M. Thiers is the reputed chief, has voted almost unanimously in favour of dissolving the Assembly after the Constitution is voted. Some members (about 20) of the Club of the Palais National are of a similar opinion. All the others, including the absolute democratic club, are in favour of enacting laws before the dissolution.

The trial of the parties accused of the insurrection of the 15th of May and the invasion of the National Assembly will, it is now said, take place before the Cour d'Assizes of Paris in the beginning of October. A new batch, consisting of 120 insurgents of June, was sent off to Havre on Tuesday. The People Souverain (a Lyons journal) has been suspended

After three days of the finest possible weather, except that the temperature ranged between 80 and 90 deg., Paris was visited on Wednesday morning by one of the most violent and long-continued thunder-storms on record. It began shortly after one o'clock A.M., and was not over till half-past four.

The request of Prince Napoleon Albert, Marshal Bugeaud has permitted to assume the command and direction-in-chief of the Piedmontese [illegible] through the Count de la Marmora—had been, for the present, refused, lest it might be interpreted as the commencement of armed intervention, and lest it should impede the negotiations for a termination of the war in Italy.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

MONDAY.—The Minister of the Interior called the attention of the Assembly to the subject of the papers and the Tuileries by the ex-Royal Family of France. He stated that all the documents were now in the National Archives, and an inventory would immediately be taken of them in the presence of a delegate from the Foreign Office, another from the Republican Office of the ex-Civil List, and a third from the National Assembly. The Minister concluded by declaring that there was nothing worthy of notice in the papers which were in circulation of many of them having been abstracted. In answer to a question, the hon. Minister replied that the Government (at least that part of it under his own immediate superintendence) knew nothing respecting the publication of the papers in the Revue Rétrospective. M. Duchatel, however, explained that the documents published in the Revue Rétrospective came to him (M. Duchatel) from two different sources. Some came into his hands from private communications which he had with a secretary of the ex-minister. M. Ledru-Rollin had authorised the publication of the papers. Further discussion was stopped by the President. The Minister of Finance presented a Bill on the salt-duty. It contained only one article, annulling the decree of the Provisional Government relative to the duty on salt, which thus remains in force for the year 1848. The President stated that M. Crespel de Lamorende had presented the following proposition, demanding urgency:—"Whereas the decrees of June 24 and 26, 1848, do not give, and could not give, to the head of the Executive Power the right to suspend or to attenuate the penalties fixed by the liberty of the press, and as the laws of the state of siege themselves do not in any case deprive citizens of the guarantee of a regular trial, the National Assembly declares that to the tribunals alone belongs the right, even in the period of a state of siege, to punish offences committed by the press."—Referred to the bureaux. The Assembly rose at six o'clock

TUESDAY. The first order of the day was the discussion of the demand for leave to prosecute Louis Blanc de Lamorende. The demand was eventually refused. M. Woirhaye then read to the Chamber the revised project of the Constitution. The preamble had been completely changed. The President of the Republic was to be elected for four years instead of three, and not for four years, and his salary is fixed at 624 600 a year: the clause which recognised the right of labour is omitted, while that which abolishes service by substitute in the army is retained. M. Bauchart ascended the tribune, and read an account of the expenditure of the Executive Committee, of which he was Secretary, from the 11th of May to the 24th of June. The whole only amounted to 4,000 francs. M. Lamarque then ascended the tribune, and read an account of the expenditure of the Executive Committee, of which he was Secretary, from the 11th of May to the 24th of June. The whole only amounted to 4,000 francs. M. (General applause.)

An early day has been fixed for the discussion.

Another Constituent Assembly would soon be convened in Frankfort; that is, a local one, for revising, or rather for entirely re-organising, the constitution of Frankfort. The Senate and legislative body had long confessed that some reform was necessary; but they were adverse to anything like a thorough revision of the Constitution

It is local Constituent Assembly will number about 150 members. The Hereditary Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar had arrived in Frankfort, to pay his respects to the Vicar of the Empire. He had also visited the President of the National Assembly, and attended its sittings on the 21st and 22d inst

PRUSSIA.

There have been some disturbances of late in Berlin, but tranquility has been restored according to the latest accounts. In explanation of the émeute, it should be stated that considerable jealousy and irritation had been excited among certain circles of the public by the new Prussian organisation. The insurrection of Berlin was tranquil, but the excitable portion of the population was pre-disposed to turbulence. The immediate occasion of the émeute was an incitement that occurred at Charlottenburg on Sunday the 20th ult., when the rabble of the place showed their loyalty by brutal and unprovoked attacks upon the few residents who had the reputation of being democratically inclined. The disturbance was suppressed, but with undue delay, and not till after some of these objects of popular odium had been dragged from their houses and shamefully treated. In Berlin, the Charlottenburg excesses were represented as baptismal by the reactionary party. A deputation from the Berlin unmarried labourers had been appointed to proceed on Monday the 21st to the Minister of Commerce. Emissaries mixed among the labourers on their return, and at a public meeting convened at the Place of the Opera, in the evening, exaggerated and exciting speeches were delivered to the crowds, and ultimately a cry was raised that the Minister of the Interior ought to be called upon to resign A movement was immediately made by some of the assembled people in the direction of that Minister's house, into which they broke forcibly, and assured themselves by a search that he was not there. The mob next proceeded to the house of the President of his Cabinet, whose salons were at the moment filled with members of the diplomatic corps and numerous guests. Upon the approach of the mob, some half-dozen constables attempted to interpose, but were quickly driven back, one with a dangerous wound ending in almost immediate death. At the same time two pistol-shots were fired from among the people, and in an instant a rush was made to batter in the windows and doors of the lower story, while the pavement was dug up, and a volley of stones hurled into the upper story. One of these had nigh terminated the diplomatic services of the Bavarian Minister. Meanwhile the constables appeared in strong detachments, and, after a sharp conflict, during which numbers of constables and several leaders of the mob were wounded, the former succeeded in capturing some and dispersing the rest of the assailants. A fire-engine drew up at the corner of a contiguous street and commenced a barricade, but, being taken in the rear by another body of constables, and by the cavalry a-driving Berlin fast, they were also driven from this point. In the course of half an hour more, the Burgher Guard mustered in considerable force, and, finding the mob re-assembled, and meditating further mischief in different quarters, they charged and dispersed them with the bayonet, or rather with the sight of the bayonet, for they fled without waiting to be attacked, but not without hurling a shower of stones upon the assailants The number of wounded of the people is not known, but 30 constables are on the wounded and bruised list

In the sitting of the Chamber on the 22nd, M. Kuhlwetter drew the attention of the house to the events of the previous evening, and stated that he had sent a project of law for the King's sanction, having for object to prevent the renewal of such events

On the 23rd, the Royal message sanctioning the project was transmitted to the Assembly. The discussion had been fixed for the 28th.

A state of feverish apprehension pervaded the public mind at Berlin. S wealthy families had left the city in consequence of the disturbances of the 21st.

AUSTRIA.

There have been disturbances in Vienna as well as in Berlin, of late. The discontent, riotous proceedings, and in some of i working classes, and the avowed republican tendencies of the "Academic Legion" had for some time presented ominous alarms, and on the night of the 21st ult. the Royal Burgher Guards were compelled to disperse, and to expel from the interior of the city, a considerable band of workmen who were clamouring for higher wages On the 22nd some misleading rank in the course of the day to have proposed to the Assembly that 5000 Guards as a isolated bodies of workmen, but the approach of a pi put an end to the affray. In consequence of these disturbances, the committee of citizens entrusted with the place of the town declared, on the 23rd inst., that fitting permanent. An article in the Wiener Zeitung of the 24th states that there was nothing peculiar in these disturbances, although some incendiaries had been discovered, though in very small numbers, among the rioters.

The war in Italy is becoming every day more and more unpopular with the Constituent Assembly. A recent attempt on the part of the centre to evoke a manifestation in favour of its army by calling for more vigorous and decisive operation. Ronge is preaching his new doctrines at Vienna with undiminished zeal

Hecker, the republican leader, has arrived in the capital. The Emperor has published an amnesty for all offences committed during the late days of March

The Vienna journals contain the following intimation from Trieste of date the 17th ult.: Preparations are being made for the blockade of Venice. Twelve vessels, consisting of a frigate, three corvettes, four brigs, and four steamers, are already equipped for the service.

On the 24th ult. two proclamations, signed by all the ministers, announced that the Cabinet would concentrate in its hands all the executive power, so that the Assembly might devote itself to the formation of the constitution. A Committee of safety, whose rivalry had become an additional danger for the capital. Other proclamations forbad assemblages. All public works, by the Government, are suspended, and the workmen who desire employment must present themselves to a committee. The Committee of Safety had been dissolved.

HUNGARY AND CROATIA

6000 Servians are stated to have crossed the Danube near Orschova The united forces of the Servians are calculated to amount to 86,000 men. The Croatian reserves force of 30,000. The artillery consists of 160 field-pieces.

Recent accounts from Agram, in Croatia, state that a part of the Croatian troops will pass the Drave at various spots, and ultimately join to march on the capital of Hungary.

SWEDEN

The King of Sweden granted an audience on the 2 to M. Lobstein, Envoy-Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, and received him with the greatest distinction

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES

Accounts from Hamburgh, to the 26th August, announce the interim government for Schleswig Holstein, which it is proposed to substitute for the present if an armistice is concluded. In that event the Interim Government is to be composed of the Crown Prince of Denmark; Prince Ferdinand, brother of the late King Christian VIII.; Count of Sandsoe, a Councillor of Embassy; Councillor Francke; and either Councillor Preusser, or Advocate Beroum With reference to the circumstance that this government is intended to preside over Schleswig-Holstein from the time that the armistice is arranged, and that in an armistice may terminate in a renewal of hostilities; it is asked whether, in the event of war, the interim government will conduct it against the King of Denmark? And what, in that case, the Crown Prince of Denmark will do? It is stated that the basis of the proposed peace is to be a partition of Schleswig, and that the inhabitants of the duchy are to decide, each for himself, whether he will belong to the Danish or the German part of it.

Dates from Kiel of the 24th state that seven of the principal places in the Duchies are fully garrisoned by the Confederate troops, of which 40,000 to 50,000 are Bavarians, and 14,000 are Saxons. The Schleswig-Holstein army is 70,000 strong, occupy the duchy.

M. Dietz arrived at Rendsburg on the 23rd from the National Assembly at Frankfort, and proceeded at once to the German head-quarters. It is supposed that he is authorised to conclude the negotiation respecting the armistice.

POLAND.

The Polska Gazette states that Poland is tranquil, but that, nevertheless, Warsaw daily presents a more warlike aspect The army bivouacs in the streets, and regiments are constantly arriving, including the Cossacks of the Guard, a sure sign of the advent of the Emperor. The kingdom will be occupied during the winter by four corps d'armee of 70,000 men each.

RUSSIA

According to the latest intelligence from Russia, the extensive levy of recruits ordered by the Emperor Nicholas had created much irritation among the nobility and the Government was obliged to go to Petersburgh, where had recently existed, and engage in a struggle with the military directed to carry the order Emperor into execution. This event had disconcerted his Imperial Majesty to recall the troops that had been sent to Poland. The cholera was raging at Petersburgh, in Gallicia.

THE UNITED STATES.

By the steam-ship America New York papers and letters to the 16th ult. have been received this week.

Among the last acts of legislation, and one which has received the President's signature, was a bill prohibiting the introduction of slavery into Oregon. The provision of the famous ordinance of 17[illegible], which forbids slavery for ever in the territories of the United States north of the Ohio, was extended to Oregon, a territory of which prohibition has been proved by the growing up already in that territory of six great and prosperous states, within which slavery can find no foothold.

There was a strenuous contest, in the Senate especially, to exclude this provision, but it was found, after two or three successive trials, that on each occasion the House of Representatives became more and more determined to let Oregon remain without a Government rather than consent to any compromise adverse to freedom, and finally the Senate yielded, and the Bill was passed and is now a law, with the clause prohibiting slavery within the borders of Oregon.

The President, in returning the Bill to Congress with his signature, accompanied it with a message. Its tenor is the same as the spirit of Mr. Dongass's proposition. Amendments, for he declares that he signed the Bill because Oregon lies north of the line of the Missouri compromise, but would not do the same for any Bill excluding slavery having relation to the Government of the territory of California or the newly-acquired provinces in Mexico, because he evidently thinks the slave limits little enough, and that the Missouri compromise having been adopted and made a rule of action, it is unwise and unjust to the country to seek to impose conditions excluding slavery upon the territory south of that line

In conclusion, he quotes from the farewell address of Washington a portion which deprecates sectional influences and the admission of any feeling tending to weaken the Union

The other new territories acquired by the treaty of peace with Mexico remain unprovided with any Government, and are in a sufficiently anomalous position, for they are American by treaty, and of course no longer subject to the laws which attached to them when belonging to another country, and yet not provided with any new form of government by their new country.

Slavery is here again the stumbling-block, for portions of both these territories lying within parallels of latitude where slave labour may be with considerable advantage employed, the senators and representatives from the slave holding states would not consent to any bill that looked to the exclusion of slavery from these territories. On the other hand, the representatives from the non-slave-holding states would not sanction any bill that might lead to the introduction of slaves and slavery into regions now free The difference is irreconcilable, and the territories are left without any settled form of government.

A proposition, understood to be submitted by the President of the United States to the Senate for their advice, relative to the purchase, for the sum of 1,000,000 sterling, of all the property and rights of the Hudson's Bay Company within the limits of Oregon, was passed over for want of time. The President, however, has still the power in the recess of negotiating a treaty upon this subject, to be laid before Government, subject to the ratification of the Senate.

Mr. Trist, late United States Commissioner to Mexico, had written a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, impeaching President Polk, and declaring that the impeachment might be laid before the House.

The Presidential campaign is now fully opened, the political associations having at their convention in Buffalo completed the list of candidates by nominating Martin Van Buren, with Charles F. Adams, of Massachusetts, as the second in command. General Taylor, in answer to a letter asking for information, says — "I have to say that I am not a party candidate, and, if elected, shall not be the President of a party, but the President of the whole people"

MEXICO

Our Mexican advices are totally destitute of interest. Peace was still at large, without, however, any chance of success in its endeavours to create a rebellion

The United States troops have entirely abandoned Mexico. The Mexican authorities took possession of Vera Cruz on July 21.

The British and United States Consuls at Tobasco had been attacked by a party of intoxicated Mexican soldiers and narrowly escaped death. An application was immediately made to the commander, who made an apology, and punished the offenders.

By the arrival of the West India Mail steamer Severn at New Orleans, we are enabled to contradict positively the report of an insurrection in Cuba.

INDIA

Intelligence of an interesting character, in anticipation of the Overland Mail, received this week, and dated Bombay the 16th, Calcutta the 19th, and Madras the 26th ult., supplies details of the successes of Lieutenant Edwardes against the rebels in Moultan, which we noticed last week. We thus learn that the defiance of the Bhawulpore forces having been effected at the junction of Lieutenant Edwardes, that officer pushed forward with a portion of his force across the Chenab, in the direction of Soojabad, and joined the action after it had become general on the part of the Bhawulpore hordes and the insurgents in the field. The fighting lasted for several hours, and desperate intrepidity was shown by the Sikh troops of the Dewan. The issue of the day was ultimately decided by the personal daring of Lieutenant Edwardes, who, with many of his men, charged the enemy's guns sword in hand; and though the Sikhs fired grape until the assailants were within a few feet of the muzzles, four out of the seven guns in their possession were carried, and two others otherwise disabled and captured. This occurred notwithstanding the fact that in the heat of the fight Edwardes's marauine caught fire and killed six of his men. The loss of the insurgents appears to have been about 1500 killed and wounded, and in no part not much less. Lieutenant Edwardes's despatches forwarded to the Governor-General had not yet been made public, so that the precise number of troops engaged cannot be exactly stated, but they appear to be in all from 6000 to 8000 men.

The Dewan was said to be preparing himself for a last and bold struggle, and was at no march out of Moultan at the head of some 8000 men. Moolraj had been joined by the raising fanatic, the Gooroo, from the Punjaub, who seemed to be inspired with his own mad valour the falling party. Such, at least, is one of the native accounts; another, equally precise, and of later date, states that the Dewan had offered to enter into negotiations with Lieut. Edwardes. The latter, it is said, has instructions from the Governor-General under any apprehension that they might prove unfaithful. Afterward the Bhawulpore levies were safely posted at Soojabad, and would not probably mean any further opposing force to Lieutenant Edwardes's advance. Sir F. Currie, at Lahore, who, it was understood, would not sanction any treaty since with Lieutenant Edwardes had been reinforced, and better supplied with artillery, and, for that purpose, he and orderers had been received from Sir F. Currie at Lahore. Intelligence from Delhi to July 8, 1848, speak of a second action fought on the 1st July. The united forces of the Nawab of Bhawulpore, of Lieutenant Edwardes, General Courtlandt, and Sheikh Emamun-ood-Deen, amounting to 15,000 men, and 30 guns, were attacked on the morning of that day by the whole available force of the Dewan. Moolraj, numbers not known. The united army moved out to the village of Sadoosan to meet them, and a general action of great severity was the result. It lasted six hours, and ended in the complete defeat of Moolraj, who commanded in person, and was knocked out of his howdah by a cannon ball striking it; he escaped on his horse into the city. The action ended under the walls of Moultan Lieutenant Lake commanded the Deen Poorpoorus, and behaved with the gallantry that might have been expected This is the second general action and defeat of the rebels in one fortnight, at the season of the year when "troops cannot move." News had been received at Ahmedpur, on July 31, that 300 Sikhs of the force of Sheikh Emamun-ood-Deen have deserted, and joined the rebellious Dewan. Sirdar Shumsher Singh has also arrived in the vicinity of Moultan, and, by what the Dewan's people write, it would appear that Shah Lee Deccanee has discovered that the Sikhs of the Sirdar's army also wish to join Moolraj

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

CHARTIST TRIALS

On Monday, J. J. Bezer, 38, was indicted for sedition The Attorney-General, Mr. Welsby, Mr. Bodkin, and Mr. Clerk appeared for the Crown. The defendant had no counsel. The Attorney-General stated that the meeting at which the seditious speech was delivered was held on the 26th July, at the Milton-street Theatre, and at which more than a thousand persons were present; and he reminded the jury that on the previous day there had been an unfounded report of a general rising of the people having taken place in Ireland, that the troops were disaffected and had been defeated. The meeting was convened by a placard, headed "Is Ireland up?" and which went on to say that a great public meeting would be held that night at the Milton-street Theatre, to take into consideration the present crisis in Ireland. Some talented patriots, including Messrs. Smith O'Brien, Meagher, Mitchel, Duffy, and Gavan Duffy, had undertaken to attend the meeting. The Attorney-General proceeded to state that the defendant, who seemed to be a very clever person, and to possess very considerable ability, addressed the meeting, and read extracts of a most inflammatory character from one of the New York papers, thinking no doubt he thought he could evade the law. He was, however, very much mistaken in that respect. The Attorney-General then read the speech made by the defendant upon the occasion in question. Mr. J. White, the Government short-hand writer, proved that the speech was made by the defendant, and that it was delivered to on the 26th July. The case for the Crown having been closed, the prisoner defended himself in an able speech; after which the jury immediately returned a verdict of "Guilty."

SENTENCES FOR SEDITION.—The other defendants, Small, Crowe, and Bryson, who had been convicted of a similar offence, and whose cases we noticed in our Postscript of last week, were thereupon ordered to be placed at the bar with the defendant who had been just convicted, to receive sentence. Baron Platt, in passing sentence, observed that they had been convicted at a former session of a similar offence, and received sentence; but, as that sentence did not appear to have had the effect of deterring others from similar courses, it was clear that an increase in the punishment must be resorted to. The increase of punishment would not be very great, but still he must be some increase on the former sentence. The sentence of the Court was that [illegible] Crowe, and John James [illegible] to be imprisoned for two years, to pay a fine of £10 each to the Queen, and find sureties for their imprisonment to enter into their own recognizance for £100, with two sureties of £50 each, to keep the peace for five years. The fourth defendant, Bryson, was sentenced to the same term of imprisonment, and to find the same amount of sureties for five years, and, in addition, to pay a fine of £20; and the whole of the defendants were further ordered to be imprisoned until the sureties were entered into and the fines paid. When the sentence was pronounced, Bryson exclaimed to his companions, "Never mind, brother Chartists—some glory." This attempt to cheer his comrades' spirits appeared to have very little effect.

THE WEATHER.

THE Sunday the weather was a continuance of the wet weather which [illegible] experienced; since Monday the weather has improved considerably [illegible] evening are some particulars of each day:—Thursday, the previous night was distinguished by a good deal of lightning and thunder; the morning was rather fine, with slight showers of rain; between 11 A.M. and 1 P.M. thunder was occasionally heard, and at 1 P.M. very vivid forked lightning was seen N.W by of Hasting-, which was followed by very loud thunder after an interval of twenty-three seconds; and many similar flashes were seen, and loud and long rolls of thunder heard at about the same intervals of time after the lightning, during the next half-hour; after this time the storm approached, and the thunder was heard within two seconds after the lightning was seen; between 2h. 30m. and 3h. 15m. P.M. there was the storm; at 3h. 15m. heavy rain began to fall, and thunder was again heard; at 5 P.M. large balstones fell, and lightning was [illegible] midnight. The direction of the wind at the former part of the day was W, and it was W N W. at the latter part of the day: the average temperature of the air was 58°. Friday, the day, upon the whole, was fine, with occasional falls of rain; the direction of the wind was E.S.E; the average temperature was 58°. Saturday was rough and stormy, with frequent dashing searching rain falling; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 60°. Sunday was dull, the sky was cloudy, and rain was falling frequently; the average temperature was 60°. Monday was fine; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the air was 62°. Tuesday, the sky was mostly overcast, with occasionally slight showers of rain. The direction of the wind was S W., and the average temperature of the air was 62°. Wednesday, the sky was mostly clear, and the day was fine; the average temperature was 60°

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

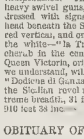
THE SQUADRON OF EVOLUTION.—The following ships and vessels under Napier's command left Cork on Friday (last week) on the experimental cruise off Cape Clear: St. Vincent, 120, Captain Darces, flag-ship; Prince Regent, 90; Edinburgh, 80; Amphion, 34; Tweed, 18; Pilot, 15; Helena, 15; Pirate, 16; [illegible] 10 (screw); and Stromboli steamer. The others (Hindostan, 55; Dragon, 8, &c.) will follow, and join, as they can be spared by the Lord Lieutenant and the Commander-in-Chief. After a fortnight's cruising they will return to port

APPOINTMENT AND INSPECTION OF THE FLEET.—Sir William Burnett, M.D., K.C.H., R.N., Director-General of the Medical Department of the Navy, is inspecting, officially, the hospitals and ships of the fleet at Portsmouth

THE NURSES' SUBSCRIPTION.—The Committee intend meeting early during the present month at the Royal Naval College, Portsmouth, to re-consider every case which they have received (upwards of 200), and vote a continuation of monthly donations to such persons as they may consider proper objects

LAUNCH OF THE STEAM FRIGATE "SICILIANA INDEPENDENZA," FOR THE SICILIAN REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT.—This vessel was launched on Wednesday last, in presence of a fashionable assemblage. She was named the "Sicil-iana Independenza." This splendid model of naval architecture is destined to carry six heavy swivel guns, and admeasures upwards of 1000 tons. She was tastefully dressed with signal flags, and was launched at high water—having at Plummaz head beneath the Sicilian pennant the Italian Republican flag, green, white, and red vertical, and on her ensign staff the same colours, with the arms of Sicily on the white—"la Trinacria," viz three legs (similar to the Manx arms), and a cherub in the centre. She at present bears a splendid figure of her Majesty, Queen Victoria, which will be replaced with a carved Vestal, by Mr. Bowman, we understand, will be replaced with a carved shield, on which is to be inscribed "Dodicesi di Gennaio, 1848," viz. the 12th January, 1848, being the first day of the Sicilian revolution. Her dimensions are as follows:—Length between perpendiculars, 180 feet 6 inches; breadth, 30 feet 8½ inches; gross tonnage, 0 M., 910 feet 38 inches.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.



GENERAL SIR DAVID XIMENES.

THIS gallant officer, who died last week, entered the army at the age of sixteen, and served in every climate. He was son of David Ximenes, Esq., by Abigail Mendez, his wife; and younger brother of the late Sir Morris Ximenes, of Bromley-place, Berks. The family from which he descended claimed to derive from Roderick, brother of the renowned Cardinal Ximenes, who married, in 1814, Barbara, only daughter of Admiral Evans, and had four sons and three daughters.

SIR JOHN OSBORN, BART., OF CHICKSAND PRIORY, CO. BEDFORD.

THE decease of this venerable Baronet, who was in his 76th year, took place on the 29th ult., at his residence in Portman-square.

Sir John was only son of the late General Sir George Osborn, Bart., by Elizabeth, his first wife, eldest daughter and co-heir of John Bannister, Esq.; and grandson of Sir Danvers Osborn, Bart., governor of New York, by Lady Mary Montagu, his wife, daughter of George Lee, of Halifax. He married, 14th December, 1809, Frederica Louisa, daughter of the late Sir Charles Banner, Bart., and had five sons and three daughters, the eldest of the former being the present Sir George Robert Osborn, Bart., who is married to Lady Caroline Elizabeth Kerr, sister of the Earl of Antrim

Sir John was created a Baronet in 1806, and the estate of Chicksand purchased, by Peter Osborn, Esq., Treasurer's Remembrancer and Privy Purse to King Edward VI.

Early in life Sir John Osborn was attached for a short period to Lord Whitworth's embassy at the Court of Russia, after which, returning home, he became one of the Knights of the Shire for the county of Bedford, in 1794, and continued to sit in Parliament for many consecutive years, from 1811 to 1834, he held office as one of the Lords of the Admiralty; and in the latter year was appointed a Commissioner for Auditing the Public Accounts, all the duties of which station he fulfilled till within a short period of his decease

SIR ROBERT HARLAND, BART., OF SPROUGHTON, SUFFOLK.

THE death of this venerable Baronet, which occurred on the 16th ult., at his residence, Wherstead Lodge, came at the time to be somewhat sudden. Sir Robert was a kind friend to the poor, a generous landlord, and in every respect an estimable man. Severely will his loss be felt in the neighbourhood wherein he resided, while long will his worth and his benevolence be held in honoured remembrance. The worthy Baronet was only son of the late Admiral Sir Robert Harland, one of the Commissioners of the Admiralty in 1782, and great-grandson and heir male of Edward Harland, John Duncombe, and Margaret, his wife, daughter and co-heiress of Henry Vernon, Esq., of Great Thurlow, and niece of Frances Earl of Shaftesbury, but by no issue. At the time of his death Sir Robert was in his 83rd year. He held the office of High Steward of Ipswich for the last twenty years.

THE LATE GEORGE STEPHENSON, ESQ.

IN our Obituary of last week we briefly recorded the death of this eminent engineer, whose high destiny it has been "to be, (says the Daily News,) the main instrument in effecting one of the greatest revolutions in our revolutionary age." Accordingly, that combination of the railway and the locomotive steam-engine to which Europe and A[illegible] owes their railway systems."

George Stephenson was born in the [illegible] of Wylam, on the banks of the Tyne, about nine miles west of Newcastle, in April, 1781; and at the time of his death was in his 68th year. His father was a workman at the Colliery at Wylam, and he himself worked in the same humble way, having been sent into the pit at a very early age. At the age of fourteen, or fifteen, he was employed as a brakesman, on the waggon-way between Wylam and Newburn; his father having removed to Walbottle, about a mile north-west of the latter village. [illegible] Stephenson also occasionally worked at the badly-made quay of Messrs. Nixon and Willington, about five miles east of Newcastle.

[illegible] Stephenson removed to [illegible], the property of Lord Ravensworth and partners, where he was still employed as brakesman. At Killingworth he married his first wife, by whom he had one son, the celebrated engineer, Mr. Robert Stephenson, M.P.

The earliest indication of George Stephenson's genius for mechanics showed itself at Killingworth, where he officially superintended the working of the [illegible]-cock, that was out of order; and he thenceforth became the [illegible] engineer of the colliery, an occupation to which he devoted many leisure hours, and during which a large condensing machine was erected by him. [illegible] water from the pit got out of order, and various ineffectual attempts [illegible] to repair it. At length Mr. Stephenson's attention was directed to the matter, carefully examined its working, and, no doubt, he thought the cause of it, where the defects lay; he was allowed to "try his skill," succeeded in repairing the engine, and even introducing some improvements into its construction. His employers were so satisfied with the result, that he was at once promoted from a brakesman to an engineer, and was entrusted with the entire management of the engine. Here he had many opportunities of self-improvement; and his progress was soon developed in the contrivance of [illegible] safety-lamp, which leads to the conclusion that Mr. Stephenson was not indebted to Sir Humphry Davy, announcing that he had discovered that explosive mixtures of mine-damp would not pass through small apertures or tubes; and that, if a lamp were made air-tight on the sides, and furnished with apertures, it would not communicate flame to the outward atmosphere. The coincidence of this communication with Stephenson's experiment is very extraordinary. To remunerate him for the invention, a meeting was held in November, 1818, and a subscription opened, which eventually amounted to one thousand pounds; this sum, together with a piece of plate, was presented to Mr. Stephenson, at a public dinner, held in the Assembly Rooms, Newcastle.

From this period, Mr. Stephenson's advancement was rapid; and thenceforth his career became more particularly identified with the locomotive engine. In 1804, Trevethick and Vivian's machine drew carriages at Merthyr-Tydvil, at the rate of five miles an hour. In 1811 appeared Blenkinsop's engine, and in 1812 Chapman produced one; both which were defective. In 1814, Mr. Stephenson constructed for the Killingworth Colliery an engine which was used on the colliery railroad with almost perfect success. This did not, however, please the engineer, and he subsequently constructed another engine for the same place, which answered much better, and laid the foundation of the existing system of railroads.

In 1824 Mr Stephenson established an engine manufactory in Newcastle, in partnership with the Messrs Pease (of Darlington), Mr. Robert Longridge, and Mr Richard Hopper. The works are situated on the Forth banks, and originally bore the name of Messrs Robert Stephenson and Co. The first locomotive railway for the purpose of travelling, according to the present principles of traction, was laid between Stockton and Darlington, and opened in 1825. Mr. Stephenson has been known to express that his highest anticipations of the capabilities of this mode of transit, both as to the speed and the effect which it would produce when generally adopted (as he foresaw it must be ultimately), were such as he did not even dare to express, for fear of being pronounced insane. At that time he talked of reaching a velocity of twenty miles an hour, but his inward thoughts said sixty or one hundred miles. It was not, however, till the formation of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, in 1829, that Mr. Stephenson was brought prominently before the public as an engine builder. In that year the directors of the above line offered a premium of £500 for the best locomotive engine to run on their railway; when George Stephenson entered the lists, and constructed his celebrated engine "the Rocket," which won the prize. This achievement gave a decisive stamp to Mr. Stephenson's reputation as a railway engineer; and he was subsequently employed in the construction of most of the principal lines of railway in the kingdom. He was also engaged in constructing lines in Belgium, Holland, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain; and he had the honour to receive a knighthood from Leopold of Belgium, for railway services. We are indebted for the substance of these details to a memoir in the Newcastle Journal.

The best evidence of the true greatness of Mr. Stephenson's character is the unwavering faith in his own theoretical conclusions, combined with sound practical judgment, that he manifested throughout his career. About a year ago he said at a public dinner at Newcastle—"At Liverpool I pledged myself to attain a speed of ten miles an hour. I said I had no doubt it would go much faster, but we had better be moderate at the beginning. It was not an easy task for me to keep the engine down to ten miles an hour, but it must be done, and I did my best. I had to place myself in the witness-box of a Parliamentary Committee. I could not find words to satisfy either the committee or myself. Some one inquired if I was a foreigner, and another hinted that I was mad. But I put up with every rebuff, and went on with my plans, determined not to be put down." A simple remark he made about the time he constructed his first locomotive, shows with what vivid reality the then future passenger railway was present in his mind:—"I said to my friends that there was no limit to the speed of such an engine, provided the works could be made to stand."

Mr. Stephenson was a man of simple and unsophisticated nature. Upon the occasion just recorded, he also said:—"I saw how deficient I was in education, and resolved that my son should not labour under the same defect, but that I would put him to a good school and give him a liberal training. I was, however, a poor man. I betook myself to mending my neighbours' clocks and watches at night, after my daily work was done, and thus I procured the means of educating my son. He became my assistant and companion. He got an appointment as under viewer, and at nights we worked together at our engineering." Well has that son repaid such paternal care. George Stephenson's judicious kindness was not limited to the family circle. "Never," says a writer in the Derbyshire Chronicle, "was a proposition made to him for the mental and temporal improvement of his workmen in his collieries, of whom he had upwards of a thousand, but it was met with his immediate attention and consideration, with a deep feeling towards their welfare that could not be surpassed."

Mr. Stephenson was fond of retirement; he was happiest in the country, where he might be seen among his dogs, his cows, and his horses, his rabbits, and birds. Even in his latter years, he was fond of rambling about, bird-nesting or nutting, or any other rural enjoyment.

The accompanying Portrait is sketched from a print beautifully engraved by C. Turner, after a picture painted by the late Mr. Briggs.

THE DUKE'S THEATRE, PORTUGAL-STREET, LINCOLN'S INN-FIELDS.

THIS olden resort of the Thespian muse was, on Monday last, disposed of in lots by auction, and is now in the hands of purchasers of building materials, its space being about to be incorporated with the edifice belonging to the College of Surgeons. The locality, as well as the building just removed, is of considerable interest in theatrical history.

THE LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS THEATRE, IN PORTUGAL-STREET.

The earlier building which occupied this spot was first opened by Sir William D'Avenant in the year 1662, when it was honoured by the presence of Charles the Second and his Court, under circumstances of great splendour.

Taking precedence by some months of the larger theatres, called the King's, in Drury-lane, this was the first regular establishment of the kind in which the effect of perspective was given by means of scene arrangement. It was nominally patronized by the Duke of York, in whose service the company was enrolled; but in its earlier days, the apt and showy decorations of D'Avenant appear to have had a strong attraction for the sovereign himself, who on one occasion gave his coronation suit to Betterton, the Duke making a similar gift to Mr. Harris, and my Lord of Oxford attiring in like manner Mr. Joseph Price, in order that their several parts of Prince Alvaro, Prime Prospero, and Lionel, in D'Avenant's play of "Love and Honour," might be right royally apparelled; and the piece, thus splendidly got up, had a very great run.

The Duke's opened with the "Siege of Rhodes," when Downes, its chronicler, officiated as prompter; having been, however, appointed to perform the part of Haly, but, overcome by the royal presence, he broke down, and thus, as he says, "for ever spoilt for being an actor." The "Siege of Rhodes" ran twelve successive nights, and was succeeded by the comedy of "The Wits," by the same author. But the glory of the early time of this theatre was Betterton's Hamlet, in which piece this famous actor was entrusted to perform his part after the manner of Taylor, of the Blackfriars' Playhouse, who had experienced the advantage of Shakspeare's own direction; and the result was, according to Cibber, that he excited the admiration of the public as much as Rose in the character of Rome! The same great author's plays of "Henry and Juliet," "Twelfth Night," and "King Henry the Eighth" followed; and these were succeeded by "The Rivals." "The Cutter of Coleman-street," Wolseley's "Duchess of Malfy," and Etheridge's "Love in a Tub," which latter proved extremely profitable to the theatrical treasury, the receipts amounting to upwards of one thousand pounds within the first month—a great sum considering the smallness of the house, the low rate of admittance, and the value of money at that time.

In 1665 the Plague interrupted the career of the theatres in general, and among them the Duke's, which remained closed until after the Christmas succeeding the Great Fire of 1666, when the company recommenced with the play of "Mustapha," and went on until, inconvenienced by the smallness of the building, and other matters of objection, they removed to the new theatre in Dorset-gardens in 1671. Thus ended the first epoch in the theatrical history of this site. After this event, Mr. Christopher Rich, on being expelled from Drury-lane, engaged Shepherd, a celebrated architect of the time, in the construction of a new building, as it now stands; but, dying before its completion, the property fell into the hands of John Rich, and in 1714 the house opened with the comedy of the "Recruiting Officer." At this time, the practice (still continued) of stationing a sergeant's guard at the theatres during performances originated in a fracas which occurred in this house. The Lincoln's Inn Theatre recovered its patent soon after Sir Richard Steele had obtained a license for the theatre in Drury-lane, and several of the best actors deserted the banner of the witty but improvident manager in favour of Rich.

In consequence of this and other circumstances favourable to Rich's management, the pantomime of "Doctor Faustus" produced two hundred and sixty pounds on the first night, while Drury performed to empty benches. However, according to a tradition still current in the purlieus of Clare Market, the success of "Faustus" was not without a serious drawback, for it is related that during a chorus of twelve devils, a thirteenth made his appearance uncalled by the prompter, and taking it in dudgeon, carried off a large portion of the roof in his exit. However, the story has likewise been told in reference to the performance of Marlowe's play, and is said to have had the effect of frightening Ned Alleyn so that he thenceforward eschewed the profanity of stage plays, and lived by the card. The "Beggar's Opera," which made "Gay rich and Rich gay," was the crowning glory of the Lincoln's Inn House; and having led the town during its uninterrupted run of sixty-three nights, the house could hold no more, but, "cribb'd, cabined, and confined," it panted for room, and finally the company emigrated to the new theatre built for them by Shepherd, in Covent Garden, in the year 1732

The old house stood empty for some time after the departure of Rich's company, but was afterwards hired by Spenseino, a celebrated singer, for the performance of Italian operas. This was in 1734-5. Afterwards, Havard's tragedy of "King Charles the First," "A Tutor for the Beaux" by J. Hewitt, and Bickerstaff's "Dishonest Dead," were played within these walls, but it does not appear by any regular company. On the decline of the old house, Thespis was succeeded by Terpsichore; and the boards which had been trod by some of the most celebrated heroes of the sock and buskin, were now destined to the salutatory exercises of Hall, the original Locket (who was likewise a dancing-master), and his pupils.

Here he gave occasional balls, while Mrs. Hall catered for the refreshment of the actors, young Templars, and gay City youth who still haunted the once fashionable neighbourhood, at the Bell and Dragon, an ordinary opposite the theatre. After Hall's time occasional concerts, and exhibitions by various showmen, kept up for a time the varied measure of entertainment; then followed a fencing-master; after him an auctioneer; and, finally, the place came into the possession of Mr. Copeland, whose extensive stock of chinaware was seen for many a year occupying the still evident arrangement of boxes, pit, and gallery; and the walls which had been graced by Royalty, and had resounded to the tragic declamation of Betterton, were still the resort of rank and fashion, who came there to cheapen china or bargain for a tea-service.

The property was sold to the College of Surgeons by Mr. Copeland, who has removed his establishment to No. 160, New Bond-street. There was little save the external walls remaining of the old theatre in Portugal-street. The large pile consisted of four walls, reared upon a substantially-arched cellar. Little of the original appropriation could be traced, save in the large well staircase; the long-room upon the first floor, resembling a saloon; and the upper floor, lighted by windows in the roof, which was, probably, the painting-room. All plan of the auditory seemed to be lost in the refitting by the various occupants of the premises.

Nearly opposite the old theatre, in the Portugal-street burying-ground, lie the remains of honest Jo, or Josiah Miller, the godfather of many jests; and at the end of the street, the Black Jack, a tavern associated with the palmy days of the Duke's and Drury-lane as a famous resort of the players, still ministers to the thirsty denizens of Clare Market, having survived its contemporaries, the Rose and the Sun, together with the attractions which once rendered its neighbourhood one of the most brilliant resorts of the gay, the witty, and the fashionable.

THE GREAT PALM-STOVE AT KEW GARDENS.

THE popularity of the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew, under the able curatorship of Sir W. J. Hooker, has been extending for some years. Last year the number of visitors to these delightful Gardens was 64,000; and it is estimated that the number during the present year will amount to 128,000. From an interesting letter addressed by Sir William Hooker to Lord Morpeth, and read in the House of Commons, upon the recent application of a vote for the expenses of the works in the Gardens, we learn that "the general arrangement of the Gardens is complete; that is to say, that, from an insufficient and a most indifferent piece of ground of eleven acres, totally inadequate for any scientific purpose, or for public recreation, the Garden given to public use no extends to seventy-six acres of botanic ground, and about 150 of pleasure-g arboretum, obtained without purchase (being made over by her jesty for the public use)."

The Garden is not only a means of recreation, but of instruction. "h school of horticulture and botany," says Sir W. Hooker, "this noble ins to [illegible] Professor of the Botanic [illegible] beats of it, and in the short space of time months it has become a most im portant feature in the Garden. While, in the Museum, we exhibit the various useful products living plants—here, in the Museum, we exhibit the various useful products of plants, whether employed in the arts, in commerce, [illegible] ic economy."

One of the aids to this increasing popularity we consider to be the admirable Guide to the Gardens, which Sir W. Hooker has published for sixpence!

At the base of the tower, between it and the Richmond road, is the coal-yard, concealed by shrubs; and here, too, within the underground tunnel above alluded to, is a railroad for the purpose of conveying coals to the furnaces, and for bringing away the ashes. The immediate vicinity of the palm-houses, with its terrace, will be laid out in a manner suited to such a structure. To the westward is a considerable area of lawn, of some 15 acres, destined to form a pinetum, where will soon be planted all the coniferous plants which bear the open air; while from the great western entrance of the palm-stove three vistas will radiate at various distances, commanding views through the pinetum, one [illegible] to the south, in the direction of the Pagoda; the second, or western vista, towards the river and woods of Syon; and the third towards Brentford. From the south-eastern angle of the palm-house the walk is continued round the water; and from the opposite side the best view of the structure may be seen, and its reflection in the lake."

Probably, during the present year, according to the Guide, the inmates of the Conservatory, or Architectural Greenhouse, will be removed to the Great Palm-Stove. Among them are the following Palmæ:—Date, Dwarf, Palmyra, Guinea Oil, Cocoa-nut, Cabbage, Wax, &c.; all which are popularly [illegible] in the Catalogue

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1848.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, it appears, is to proceed to Ireland to confer with Lord Clarendon in person upon the state of the country, and the remedies to be applied to its social condition. Though we do not anticipate that the Premier will greatly increase his knowledge by a sojourn in Dublin, or that he will have opportunities for making a very intimate investigation into the wants and miseries of the people by a tour in the provinces, his visit cannot fail to be considered, in Ireland, as both opportune and politic. It is, therefore, calculated to be of service. There is also a rumour that the Government intends to grant a general amnesty to all the persons implicated in the late Rebellion. We trust the rumour will prove to be correct. The Government could well afford to be so merciful. The Irish Leaders have in reality though much against their own will—done good service to the whole Empire. They have rendered rebellion ridiculous. They have shown their own utter incapacity and powerlessness. They have deprived a pernacious bugbear of its terrors, and proved that the long-dreaded, and often-threatened, Rebellion, which has been held over the Government of this country for so many years, might burst over our heads in all its intensity without doing any large amount of mischief. That which seemed terrible to the imaginations of our statesmen before it was tried, descended from the regions of the terrible into those of the farcical, as soon as it was enacted before their eyes. For this result we have to thank Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Meagher. They did not intend it, it is true; but, as the country has all the benefit, and they all the disgrace of their ridiculous discomfiture, the Government could not, we think, do better than show its contentment and its kindness at the same time, by taking their word of honour or their bond, for their peaceable behaviour for the rest of their lives, and letting them go free. Whatever sting may yet be in them or in their cause, would be effectually taken out of them by an amnesty: and if the act were accompanied by an announcement that honest remedial measures for raising the social condition of the potato-feeding people would be immediately taken, the Whigs would have a better opportunity of success in governing and improving Ireland, than ever yet fell to the lot of our statesmen. The generosity of Great Britain towards Irishmen was shown in our munificent donation of ten millions to feed them in 1846. Our power was shown in the easy suppression of the Rebellion of 1848. We have yet to show our wisdom in devising and executing schemes for the permanent improvement of the condition of the people. We have now an opportunity of doing so, which the Whigs will do well to take. Their financial history is not a pleasant one; their general policy is not favourable to their Colonies; and they have lost ground even amid their warmest friends in England. But a successful policy in Ireland would atone for all their faults and shortcomings. Lord John Russell seems to be aware of this; and if his visit to Ireland shall impress him more thoroughly with the fact, it will be the better for his Lordship's fame and for the interests of the country.

THE triumphant, not to say furious, Moderates, who form the majority in the National Assembly of France, have resolved, in spite of the warnings of cooler politicians—General Cavaignac included—to proceed to extremity against the men who are principally implicated in the events of May and June. It is impossible not to feel, on perusal even of the ex parte evidence already produced, that MM. Louis Blanc and Caussidière, and many others of as great or greater note in French politics, plotted the destruction of the National Assembly, when they found its monarchical tendencies so strongly developed. As the actual sovereignty of France resides in the Assembly, there can be no doubt that such a plot, especially when supported by violence and bloodshed, was a very great crime, deserving of the severest punishment; but it should be remembered that, in times of revolution, it is not always prudent to be severe. There is a general impression that the Assembly has allowed its passion to overmaster its judgment in this matter; and that the Barrots and the Thierses, in goading it into this path, have proved themselves in reality more formidable to its stability than ever Louis Blanc and Caussidière could have proved, especially if they had been left unscathed by the ordeal of a State prosecution. The Assembly, on its first day of meeting, proclaimed the Republic amid unprecedented enthusiasm. They raised their voices at the mere mention of the word, and shouted it in the ears of a mighty multitude as excited as themselves; but they no sooner entered upon their deliberative and magisterial functions, than it became evident to France and to the whole of Europe that the majority regretted both the Revolution and the Republic, and that they looked with hatred and mistrust upon the men who had been mainly instrumental in operating the one, and in founding the other. They took no pains to conceal their sentiments. At a time when every man of cool judgment was aware that the wisest, safest, and best course was to give the Republic a fair trial, the Assembly threw doubts upon Republicanism, and odium upon its teachers and believers. The "reaction" was so flagrant, that the Republicans, who had fought the battle of their principle amid every discouragement, difficulty, and peril during the reign of Louis Philippe, and who were naturally tenacious of it, when it so unexpectedly triumphed in the days of February, became alarmed both for their principle and for their safety. The Assembly threw down the gauntlet of defiance to them, and the Republicans "of the eve" were compelled to take it up. The Assembly was, therefore, more to blame for the unhappy results, than the ardent and sincere Republicans. They acted no doubt from conviction, but they acted unscrupulously with the truest conviction; and amid the boiling ferment necessarily engendered by a revolution, it is not prudent, wise, or safe to exasperate a powerful party, long united in danger, and struggling for a principle as dear to it as existence. Whatever the moderates of the Assembly may think or say, the Revolution itself is de facto put upon its trial by the recent debates in the Chamber. This was an issue to be avoided, even at the risk of allowing such men as Louis Blanc and Caussidière to remain unpunished. We trust, for the sake of the Assembly and the peace of France, that the reported escape of these two men will prove to be correct. We have no sympathy with either of them. Louis Blanc is a mischievous theorist; Caussidière an unprincipled adventurer: but their trial and condemnation would have excited such an amount of exasperation in and out of the Assembly, and so greatly imperilled the peace of the French Republic, that all those who sincerely desire the restoration of order in that country will, we think, have reason to rejoice that they have released the Assembly from a grave danger by their timely flight. If Albert (ouvrier), Barbès, Blanqui, and Raspail were their companions in exile, it would be an additional advantage to the French people.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

FETE ON PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.

Saturday last being the birthday of his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, a fête took place in the grounds at Osborne.

Tippoo Saib's tent and several large marquees were erected upon the Lawn opposite to the principal entrance, and most of the residents in the neighbourhood, as well as some of the principal visitors at Cowes and Ryde, were invited.

The day was very unfavourable, a thick mist, accompanied with constant showers, confining the company to the interior of the tents, and altogether precluding visits to the gardens or grounds, and preventing any out-of-door amusements.

The guests began to arrive at about half-past two, and, at a little after three o'clock, her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highness Prince Albert, the royal children and attendants, those of the nobility and gentry present joining in the dance, and shortly after the termination her Majesty and the Royal party retired, at a little before seven o'clock.

There was a large and distinguished party of the nobility present on the occasion.

In the evening the Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Prince Victor of Hohenlohe, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, and the Baroness de Speth.

At Windsor merry peals were rung during the day from the bells of the parish church and St. George's Chapel, and in the evening the houses of several of the [illegible] were illuminated.

[illegible] 25 lb. round of beef was [illegible] from the corporation ordnance, and also from the Belvedere Battery at Virginia Water.

On Tuesday the Queen and his Royal Highness, accompanied by the Princess Hohenlohe, and the younger branches of the Royal family, took their usual early walks and drove in the grounds at Osborne. His Excellency the Chevalier Bunsen and Prince Lowenstein arrived on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince. The Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady [illegible] Dawson, and the Baroness de Speth.

The Queen, Duchess of Kent, and Prince left town on Wednesday for the Isle of Wight, on a visit to her Majesty and Prince Albert.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their Lordships sat for a short time, and advanced [illegible] bills on the table a stage, and then adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The House met at [illegible] o'clock.

THE BANCHISE.—Mr. [illegible] gave notice that next session he would move a resolution [illegible] that it was desirable that the Houses, as at present constituted, did not fairly represent the property, population, or industry of the country, and that it was necessary to extend the franchise, to take the votes of the electors by ballot, and to limit the duration of each Parliament to three years.

SECRET SWEERS.—In answer to Mr. ANSTEY, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the insertion of advertisements relative to [illegible] was illegal; and he now said that public notice, that it would be his duty to prosecute parties contracting to insert them.

In answer to Major BLACKALL, Sir G. GREY said it was intended to alter the law [illegible] so as to [illegible] the Queen's Bench.

Lord MORPETH brought up the report of the Committee on Works of Art. Sir J. ISHAM observed that a public vote of thanks ought to be accorded to Mr. Vernon for his munificent gift of pictures to the National Gallery. Lord MORPETH said that the Committee had expressed their strong sense of the handsome donation made by Mr. Vernon. The report was received.

IRELAND.—Mr. ANSTEY said he had been informed by a Roman Catholic priest at Kenmare, to state that he had not, as had been alleged, torn down the Government proclamation offering rewards for the apprehension of persons charged with sedition.

THE COPPER AND LEAD DUTIES BILL.—On the motion for the third reading of this bill, Lord G. BENTINCK moved as an amendment that it be read that day month.

On a division, the third reading was carried by a majority of 38 to 25; and the bill was then read a third time and passed.

THE FOUR LAW JUDGES' PROCEEDINGS RESTRICTION BILL was read a third time and passed.

CHELTENHAM ELECTION.—Mr. H. PALMER took occasion to direct the attention of the House to an act which had been made the subject-matter of the press against him and the other members of the Cheltenham Election Committee, by the late member for that city, Mr. Craven Berkeley, who had [illegible] the most unfair and unjustifiable charges against those gentlemen for their decision in unseating Mr. Berkeley. He would not, at that late period of the session, however, take any further notice of the matter.—Lord G. BENTINCK, Lord PALMERSTON, and Sir J. O'CONNELL concurred in strongly reprehending the attack to which the hon. gentleman had directed attention, and observed that the character of the hon gentlemen assailed was of itself a sufficient refutation. The House then adjourned at half-past five o'clock.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY AND FRANCE.

The news respecting Northern Italy is rather of a menacing character. In a conference held at Vienna, on the 22d ult., between M. de Wessenberg and the representatives of England and France, the Austrian Minister is understood to have declared that he declined the offered mediation, as the cause of the Austrian Government, on the grounds that the Government was in direct communication with King Charles Albert, and had not been informed that the latter had consented to such intervention, and, moreover, pending that all the conditions of the armistice had not been fulfilled. This latter observation was an allusion to Venice, and to the fact of the Sardinian fleet still assuming a hostile position towards that city.

This refusal of mediation, it is feared, may lead to a general war, for in Paris it appears to be a settled point, that if Austria should persist in refusing to give up Lombardy to Lombardy, the Army of the Alps will cross the frontier. The position of General Cavaignac is such, that he must either withdraw from office or take this course. The bourgeoisie are for peace, but the best friends of the Government do not dare to draw back since the promise of intervention in a given case, would not only enable the ultra Republicans to excite the populace, but would also create disaffection in the army; and as they prefer war to anarchy, they support General Cavaignac's policy in an armed intervention.

The last accounts from Grenoble state that the French Army of the Alps is now 60,000 strong, of whom about 16,000 are experienced troops from Algeria. There is a numerous materiel, and cannon and ammunition were arriving every day.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN

According to the latest accounts from Hamburg an armistice of seven months has been concluded between the German and Danish Powers. The German ports were, in consequence, all freed from the blockade on the 1st inst. The armistice is to terminate on the 1st of March, 1849.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.—It is now considered almost certain that Parliament will be prorogued by her Majesty in person on Tuesday next, the 5th inst.

THE CHARTISTS.—On Sunday a great many meetings of the Chartist and Confederate bodies were held for the purpose of adopting such measures as would obtain for the working classes the Charter, and also to take the present state of Europe into consideration. The Government having obtained information of these meetings, the greatest precautions were taken by the Police Commissioners to prevent the parties from creating a disturbance at any of the gatherings. This was found the more necessary, from the fact of Feargus Powell, the person who gave evidence against Mr. Ernest Jones, having come to town with assassination. A few days back, a person called upon Mrs. Lindley, 23, Gloucester-row, Hoxton, and enquired whether Powell lived there. She answered in the negative (Mr. Powell lives in a house next door), and he then replied, that it would not be long before her house would be attacked by several men, and, unless she got protection, the house would be burned down, and she and every one in it would also be set on fire. The following morning, having communicated the circumstance to the police, men in plain clothes have been placed on duty in the neighbourhood, to protect the building in the event of the threat being attempted to be carried into execution. On discovering what sort of a feeling would be excited against Powell, had him and his family removed from his residence in Gloucester-row to another part of the town, where he is placed under the protection of the police.

PROTECTION OF LIFE AND PROPERTY FROM FIRE.—On Tuesday, a meeting of the inhabitants of St. Pancras was held at the Bedford Arms, to receive the report of a committee which had been appointed to wait upon the Ministers with the view of ascertaining whether some better means than at present existed could not be adopted for the protection of life and property from fire. Lord Dudley Stuart, M.P., who occupied the chair, called upon Mr. Fogo to read the report. This was a voluminous document. It stated that the committee, which had been appointed at a public meeting on the 9th February last, had directed their attention to the various modes at present in use for the purpose of preventing injury from fire. They had examined Mr. Wivell's fire-escape, and had proved it to be a most efficient instrument. They had also examined Phillips's patented fire annihilator, and had proved it to be a cheap and ready means of generating steam in sufficient quantities to stifle large masses of flame. They had likewise investigated the properties of Payne's patented process. This simply consisted of the formation of a solution of alum into layers of the wood, from which the acid had been previously extracted; and they found that wood which had undergone that process was far from being readily susceptible to the influence of fire. On the 10th of February last, the committee, kindly introduced by Lord Dudley Stuart, had an interview of three-quarters of an hour's duration with Sir George Grey. The inadequacy of the Building Act of 1774, which enjoined the appointment of one engine and six men for each parish, led to the question of a proper remedy, and it was proposed that a system of stations throughout the metropolis should be adopted, for which it would probably be necessary to introduce a short bill into Parliament at the next session of the present Parliament. Sir George Grey entered certainly into the details of the matter. The report having been adopted, several resolutions were agreed to, appointing a committee and embodying more fully the objects of the meeting.

CLARENCE ROAD BRIDGE COMPANY.—On Tuesday the half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this Company was held at their offices in Wilmington-street, Strand, to receive the directors' report. Lord Dover in the chair. The report stated that the tolls for the half-year ending July 31 amounted to £3068 3s. 7d., sufficient, after defraying the current expenses, to enable the directors to declare a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. The receipts during the past six months have not equalled those of the corresponding period of last year, this being attributable to the unfavourable state of the weather. The report referred to the opening of the South-Western Railway station in July last, the effect of which would form an important addition to the receipts of the Company. An amicable settlement of all matters of difference has been effected with the Market Company, by which that Company has agreed to take £1,000 as all hard costs in full of all demands for damages against the Bridge Company arising out of the lease of November 2, 1840, in respect of the pier and land and the access of steam boat passengers thereto. The report having been adopted, it was moved and seconded that a dividend of four per cent. should be declared payable on or after the 11th of September next. The resolution was carried unanimously. Several new directors were elected, in the room of those who had retired.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &c., FOR THE WEEK ENDING AUG. 26.—The Registrar-General's weekly return of the number of births, deaths, &c., in the metropolis and suburbs, shows that the births during the above week amounted to 1329, of which 683 were males and 646 females. This number exceeds by 37 that of the preceding week. The deaths during the same week were 991 in number, of which 486 were males and 485 females. The births for the week this exceed the deaths by 374. The deaths for the week are below the weekly average for the last five summers by 21, and below the deaths of the preceding week (notwithstanding [illegible] deaths. The diseases from which the deaths have exceeded the [illegible] were [illegible] scarlatina 30, average 17, [illegible] 31; dropsy 14, average 22; consumption 161, average 145; hydrocephalus 37, average 33; convulsions 25, average 26; [illegible] 30, average 12; asthma 4, average 8, [illegible] 8, average 17. This week the deaths from cholera have fallen off in number, and precisely equal to the average, viz seven; none of them remarkable cases

SKETCHES IN IRELAND.

ARDFINAN CASTLE AND VILLAGE, FROM THE NORTH, WITH THE KNOCKMEALDOWN MOUNTAINS IN THE DISTANCE

do here. Wages sufficient to induce men and women to work are paid in Kent, not so in Tipperary. Nothing is so continually manifest to the observer here, as the want of labour in the fields, and the number of people everywhere without employment, and yet during that nobody will employ them, not even at sixpence per day.

The population of the county was, at the taking of the last census, 435,[illegible]. There were 34,100 farms of more than one acre each (the average seems to run between 15 and 30 acres). The [illegible] Clonmel, with a population of 13,000; Nenagh, 8818; Carrick-on-Suir, 11,019; Thurles, 7523; Cashel, 7036; Roscrea, 6975; Fethard, 6814; Cahir, 6688; Templemore, 5488; Clogheen, 2810; and Tipperary, from which the county takes its name, 7321.

Ardfinan town stands near the centre of the most fertile district of that fertile county. It consists of one long main street running along an acclivity with a southern aspect, with lanes and other streets extending on each side. Viewed from a gentleman's house on the north side, we have before us the parish church, a row of neat cottages, poorly thatched, inhabited by people poorly clothed, and employed as they have no work to do, while, beyond the town, we have a view of the Workhouse and Fever Hospital, and another building, [illegible] purposes. Behind these rises a ridge of hills, the property chiefly of Augustus Stafford, Esq., M.P. (better known as Stafford O'Brien)—having but recently obtained the Royal license to change his name); and beyond that ridge of hills rise the Galtee Mountains, the vale of Aherlo intervening. Viewed from the south, near the Workhouse, we have the unfinished railway station immediately before us, and the town, beautifully chequered with gardens and trees, rising beyond: those gardens, when we approach them and look over the walls, are so completely overgrown with thistles, docks, and luxuriant coolness, that you cannot tell nor even guess at the nature of the crop that may have been sown—whether potatoes, turnips, or cabbages. Outside the walls, by the railway sides, and [illegible] street corner, [illegible], and [illegible], of all ages and sizes, are gathering around strangers to beg, and to every question of "Why are you begging and not working?" the reply is, "There is no work to do."

THE TOWN OF TIPPERARY, FROM THE NORTH, WITH THE GALTEE MOUNTAINS

From Tipperary we travelled to Cahir, eleven miles. This town occupies a situation of singular beauty on both banks of the Suir river. It is chiefly the property of the Earl of Glengall. The well-cultivated fields, rich in their crops of grain, now ripe, and in process of being harvested, prove that some causes have been at work to improve this district. We obtained access to the tower of the Bridewell, from whence a good view of the town and surrounding country is obtained. From a point on the river side, below the ancient castle and bridge, we took another view. The large flour-mills, one of which is beside the bridge, are objects of industrial interest, which the traveller finds occurring more frequently on the river Suir than on any other river in the south of Ireland.

BURNING OF "THE OCEAN MONARCH," EMIGRANT SHIP; DRAWN BY MOREL FATIO, FROM THE SKETCH-BOOK OF THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE.

This dreadful calamity was briefly noticed in our Postscript last week. We now accompany our Illustration of the sad catastrophe with a full statement of details.

The scene presented in the Engraving, it should be stated, is from a sketch made by the Prince de Joinville, who so distinguished himself by his humane exertions on the lamentable occasion. This sketch was placed by the Prince in the hands of M. Morel Fatio, the celebrated Marine Painter, to make what-ever use he pleased of it, either as the subject of a painting or an engraving.

Early on Thursday morning, the 24th ult., the ocean Monarch sailed from Liverpool for the United States, with 386 souls on board. She had not proceeded many miles ere the fire was discovered. A brief unavailing endeavour was made to save the ship, but the flames were unconquerable, and the vast multitude on board surrendered themselves to despair.

The burning element progressed from stem to stern, spars and masts, wrapt one by one in the living flame, fell, circling in their descent the shrieking masses on the deck, and numbers in desperate frenzy sought safety but to find death in the waves around.

The yacht Queen of the Ocean, and the Brazilian steam-frigate Affonso, which were in the vicinity, hasten-ed to render assistance, and by their boats rescued numbers. Other vessels also rendered assist-ance, but yet the lamentable fact must be recorded, that of the vast multitude on board a large propor-tion perished.

The first assistance was rendered by Mr Littledale, in his yacht Queen of the Ocean. Mr Littledale, who is the Commodore of the Royal Mersey Yacht Club, had been at Beaumaris regatta, which took place on the preceding Monday, and he was returning in his yacht to Liverpool with a party of friends when he espied the fire; he immediately bore down to render assistance, and the powerful exertions of himself and crew succeeded in saving thirty-two persons.

The scene which presented itself to Mr Littledale on nearing the vessel was of the most appalling and harrowing description. That gentleman truly describes it as awful, and such as he hopes never to witness again. The flames were bursting with immense fury from the stern and centre of the vessel.

So great was the heat in these parts, that the passengers, male and female, men, women, and children crowded to the fore part of the vessel. In their maddened despair women jumped overboard with their offspring in their arms, and sank to rise no more. Men followed their wives in frenzy, and were lost. Groups of men, women, and children, also precipitated themselves into the water, in the vain hope of self-preservation, but the waters closed over many of them for ever. No pen can describe this awful scene. The flames continued to rage with increased fury. In a few minutes the mizenmast went over-board; a few minutes more, and the mainmast shared the same fate. There yet remained the foremast. As the fire was making its way to the fore part of the vessel, the passengers and crew, of course, crowded still further forward. To the jibboom they clung in clusters as thick as they could pack, even one lying over another. At length the foremast went overboard, snapping the fastenings of the jibboom, which, with its load of human beings, dropped into the water, amidst the most heart-rending screams both of those on board and those who were falling into the water. Some of the poor creatures were enabled again to reach the vessel, others floated away in agony, but many met with a watery grave.

The Brazilian frigate Affonso was out on a pleasure excursion. She was commanded by Captain J. M. Lisbon. There were also on board the Prince de Joinville, his lady and suite, the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, the Brazilian Minister, the Chevalier de Lisboa, Admiral Greenfell and daughters, and other distinguished persons. When the Affonso descried the Ocean Monarch, no time was lost in bearing down to her, and it was intended to carry her right under her lee, but the wind changed a little, and pre-vented this from being accomplished. Her boats were, however, at once lowered, and were soon fol-lowed by the large paddle-box boat. Captain Lisboa jumped into one, and Admiral Greenfell into the other, and were unremitting in their exertions to save the poor people. The Prince de Joinville was particularly assiduous in assisting the passengers on board the frigate. The heat was very intense, and even to those on board the vessels it was oppressive. What it must have been to those who were crowding on the poop and forepart of the vessel, it is only left for those who experienced it to suffer, and, however, to make them aware of the water, seeking either some element by taking shelter in another equally as destructive, or for the consuming sea to effect. From the crowd of human beings in the water clinging to the spars, some of the boats were unable to get as close to the vessel as they otherwise would have done, and their exertions doubtless were unavailingly consumed in rescuing the poor unfortunates.

Several pounds were collected on board the yacht for the relief of the sufferers. The Princes, on Friday, when leaving Liverpool for London, left behind them a handsome donation for the benefit of the survivors.

The Affonso rescued in all about 160 persons, including fifteen seamen. Of these, about 140 landed, and the remainder preferred staying on board the frigate all night, the Marquis de Lisboa having given directions that all who were desirous of remaining should be accommodated in the best way possible.

The conduct of Admiral Greenfell, Brazilian Commissioner, Captain Lisboa, Mr Frost, Vice-Consul, and the officers and crew of the Brazilian frigate Affonso, is beyond praise. All exerted themselves in a most energetic and humane manner, and Admiral Greenfell has been most untiring in his exertions to procure clothes, money, and provisions for the survivors.

The Prince and Princess de Joinville, the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale, and the Chevalier Lisboa, Brazilian Minister, also gave every succour to the afflicted when brought on board the Affonso.

We must not omit to mention an act of heroism exhibited towards the close of this melancholy scene. When only a dozen helpless women and children remained on the burning wreck, paralysed with fear and totally incapable of helping themselves by descending from the tottering bowsprit to the boats which in the midst of the heavy sea and wreck in vain offered their assistance below, an Englishman, Frederick Jermyn, a native of Portsmouth, a seaman of the Queen on ship New Brunswick, stripping himself naked, made his way through the sea and wreck, and with a line in his hand, succeeded in lowering the last helpless victims safely into the boats, being himself the last man to leave the wreck. On his arrival on board the Brazilian steam-frigate Affonso, he was received on the quarter-deck by the Prince de Joinville's and Duke d'Aumale, who, shaking him by the hand, praised his gallantry in the most flattering terms, bestowing on him at the same time an ample gratuity.

Captain Murdock, the commander of the ill-fated vessel, has furnished the following narrative of the sad affair:—

"The Ocean Monarch sailed from the river at daylight in the morning, in tow of a steam-tug. A fresh breeze was blowing at the time. About 8 o'clock the pilot and the steam-tug left us. We made all sail, and proceeded to sea. Nothing of any consequence occurred until about 12 o'clock, when the cry of 'cook ship' was given. We were then about six miles this side of the Great Ormshead. After the yards were squared, the steward of the ship came up and told me that one of the passengers had lit a fire in one of the ventilators in the afterpart of the ship. I immediately sent an officer and one man with the steward to see to the matter—to put out the fire, and to bring up the delinquent. I at once went below, and discovered smoke proceeding into the main cabin, through one of the after state-rooms. We began without delay to throw water down; but in five minutes afterwards, indeed almost instantly, the afterpart of the ship burst into flames. We put the ship before the wind in order to lessen the draught, but were obliged to bring her to again. The fire produced the utmost confusion amongst the passengers—all appeared frantic with despair; yells and screams of the most horrifying description were uttered; all control over them was lost; my voice could not be heard, nor my orders obeyed. Finding that nothing could be done with the yards, I caused both of the anchors to be let go, that the ship's head might be to wind, and the fire be kept as abaft as possible. The passengers crowded in numbers to the bowsprit, to avoid the heat of the flames, many in alarm and despair, and, in consequence, fell down, although spars and all loose materials lying about deck were thrown out for them to cling to, a great majority were drowned.

"In spite of all that could be done, the flames increased. I gave orders to get the boats out. Two of them were got out, but before the lashings of the others could be cut they were enveloped in flames. The mate and several of the passengers, with part of the crew, got into one of the boats which was covered, and a portion of the crew, with some passengers, into the other. The last thing which I did was to throw overboard a topgallant yard, with the assistance of the carpenter and one or two men, with a rope attached to it, to make it fast alongside, and to tell the people to jump overboard and cling to it; then, finding the flames approaching so rapidly that I could neither get forward nor aft, I was obliged to leave myself overboard, and cling to the spar for a short time, but finding that there were too many already clinging to it, I swam to a boat which fortunately floated near us, and after remaining in the water about half an hour, was picked up by the pilot-boat Queen of the Ocean, which, I should, perhaps, have stated before, that, seeing our disaster, the Queen of the Ocean yacht, owned by Mr. Thomas Littledale, of Liverpool, with a party of his friends on board, hove down to us, lowered her boat, and the crew, with indefatigable exertions, were the means of saving the lives of 32. In the meantime, while the yacht was rendering every assistance in her power, the Irish steam-ship steamer Ayrshire, and the Prince of Wales steamer, bound to Bangor, with the packet-ship New World, sent their boats, and were the means of saving many that were clinging to the wreck and floating about on the spars; their exertions were great and praiseworthy. The Queen of the Ocean remained alongside till three o'clock, and when she had done all that was possible to do, set sail for Liverpool. Mr. and Mrs. Dow, of Glasgow, Mr. Soulsby with, and Mr. Fellowes, are amongst the cabin passengers whom I know to have been saved. As to the origin of the fire, I differ from a published statement that I have seen. From what we could gather in the after-part of the ship, the ventilators were of iron. The fire originated, in my opinion, from smoking amongst the steerage passengers, the night before severe pipes were taken from them. The fire was instantaneous; five minutes after it was discovered the whole stern of the ship was in flames. The cargo consisted of iron, dry goods, salt, and earthenware, the latter being packed in crates stuffed with straw. There were, I calculate, about 330 souls altogether on board; but, as we had not completed our classifying arrangements, the exact number I cannot positively tell. There were, I think, 91 first and second cabin, and 307 steerage passengers; the crew consisted of 42 hands, including myself."

The Ocean Monarch went down at her anchors at half-past one o'clock on Friday morning. The weather was fine and calm. With the exception of the solid timbers about the stern, on which we the lashings had been in an almost perfect state, the fire had consumed the whole of her upper works to within a few inches of the water's edge. Indeed, so even was the work of destruction round the sides of the ship, that it appeared as if some skilful hand had been employed. The wind first made its way into the after part of the ship. As she gradually settled herself into the bosom of the sea, large volumes of flames rushed forward with a hissing and crackling sound, till at length the water completely buried her, and the remains of this once noble vessel disappeared in about 14 minutes, amid a heavy swell for the moment.

There is considerable discrepancy in the statements which have been published as to the number of persons on board the Ocean Monarch at the time she left the Mersey. The following is from authentic sources:

With a view of obtaining a complete muster of the survivors, so that their names, for the satisfaction of their relations and friends, might be recorded, and that the plans of relief which public generosity so freely contributes might be duly administered to them, the Messrs. Harnden called a meeting on Monday of the whole of the passengers that could be found, at their offices, in Waterloo-road. Nearly 180 drew up. Although private charity had in the meantime provided clothing for many, and had otherwise done much, a majority of the poor creatures were in the most wretched and destitute condition. One poor woman who was present had lost not less than five of her children; and it was pitiable to hear the recital of personal loss and peril which each poor sufferer had to tell. The poor creatures who assembled were taken under charge of two of Messrs Harnden's clerks to the London police office in High-street, where clothing of the most miscellaneous kind—contributions of which had been poured in with a liberal hand—was distributed to the sufferers by Mr. Superintendent Clough.

On Monday an inquest on five of the bodies of the unfortunate sufferers was entered upon by Mr. Curry, the coroner. The witnesses examined unanimously concurred in exculpating the captain from blame. In other respects their evidence did not supply any material facts to the ample information already given. The subscription in aid of the survivors on Tuesday amounted to £190.

Captain Hunter, of the Welch steamer Cambria, has forwarded the following letter in justification of his conduct in this affair:

"Sir,—Many rumours having been circulated to my prejudice in consequence of my not having returned to the assistance of the ship Ocean Monarch on my passage from Beaumaris to Liverpool, I have to request your kindness in inserting the following facts bearing on the case:—Before leaving the Menai Bridge, I had given all my disposable coals to the steamer Medina, reserving only sufficient to take the Cambria to Liverpool, as can be proved by the engineers of the two vessels. On Thursday morning I left Beaumaris about half-past nine o'clock. At half-past eleven we passed the Ocean Monarch, then standing in shore. Soon after this she tacked and stood to the northward. At half-past twelve my attention was called to smoke arising from the ship, as if she were on fire, when I instantly applied to the engineer to know if he had coals to take us to the ship and back; when he replied that he had not. At this time we were at least ten or twelve miles from the ship. We saw the Queen much nearer to her, and proceeding towards her, as was also the Prince of Wales; and to these vessels I hoisted a signal that the ship was in distress. There was also a ship and a yacht within a short distance of the ship, making towards her, and I thought myself abreast of us at the time. Not knowing that she was an emigrant ship, I was led to conclude that there was sufficient assistance at hand. Besides, it is right that I should state that I had two hundred passengers on board, and my vessel was completely crowded with live stock, which would have rendered it difficult at any time to render efficient assistance, but on this occasion much more so, from the sea that was on. Had I proceeded, as has been said, I must necessarily have remained at anchor until a supply of coals could have been procured to enable me to return, and in this position, should it have come on to blow, there can be little doubt that the General would have been placed in great jeopardy. These circumstances considered, I still feel that I should not have been justified in running the risk of sacrificing the lives of those passengers who had entrusted themselves to my care. It could be none my intention on my part to render assistance when practicable. In support of which I may mention that when the engine of a rival steamer on the line broke down off Ormshead, in bad weather, I returned to her assistance and saved her passengers and crew, and, with the engines out of repair, I had given assistance in this most melancholy case. I beg to subscribe myself, your most obedient servant,

"Liverpool, August 26." "JOHN HUNTER

ALLEGED CAUSE OF THE FIRE. A correspondent says that at one of the seamen who escaped from the burning ship thus explains the cause of the fire:—"Edward Jenkins (a seaman on board) had been going into the hold with a lighted candle, about 9 A.M., and in 20 minutes after, came up again without the candle. About 12 o'clock a smoke was seen issuing from under the cabin [illegible] hazzarded a conjecture that the candle was the cause of it. There was [illegible] to be on fire. A seaman on board afterwards asked Edward Jenkins for the candle was? He said that he had put it in his pocket to grease his shoes. [illegible] wine, spirits, and tobacco in the lazzarette all [illegible]

ROBBERY OF SOME OF THE SURVIVORS, AND SUSPICIOUS DISAPPEARANCE OF ONE OF THEM. Mr. Henry Powell, of Portman-place, Maida-hill, London, who had taken a cabin passage on board the Ocean Monarch, with a view of joining his family at Cincinnati, has published a statement in the Liverpool papers, in which, after bearing testimony to the courage, presence of mind, and praiseworthy conduct of Captain Murdoch, throughout the dreadful scene, and describing his own providential escape, and the kind treatment he has since received from Mr. Parr and family, of the Hotel at Bangor, where he made a stop in [illegible] the sad catastrophe, he gives the following narrative:—"I remained about for two or three hours, a pilot boat, called the Pilot Queen, of Conway, with the letters painted in yellow on her stern, and the letters P.C. [illegible] on her sail, approached us, and took us on board—but more for the purpose of robbing than from any motives of humanity, as was afterwards proved. As soon as I got on board, I, with several other passengers, went below; we stripped off our wet clothes and tumbled into the berths for warmth, most of us being dreadfully sea-sick at the time. In about an hour after I heard a loud quarrel upon deck. I immediately dressed myself in a seaman's old tarn jacket and trousers, wrapped a blanket round my chest, and proceeded above. It appeared that the men belonging to the pilot boat were determined to take us no farther, their excuse being that it was [illegible] to Liverpool, and to put us on board another party, however, was, that their object was to return to the neighbourhood of the burning ship and pick up all the articles they could find. They had already secured several boxes, one trunk belonging to [illegible] and were busily engaged in breaking open another. I then behind in their possession, together with the boat in which we had effected our escape from the vessel. This our party determined to resist, and henceforth the pilots, who, I understand, is now being inquired into at the Police-office. When we left this pilot-boat, the Pilot Queen, of Chester (her name cannot be made too public), one of the passengers was below in one of the berths, perfectly naked, not able to dress himself in time to leave with us. He was a very respectable-looking young man, and had money about him, as I myself heard him offer the men a sovereign to take him on shore. In the confusion, hurry, and quarrel he was left behind, nor has he since been heard of. When we named the circumstance to the men belonging to the fishing-smack, their reply was, 'If they find out that he's got money are they'll murder him and throw him overboard. They'll never think to be found out;' and concluded their remarks by observing, 'That we had no idea of the black work go on in those quarters.' I was very much heard-hearted, for can I divest my mind of the uneasiness I have since felt with regard to the fate of this young man. I hope every inquiry will be made to trace him out. The fishing-smack brought us safe to Scarborough, where we landed. She was managed by two Irishmen, who treated us with every kindness." The name of the individual above referred to is said to be Coombes, and it is added that his father keeps a shoe-shop in Liverpool, and that he has a married sister there. It is, therefore, very remarkable, considering the time that has elapsed since the accident, that he has not yet been heard of. Mr. Powell, in a letter to us from Liverpool, on Wednesday, says that the police who had been employed in a search of the crew of the pilot boat had returned with a part of them, and had recovered his watch.

THE HUMANE SOCIETY'S REWARDS.—On Wednesday, in Liverpool, at a meeting of the Shipwreck and Humane Society, held for the purpose of taking into consideration the services rendered by the parties instrumental in rescuing the sufferers from the wreck of the ship Ocean Monarch, the following were awarded by Wynn, of the Mint, were presented to Mr. Littledale, owner of the yacht Queen of the Ocean; Admiral [illegible], General; Captain Lisbon, commander of the Prince of Wales steamer, and Mr. Bow, of Glasgow. Mr. Soulsby was also voted to the crew of Mr. Littledale's yacht. It is intended to reward other parties as soon as the respective merits of each shall have been adjudged. With respect to the noble owner, Mr. Littledale, some doubt had been expressed relative to his being an Englishman, we may observe that it has been ascertained, from the Seamen's Register-office at the Custom House, that Jerome is a native of Old, not New, England, born at Portsmouth, the 14th of May, 1824, and that he first went to sea in the year 1838. He has been seven years in the American merchant service, and he obtained his registry at Liverpool on the 11th of June, 1845. The mate of the Ocean Monarch, when giving his evidence before the committee, stated that, being aware that Jerome was on board of the New World, and having witnessed his courageous exertions when the packet-ship Henry Clay was stranded near New York, he proceeded in a boat on board the New World and conveyed him to the wreck. The Mayor of Liverpool having written to the Prince de Joinville and the Duke d'Aumale, requesting thanks to be tendered to the gallant fellow, the Duke d'Aumale, returning thanks to the latter for the interest he took in the matter, stated that he had been ascertained, from the Seamen's Register-office at the Custom House, that Jerome is a native of Old, not New, England, born at Portsmouth, the 14th of May, 1824, and that he first went to sea in the year 1838. He has been seven years in the American merchant service, and he obtained his registry at Liverpool on the 11th of June, 1845. The mate of the Ocean Monarch, when giving his evidence before the committee, stated that, being aware that Jerome was on board of the New World, and having witnessed his courageous exertions when the packet-ship Henry Clay was stranded near New York, he proceeded in a boat on board the New World and conveyed him to the wreck. The Mayor of Liverpool having written to the Prince de Joinville and the Duke d'Aumale, requesting thanks to be tendered to the latter for their exertions during the burning of the Ocean Monarch, a reply was received on Wednesday morning, expressing their gratification, and also passing the exertions of the various parties instrumental in saving the poor emigrants. The bowsprit of the Ocean Monarch was seen on Tuesday morning, off the north-west lightship. Up to Wednesday the contributions amounted to upwards of £3000.

THE LOSS OF THE "OCEAN MONARCH."

THEY had built the gallant vessel
Like a palace of the deep;
The mountain foam to crest above,
The mountain wave to sweep.
Too firm for any tempest,
Too stout for any strife!
And they fill'd it with the beauty
And the strength of human life.

They call'd the young ambition
That lost hope on British shore;
The bravery hand of labour
That had work to wield no more.
The weary and the grieving,
From their want and woe to roam,
And to live in that "sea palace,"
Till it bore them to a home.

They came in crowding hundreds,
The tired of the land;
They quicken'd into brotherhood,
And made a "happy band"
Their Emigrant Company made
Grew friendly, warm, and free,
With the last in the heart's sunshine
Is the joy "Pale o' the Sea."

They got a brave commander,
And a trusty-handed crew;
Limbs strong as masts, and like the rpes
For sinew and for thew.
They set the white sail to the ship
(Proud wings its way to brave);
And they raised a shout of glory
When it sprang along the wave!

They called it "OCEAN MONARCH!"
As a Ruler leave a name
On that robust and regal frame
They typified a King.
In vain! after the gale of waves
Right royally he trod,
There is NO OCEAN MONARCH
But the "ONE ETERNAL GOD!"

The "ONE ETERNAL GOD," to whom
These screams of anguish rise
The rending of poor fear struck souls,
That shriek unto the skies.
That rave out tears, half groans, and pray rs,
Against the mighty ire,
The while their "Palace of the Sea"
Is bursting into fire.

The masts will be flame-pillars,
Loud must they blaze and break!
Yet, up them as well again!
They say the creatures take:
The fire-fear hot upon the brain,
The wife in her despair,
Still clinging round each other, and
Still climbing up—to Death!

Hark! watch! the forem st shivers,
And staggers to the de.
And victim and devourer
Is that giant of the wreck,
That trembles to its agitation,
With a dark distress of head,
Is ere ish'd, and strikes the water
With a thunderbolt of Dead!

Two Princes—lately struck themselves by sharp and sudden blow
Prove the quick depths of sympathy
With one another's woe!
And generous women ever fond
Of any fallen leaf—
Press round the sufferers, and would fain
Can—them out of grief!

One manly sailor shall stand forth
From all the group of "kind,
As having proved in direst worth,
Heart, muscle, courage, mind!
Bless his bold spirit! many a p—r
He gained from the wave,
That shall go up and linger where
He "MIGHTIEST" reign and save!

There was a splendid re—
From all who bore that day,
The power to succour—and were sent
Upon the sudden way!
At last the "Ocean Monarch" ceased
To bear her mortal name;
His Palace of the Ocean burn'd
Till Ocean quench'd its flame!

OF A STEAMER AND SLOO—. The Prince of Wales steamer, from Belfast to Liverpool, on Saturday last, ran into the sloo—, with the sloop Jane, of Liverpool. This sloop was laden with flour and sugar, and is a complete wreck, but her crew have been fortunately saved. Many [illegible] were seen sleeping on board the sloop, which was then on shore near to the Point of Ayr Lighthouse, with the loss of the second mate and two hands. The steamer must not be mistaken for the Welch boat of the same name.

ANOTHER FATAL ACCIDENT AT SEA.—We regret to report that another accident took place at sea, off Holyhead, on Sunday morning. It appears that the American ship St. Lawrence, Captain Brown, and the Cosmopolitan, Captain Maxwell, of Liverpool, came in contact. The St. Lawrence was bound from Liverpool for New York, with passengers, and the Cosmopolitan, which belongs to Messrs. Horsfall and Co., was bound for Africa. The effect of the collis on was [illegible] that the latter vessel immediately went down. One man fell overboard and was lost, but the remainder of the crew got on board the St. Lawrence, and were landed at Kingstown. The crew arrived at Liverpool yesterday morning in a Dublin steamer. The mayor of Liverpool is a passenger of the Cosmopolitan.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The House of Commons sat from twelve o'clock to two o'clock.

On the bringing up of the report of the committee of Ways and Means,

Mr HUME moved, as an amendment on the fourth resolution, empowering the Government to raise the two millions loan, that the money be raised by debentures bearing an interest of not more than five per cent. The honourable member did not press his amendment, and the report of the resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means was received.

Leave was given to bring in Bills founded thereon, which were read a first time, and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER fixed the second reading of the Loan Bill for five o'clock on Monday evening.

The report of the West India colonies loan of £500,000 resolution was received, and leave was given to bring in a Bill founded thereon, which was read a first time, and the second reading was fixed for twelve o'clock on Monday.

The report of the Diplomatic Relations with the Court of Rome Bill was received without discussion.

The Westminster Improvements Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Post-horses Licenses, &c. Bill, the Postage on Newspapers (Channel Islands, &c.) Bill, the Lock-up Houses Bill, and the Drainage Certificates Bill were read a second time.

The Slave Trade (Muscat) Bill, the Taxing Masters (Court of Chancery) Bill, and the Royal Military Asylum Bill passed through committee.

The report of the Taxing Masters' Salaries, &c. (Court of Chancery, Ireland) Bill, and of the Battersea Park, &c. Bill were received.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Sheep and Cattle Importation Prohibition Bill, the Sheep and Cattle (Contagious Disorders Prevention) Bill, and the Labouring Poor (Ireland) Bill were read a second time.

The Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers Bill went through committee.

The Poor Removal (No. 2) Bill, the Petty Bag, &c. Offices (Court of Chancery) Bill, and the Commons Inclosure (No 2) Bill were read a third time and passed.

Lord BEAUMONT complained that, on account of the hurried manner in which Bills were passed through their stages at this period of the session, the Parochial Debt and Audit Bill, to which he had an amendment to propose, was read a third time and passed without his knowledge. He therefore availed himself of his privilege to introduce a Bill to amend that Act, and gave notice that he should on Tuesday move the suspension of the standing orders, to allow it to go through its stages.

SUGAR DUTIES.

Earl GREY moved the second reading of the Sugar Duties Bill, and having stated the principles and details of the measure, read extracts from despatches from the Governors of Trinidad and Antigua, and passages from a Barbadoes newspaper, to prove that our sugar producing colonies had passed their worst, and that symptoms of improvement were now visible. The Earl then dwelt on the necessity of increased produce and diminished cost in order to compete with foreign sugars, and denounced all attempt at agitation in the colonies with the view of obtaining a protecting duty.

Lord REDESDALE compla ned of the late period of the session at which this Bill came up to their Lordships' House, which precluded fair consideration. Whatever protection was given by this Bill was so far good, but it was very little indeed. Having condemned the blundering manner in which the scales of duties had been prepared, some of which were still preserved in this Bill, the noble Lord said he would not offer any opposition to the second reading.

Earl Granville, Lord Denman, the Duke of Argyll, and Earl St. Vincent made a few observations, and the Bill was then read a second time. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

The Bill for the Battersea Park Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Post-horses Licenses, &c. Bill, and the Postage of Newspapers (Channel Islands) Bill went through Committee.

On the motion for the second reading of the West India Colonies and Mauritius Bill, the Bill for guaranteeing £1,500,000 for the purposes of immigration of labourers to the colonies—Lord G. BENTINCK suggested to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the advisability of taking a power to advance such sums to the planters, on the security of their estates, as might be deemed necessary for the cultivation of their estates.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER objected to the proposal, as he thought nothing could be more dangerous than for the Government to grant money to private individuals for the cultivation of lands.—After a few observations from Mr. Hume, Mr Barkly, Mr. Hawes, and Mr. Bernal, the Bill was read a second time.

The reports of the Slave Trade (Muscat) Bill and of the Taxing Masters (Court of Chancery, Ireland) Bill were received.

The Savings Banks Bill was read a second time

The Lock-up Houses Bill and the Drainage Certificates Bill passed through Committee.

At three the House suspended its proceedings till five o'clock.

At the appointed hour,

A new writ was ordered, on the motion of Mr. PINNEY, to be issued for Cheltenham.

To a question from Mr. HUME, Mr. LABOUCHERE stated that the Board of Trade had no power to inquire into the loss of the Ocean Monarch, as that vessel was an American sailing ship

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK announced that the recognisance for the petition against Sligo borough was [illegible]

The Spirits (Dealers In) Bill went through Committee, with some amendments, as also did the British Spirits Duties Bill.

The Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill was read a second time.

The Exchequer Bills (Two Million Loan) Bill was read a second time, Mr. HUME consenting to take no opposition to the question that it be committed. The hon. member said he did not intend to raise any discussion on the Bill, but only to record his opinion against any loan whatever.

On the motion for the second reading of the Copper and Lead Duties Bill, Lord G. BENTINCK, in the absence of Mr. Wyld, who had given notice of an amendment, moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. The noble Lord said he objected to the Bill, as unnecessary—because it was a dim ish the revenue, already sufficiently embarrassed, because it was another step taken by the Government towards direct taxation, and because it was contrary to the principles of free trade. From which revenue was obtained in a way that pressed lightest on the tax-payers.—Colonel Thompson, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. W. Brown, Mr. Muntz, Captain Vyse, Mr. Carew, Mr Turner, Mr. M'Gregor, and Mr. S. Wortley made some observations, the House divided—for the second reading, 77; against it, 21: majority, 56. The Bill was read a second time

The Distillery from Sugar Bill passed through Committee.

The report of the Slave Trade (Muscat) Bill was received.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The business was almost entirely of a routine character; and, after several Bills had been advanced a stage, amongst which was the Sugar Duties Bill, which went through Committee, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

At the meeting sitting,

The Postage on Newspapers (Channel Islands) Bill, the Royal Military Asylum Bill, and the Taxing Masters' (Court of Chancery, Ireland) Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

The reports on the Post-horses Licenses Bill and the Lock-up Houses Bill were then brought up and received.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ROME. On the motion that the Diplomatic Relations with the Court of Rome Bill be read a third time, Mr. NAPIER moved, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a third time that day three months The hon. and learned gentleman supported his amendment with a brief speech, which originated a short discussion, in which Mr. Shiel, Mr. Anstey, M., Drummond, Mr. Sergeant Murphy, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Wyndham, and Mr. J. O'Connell took part, after which the House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 20; against it, 88: majority against, 63. The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

The Consolidated Fund Bill then went through Committee, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moving the insertion of the appropriation clause, which was agreed to.

At five o'clock the sitting was suspended till half-past six. At the latter hour the House re-assembled.

The ISLAND OF TOBAGO Lord G. BENTINCK, who refused to follow the example of other honourable members, by postponing his motion until after the Derby day were disposed of, moved that the petition from the Speaker and members of the House of Assembly of the Island of Tobago, relative to captured negroes (presented 7th August), be printed with the votes; on which motion the noble Lord proceeded to make a lengthy speech, the chief object of whom was to show that Tobago was entitled to a share of the proposed loan to the West India colonies. He had Lord Grey's reasons for not including it in the loan were unsatisfactory. Discovering that his wishes had been anticipated to a certain extent by the Government having been already printed in the ordinary way by the Commissioners, and his purpose in moving that it be printed with the votes being served by his having been thus enabled to make his speech, the noble Lord concluded by observing that he should not press his motion. The motion was thereupon withdrawn.

EXCHEQUER BILLS THE REVENUE.

On the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee on the Exchequer Bills Bill,

Mr. HUME objected to the plan proposed whereby to meet the deficiency, of borrowing money in a time of peace, and would take the sense of the House on the proposition. To permit expenditure to exceed income was the act of spendthrifts, and unless the Government turned over a new leaf in this respect, they would involve the country in all the ruin of a national bankruptcy. He had urged upon the Government at the commencement of the session the propriety of either reducing our expenditure by curtailing our establishments, or of meeting the deficiency by fresh taxation; but both the House and the Government turned a deaf ear to his counsel, and that which he foresaw had now come to pass—a proposition to meet the deficiency by an increase to the permanent debt of the country. He protested against the [illegible] expenditure, against enormous establishments, and against borrowing money in time of peace, and concluded by moving as an amendment that the Bill be committed that day three months

Mr. MOFFATT seconded the amendment, concurring in the views of Mr. Hume as to the impolicy of constantly exceeding in our expenditure our national income, and perpetually borrowing to make up the ever-recurring deficit.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, after paying a ready tribute to the consistency of Mr. Hume in constantly urging upon the Government the propriety of reducing expenditure by a reduction of our establishments, and after showing that, owing to the circumstances of the times, such reduction could not safely have been made, and that the deficiency could not well have been met by increased taxation, vindicated the course now pursued by the Government, of making good the excess of expenditure by loan. He agreed with Mr Hume that the best way in which to meet a temporary difficulty was not by resorting to permanent taxation. But as the House, early in the session, had rejected the temporary expedient whereby the Government had proposed to meet a deficiency, which it had every reason to regard as of a temporary character, he thought that the next best course to take was to raise the two millions required by the issue of Exchequer bills, or the creation of new stock.

After a few words from Mr. Currie, Mr. Hayward, Mr. Wodehouse, Sir H. Willoughby, Mr. Henley, Mr. Drummond, Mr. Urquhart, and Mr. Newdegate,

Mr. COBDEN, in reply to what had fallen from the last-mentioned honourable gentleman, denied that Free Trade had thrown away taxation, and compelled the Government now to borrow. The evil against which the country had now to contend was not a falling revenue, but an increasing expenditure He strongly urged the necessity of simplifying the appellations with the income, and objected to the plan now proposed, of meeting by means of a loan a large deficiency, very needlessly created. The deficiency was much to be attributed to the groundless fear of invasion, [illegible] professional men to fly into the country for their own purposes.

Mr. J. A. SMITH could not see any other course before the Government than that proposed, seeing that, while expenditure could not be diminished, the House had declared against increased taxation. He then animadverted upon Mr Cobden's statement, that the cry of invasion had been trumped up by professional men for their own purposes

Lord G. BENTINCK regarded Mr Cobden as the last man who should charge others with inculcating selfish and wicked delusion, seeing that he himself was the parent of the greatest delusion that had ever been palmed off upon this country. Having thus brought himself to bear upon the question of Free Trade, the noble Lord proceeded to charge against it all the financial perplexities in which our Government now found itself involved. He then went on to show that the revenue had seriously suffered from the economical legislation of the past three years. This was proved by a comparison of the revenue of 1848 with that of 1845, and the Government, instead of relying upon a loan, re-imposed the customs duties upon some of the articles from which they had been struck off, it was d not now have had to resort either to the creation of new stock, or the issue of Exchequer bills.

Lord J. RUSSELL would not detain the House, seeing that the proposition to supply the deficiency by loan had been so ably vindicated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As to the reduction of expenditure, he had been done that could possibly be effected this session. The events which had taken place, both at home and abroad, since the assembling of Parliament, proved how impolitic it would have been in the Government to have reduced our military and naval establishments. It now appeared, for instance, that members of the Provisional Government in France had meditated the getting up of a war in Belgium, an event, had they succeeded in it, which would, in the then perplexed state of Europe, have probably involved the whole Continent in serious embarrassments. In such a state of things it would [illegible] most unjustifiable in the Government to have diminished our force [illegible] and the income being estimated at a sum which would not cover the expenditure, the question for the House to dec ide was, how the deficiency was to be made up. The Government had prepared a temporary increase to the direct taxation of the country—a proposition which the House had rejected. That which was now proposed was under these circumstances the only alternative which was left to them. As to what had fallen from Lord G. Bentinck, he (Lord J. Russel.) rejoiced, having something to do with the Government of the country, that for the last two years they had not had the existing scale of 1845 to deal with

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 15; against it, 66: majority against, 51.

The House then went into Committee on the Bill.

In Committee, an amendment submitted by Mr. HUME, to raise the loan on five per cent. debentures, was negatived, after which, the clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

The West Indies Colonies and Mauritius Bill then went through Committee.

On the motion that the Savings' Banks Bill be committed,

Lord G. BENTINCK moved, as an amendment, that the Bill be committed that day three months.

Mr. MOSSELL hoped that the noble Lord would not persist in opposing the Bill. It was framed [illegible] Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was intended to relieve Savings' Banks Societies from its operation, which, considering the nature of the noble Lord's objections to the Bill, would ensure his purpose. So far as Ireland was concerned, it was absolutely necessary that the Bill should pass.

After a brief discussion the House divided, and the numbers were For the amendment, 21; against it, 49: majority, [illegible]

The House then went into Committee on the Bill, and after a lengthened discussion it was ordered to be reported.

The report on the Spirits Duties Bill was received, and an amendment introduced making it necessary for any officer acting under the Bill to be commissioned by the Excise

The report on the [illegible] Spirits Warehousing Bill was received, and the Bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The House adjourned at half-past three o'clock in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Lords sat for a short time (contrary to custom, it being Wednesday), and forwarded several Bills a stage [illegible]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

REVIEW OF THE SESSION.

On the reading of the order of the day for the third reading of the Distillers from Sugar Bill,

Mr. DISRAELI entered upon a résumé of the business of the session, and in an animated and satirical speech referred to the various Government measures which had failed, terming them the "bills of mortality," the various financial explanations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose career of office he humorously parallelled to the chivalric one of Don Quixote, and concluded by a assertion on the advantages of party as a necessary element in conducting the legislation of the country

Lord JOHN RUSSELL replied at some length, showing that out of 125 Bills brought in by the Government during the session, twenty only had been abandoned, the 105 remaining having for the most part become law already, and the others being expected to pass before the prorogation. He then entered, however, into the chief business of the Government was administrative, and that they had succeeded in this was proved by the fact that they had quelled sedition at home, put down insurrection in Ireland, and in the midst of all the circumstances of Europe maintained peace. He admitted the advantage of party in legislation, and advised Lord George Bentinck, Mr. Disraeli, and their friends, to throw as do the principles of party aside, which could always be harmonized, with the principles of the constitution and the established church. In conclusion, he expressed his determination to maintain peace and uphold the institutions of the country

Mr. HUME, Sir G. Grey, and Mr. Hudson took part in the discussion, the latter barring testimony to the excellent state of the crops in the north.

Lord J. RUSSELL, in answer to a question from Mr J. TYRELL, said he had received no official notice as to the alleged seizure of a Roman Catholic priest at Templeknowe, in tearing down the Lord-Lieutenant's proclamation. The noble Lord also stated, in answer to Mr. HUDSON, that Government had no intention to alter the protective duties on silk, cottons, and other manufactures, so as to place them on a level with corn. With regard to the harvest in Ireland, though the reports were contradictory, he had reason to believe the result would be more favourable than had been expected

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in explanation of the mode in which he proposed to raise the required £1,000,000, said that he would not raise it by loan, but would add stock [illegible] time to time as he considered it advisable.

The House then went into Committee on the Copper Ores Duties Bill, in the schedule of which Mr. HENLEY moved as an amendment that the duty [illegible] foreign ores and regulus be 2l. instead of 1l. The proposition was lost on a division by a majority of 4; the clauses having been agreed to, the Bill was ordered to be reported.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met shortly after four o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT. The Royal Assent was given by Commission to 58 public and private bills, among which was the Public Re ita Bill.

Some other bills were forwarded a stage, among which was the Sugar Duties Bill, which was read a third time and passed; and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair at two o'clock.

Mr. MUNTZ gave notice that he would, next session, move a resolution to the effect that, as the Legislature had fully determined to carry out the monetary system, which would speedily reduce the value of all property to the level of '98, it was only requisite and expedient that the salaries of all officers and servants of the Government, which were raised upon the war system, should be reduced to their original amount.

The Exchequer Bills Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Consolidated Fund Bill was read a third time and passed.

COPPER AND IRISH DUTIES BILL.—The report upon this Bill was brought up and agreed to.

The POOR-LAW Auditors' Proceedings Restriction Bill went through Committee.

SAVINGS' BANK BILL. On the motion for the third reading of the Bill, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said it was the intention of the Government to limit the measure entirely to Ireland, and not to apply its provisions to Savings Banks in England and Scotland. The Bill was read a third time and passed.

POOR-LAWS. Mr. C. BULLER moved for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the more equitable distribution of the charge for the relief of the poor in certain cities and towns. He stated that during the recess he should circulate the Bill, and send it to all Boards of Guardians, and if it were approved of by other towns not included in the Bill, he should extend it to them. He did not intend to include those towns and cities which were governed by local acts, unless they wished him to do so.

The House adjourned at half past six.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Knon Septembrisers all.—BYRON

"We take," says Shakspeare, "no note of time but by its loss:" if the latter word were not used, the number of days in a month would be correctly marked from the million that the Queen at Astley's. Things inanimate, as well as animate, declare its influence. The clerk of the parish wears a white "choker;" its the same piece of lawn around the neck of your groom, and it bears the same identity. Of all our "plants," which is the most "biting?"—horsemish Of all the paths of life the turf is that which most especially "craves wary walking:" With the first day of September upon a stroll to Hyde Park Corner.

The week after next will be the anniversary of Doncaster Races: York has "cast its shadows before" It is worth while to analyse the progenitor The racing upon Knavesmire is nature, according to Johnson, is (but which specifies) was by no means in its results in keeping with the "lines" from which the calculation of its probabilities had been drawn. Now this dilemma is disposed of by the fact that the premises had been altered: the ground was not the same Some horses won't extend themselves unless they can hear the sound of their footfall; others go lost in mud. These latter are in their element at York. According to the doctrine of averages, the reverse will be the case when the Leger comes to the issue. But will that be a point worth the trouble of meeting? The other day down this green lane—the self-same proposition was put—and answered in the negative.

By a singular coincidence, at the same moment the cynosure of the political and sporting world is Justice to Ireland. What is justice to Ireland? Answer this according to your common sense, and you must come to a wholesome conclusion Th e our speculation has fallen upon saws and instances, so the vein may as well be completely be unencumbered. "When two men ride upon a horse, one of them must go behind." ... The relates to the principle of experimentation as well as the practice. When two men forgather upon the turf, he comes best off who bears in mind that "the race is not always to the swift." The grand feature of Doncaster Races in 1848 will be Justice to Ireland—a memorable occasion, inasmuch as we are assured upon authority that then and there "Justice to Ireland" will be done. This, the approbrium of the statesmen is, to be accomplished by the stableman; the "tout" shall achieve by means of that which philosophy has abandoned in despair.

The St. Leger will probably be the most eminent encounter of all days known to modern times First, it will prove that racing may be the recreation of a gentleman it will see the winner of the Oaks and the Zoet St. Leger decked with the spoils of honour go about the ordinary affairs of their lives. It will read in the fate of Springy Jack the riddle of the last Derby. It will witness the logic of Parliamentary languages applied to professional conduct on the turf And it is likely to afford a solution of a great social problem, namely, that in practical way to do "Justice to Ireland" is to hammer the sense.

MINISTERIAL WHITEBAIT DINNER. The following Members of both Houses of Parliament, connected with the Government, dined together at the Trafalgar Hotel, Greenwich, on Saturday last, in anticipation of the termination of the session:—Lord John Russell, Viscount Palmerston, Earl of Auckland, Lord Fortescue, Earl of Strafford, Viscount Morpeth, Lord Marcus Hill, Viscount Ebrington, Lord John Hay, Lord Foley, Mr. Hobhouse, Hon. Colonel Boyle, Hon. Colonel Wood, Hon. Mr. Cowper, Mr. Gibson Craig, Admiral Dundas, Mr. Hayter, Mr. Labouchere, Hon. W. Lascelles, Sir John Romilly, Mr. Shell, Sir W. Somerville, Mr. Tufnell, Mr. Wyse, Mr. Cornewall Lewis, Mr. James Wilson, and Mr. R. W. Grey.

LORD J. RUSSELL'S VISIT TO IRELAND.—Lord John Russell and Lady Russell left town on Thursday morning, on their visit to Ireland.

SANATORY REFORM. On Monday night a meeting of the inhabitants of St. Martin's parish, convened by the Sanatory Committee, was held at the Rose and Crown, Jarvey inne," for the purpose of [illegible] public health." Mr. Spiller in the chair. Mr. Cochrane, M.P., [illegible] addressed the meeting, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—That a committee be the ward of Drury-lane be formed, for the purpose of promoting the cause of sanatory reform.

GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The customary half-yearly meeting of this company was held on Tuesday, at their offices, 71, Lombard-street, Mr. White in the chair. A report and statement of the accounts for the half-year ending the 30th June last were read. The report was received with approbation. It appears, notwithstanding the badness of the times, that the earnings on the company's stations had been abundantly productive, to enable the directors to contin ue paying the usual dividend of fourteen shillings per share for the half-year, free of income-tax, and to leave a balance besides. The dividends having been declared, thanks were voted to the chairman and directors, when the meeting separated.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Monday the half-yearly general meeting of the governors of this valuable charity, instituted to provide, maintain, and educate the orphans of seamen in the merchant service, was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of electing the boys and girls into the asylum. Captain Embleton, who presided, announced the names of the successful candidates immediately after the termination of the polling The children elected, added to those previously maintained, will make the number of orphans now in the asylum amount to 97—there being 55 boys and 42 girls.

EMIGRATION THE REMEDY. Everybody is agreed upon one point that something else ought to emigrate. England is overcrowded. We have a surplus population. These propositions are settled. The questions then come to be considered who do overcrowd England and who do form the surplus population? It is evident that we ought first to get rid of those we can best spare. Which a pot boils over, it is a peculiar stratum of the liquid which goes first over the sides. Acting upon this principle, we think it is the duty of Government, in planning any scheme of national emigration, to step on the skirts of the dreary slow coaches of society as possible. What a fine colony of Bores might be established in Terra del Fuego, or on the congenial shores of Boothia Felix! And what a relief would it be to society were all the High Art men to go off in ship-loads to Algoa Bay or Sierra Leone! A convict-ship is, no doubt, a mercifully spectacle, freighted with its load of vice and misery; but only think of a High Art ship, with her cargo of crazy painting, ploughing the stormy waters of Abyssinia, or amen at the gorges of the Andes; and flock to see the "School of Reform," or the "Soldier's Daughter," in solitudes more drear than ever Byron described, and paths more unseasonably than ever Hannah Moreinvented. As for the virtuous-indignation gentry, as their time here is evidently pretty well up, we daresay Government would make over Norfolk Island for their behoof, while the writers "with a purpose" might be favoured with an opportunity of boring the savage inhabitants of Grim Tartary.—The Man in the Moon.

COMMITTAL OF CHARTISTS.—At how-street Police-office, on Thursday, the acting magistrates, Messrs. Hall and Henry, committed for trial the body of Chartists, some twenty six in number, including the redoubtable Cuffy, who were arrested a short time back, at Webber-street, Blackfriars', and in other localities of the metropolis, while assembled with arms in their hands They were committed on a charge of felony, under the "Crown and Government Security Act," passed this session.

THE CHARTISTS AND POWELL THE APPROVER On Tuesday night the Chartists of Copleygate (from whence Powell was returned as a delegate to the Convention) assembled in their night-school-houses, Bedcross-street. The meeting was addressed by several speakers, the most prominent of whom declared, amidst loud applause, that the delegate Powell, had been returned to agitate peacefully and legitimately for the People's Charter, and for no other purpose. The following resolution was carried unanimously:—"We, the Chartists of the Cripplegate Division, solemnly declare that the man Powell was elected as a delegate by us for none other than a legal purpose; but we wish we had never had attempts at anarchy and confusion, we declare our determination to use our best efforts to advance the cause of the People's Charter." About 150 men and lads were present, all of whom had a very rigorous training in [illegible]-schools.

COLLECTING THE SEWER WATER.—On Saturday a barge of peculiar construction, fitted with enormous tanks and a powerful steam engine pumping apparatus, was moored by the London Sewage Manure Company, on the north bank of the Thames, near the foot of Hungerford-bridge, and immediately contiguous to the great sewer that here discharges itself into the river. At low water the people on board commenced pumping the sewer water into the tanks, capable of holding about fifty tons, when were filled with that hitherto considered refuse before the tide flowed. This water possesses greater irrigating power than more solid manure, and is said to be worth to the agriculturist from £8 to £12 the ton.

COUNTRY NEWS.

TRIAL FOR SEDITION At the Liverpool Assizes, on Monday, Peter Murray M'Donall was put to the bar before Mr. Justice Cresswell, charged with sedition, attending an unlawful meeting, and riot. Mr. Knowles (Attorney-General for the county), Mr. Crompton, and Mr. Matthews conducted the prosecution; the prisoner was defended by Mr. Sergeant Wilkins and Mr. Pollock Mr. Knowles stated the case for the prosecution. The prisoner was charged with uttering seditious words and attending an unlawful assembly, with intent to excite a spirit of discontent and oppose the execution of the law. In the present case he would show, that the prisoner was the hired agent of others, paid to disseminate seditious opinions, and the more so not entitled even to the sympathy one might extend to one expressing conscientious but mistaken opinions. The prisoner had been a member of what was called the National Convention. He left London before that body broke up, and visited a number of towns in the kingdom, pursuant to previous arrangement. He attended on the 10th of July a meeting in the town of Ashton, convened by public advertisement. This advertisement was headed with a motto

> "Hereditary bondsmen! know ye not > Who would be free, himself must strike" and closing—

> "Freedom's battle
> Beneath a tyrant's sword bleeding are to see,
> Too [illegible] ers ever won."

They met in what is called the Charlestown Meeting-house. A certain secrecy was manifested, but he should be able to give the substance of the proceedings there. It would appear that many of them were armed and carried pikes; that they were addressed by Dr. M'Donall, and the subject of his address was "Feeling to take arms. They broke up about [illegible] o'clock, and went to the Old Fellows' Arms, where M'Donall addressed them. The Attorney-General proceeded to read the address of the prisoner as subsequently proved, commenting on it as he proceeded. In this address they were advised to get arms, practise drilling, both with and without arms, in the same manner as their enemies. Who were the enemies he referred to? Could there be any doubt of the meaning of those words? or of his speaking of the Government as the enemy, to whom they were to turn? But the prisoner then went on to state that which he as an educated man must have known to be untrue. He stated that the soldiers were with them; that all the military at Weedon which had revolted in one night; that there was a committee of the men sitting at the Horse Guards for the redress of their grievances, and that in a few days a pamphlet would be published setting forth their determination. Could there be any doubt of the meaning and object of such an address? or that it was intended by violence and intimidation to oppose the administration of the law? The charge having been supported by voluminous evidence, Mr. Wilkins addressed the Jury for the defence, and Mr. Knowles having replied, and the learned Judge summed up, the Jury retired for a few minutes, and returned into Court with a verdict of guilty on all the counts of the indictment except those charging conspiracy, on which a nolle prosequi had been entered by the Attorney-General.—Sentence, Imprisonment for two years.

JUBILEE AT DAWLISH.—Yesterday week a grand fete was given at Dawlish, to commemorate the 81st anniversary of the birthday of Charles Hoare, Esq., of Luscombe Castle, which was celebrated by the tenantry presented on the occasion The grounds at Luscombe were the scene of various pastimes; and a large party of gentlemen dined together to celebrate the event; Captain Moresby, R.N., in the chair. The health of Mr. and Mrs. Hoare was drunk with great enthusiasm; and Dawlish was throughout the day a scene of fine old English festivity, highly creditable to the townspeople, who adopted this method of testifying their respect for their excellent benefactor, Mr. Hoare.

THE SALE AT STOWE.

WE resume our Illustrations of the Sale at Stowe, and commence our description with a brief notice of the Engravings. Amongst our Illustrations this week, the Group of Tankards and a Nautilus Shell occupy prominent places [illegible] group of tankards represents three beautiful specimens of ivory tankards, mounted in silver gilded. The central one is of very noble proportions, being seventeen inches high, and the bas relief represents the triumph of Neptune, exquisitely executed in very high relief, the figures being most admirably drawn in the flowing and vigorous style of Rubens; and we should suppose it, from this similarity of style, to be [illegible] of the early part of the seventeenth [illegible] The [illegible] hole is crowned by a figure of a boy holding a tazza. The boy is of modern, but very inferior workmanship. The base of the tankard is finely executed; and the handle is of fine character, and embellished with terminal figures. The tankard to the left is of earlier character than the one just described; the sculpture on it, representing the flight into Egypt, being very [illegible] workmanship, and the mountings are of very elaborate design, the base having a band of foreshort pattern, and another band containing winged cherubs holding wreaths, in gold relief, upon them, whilst the upper part is richly ornamented. The lid has a corset of cherubs upon it; and surmounting a pyramidal top is a corset of a swan with wings erect. The handle to the tankard is of eccentric and undefined form, containing a winged female, curled up somewhat awry and thin and meagre character. We imagine the ivory carving to be of somewhat earlier date than the mountings. The tankard to the right of the principal one is of fair design and character in the silver-gilt mountings and the ivory sculpture. The bas-relief represents the Rape of the Sabines

The pearl nautilus shell (lot 370) was once at Fonthill Abbey, and is a most [illegible] it: the silver-gilt mountings are of modern workmanship in the [illegible], and the character of the work is most skilfully imitated, the rich colours of emeralds and rubies adding their lustre to the whole. The crowning group of Neptune spearing a dolphin is modelled with the utmost delicacy of ivory, supposed to be the work of Flamingo, representing children playing with a goat. This sculpture is most beautifully executed, and is set in silver gilt. The nautilus and stand were purchased by Messrs. Garrard of sixty-seven pounds

Our other Illustrations are an ink-stand, said to have belonged to Pope Sixtus the Fifth, an agate candlestick, and a cinque cento lamp. The inkstand is a very elegant piece of workmanship, and contains four ink-pots of beautiful form, made of Italian spar, for ink, pounce, and sand, resting on a base, of silver gilded, [illegible] by four lions holding shields, also of silver gilded. In the centre of the [illegible] ment, in which pencil is placed a bell of Italian spar, bearing [illegible] a beautiful cup of crystal, with a cover surmounted by a figure of [illegible] bearing a cornucopia. The crystal ornament, in a modern setting, and [illegible] at [illegible] formal like a shell, is of peculiarly fine form, and there are characteristic adornments upon it, in silver gilded; the shaft is partly of crystal and partly of silver; and the foot is set with jacinths and lapis lazuli. This beautiful crystal cup realised £285.

The agate taper candlestick represents one of a pair, of modern workmanship in Italian taste. They were from the manufactory of Messrs. Garrard, and do honour to the firm on account of their establishment. The [illegible] of the [illegible] is beautifully ornamented with silver gilded, and medals are introduced at the angles of the corners with great skill, and in beauty of execution have scarcely been surpassed. The setting is in the different forms of agate are also of silver gilded and delicately wrought, as is also the top. These candlesticks were sold for a large sum (forty-six guineas and a half) to Sir Anthony Rothschild

The [illegible] ebony cabinet, which is said to be an admirable specimen of the taste of the period, and quite in imitation of classic art, though oddly crowned with a figure of Judith with the head of Holofernes. The pieces for the [illegible] of the cabinet are the subjects of Ajax and Ulysses, and Achilles and Penelope shows) is not cylindrical in form, but oblong, and the aperture for the introduction of the oil is at the top, under the small cover on which the figure of Ju ith stands.

Since our last notice there have been but two days' sale of costly furniture at Stowe, on Thursday and Friday last: Saturday and Monday being days of rest, and [illegible] Sunday last, and to-day (Monday) the sale is again in progress. We now proceed to mention some of the more prominent objects which were disposed of on the two days noticed above, as well as some of the more important lots which remain to be noticed hereafter.

The superb gilded furniture made for the State Dressing-room and Bedchamber, on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Stowe, in 1845, was sold on Wednesday and Thursday last, and realised very high prices; though others were sold for truly unequal sums. Amongst the latter was the stately bed, which, although of large size, richly gilded, and fitted with magnificent hangings, &c. for a royal personage, was sold for the paltry sum of 100 guineas by the purchaser. This bedstead, was of ancient manufacture, though gilded and decorated for the royal visit, and, in our opinion, is not, in point of design, a fine specimen of decorative furniture.

The very beautiful Persian carpet, of shawl pattern, which was purchased by the Duke of Buckingham for a large sum (we have been informed, four hundred pounds), sold for a very inadequate amount, especially when its large size (eight and a half by five and a quarter yards) is taken into consideration. Fifty-five guineas was the bid for realised.

The splendid pedestal-cabinets, bedsteps covered with crimson velvet, chevalglass, circular tables with marble slabs, screen, dressing glass, and other articles of furniture, all of the [illegible] date, painted white and gilded, realised very good sums. We should mention, as of the same character, a set of cabinet furniture of the peculiar character known as cinque cento, or renaissance; and some of the pieces were of truly elegant design, but not especially so. One of the most magnificent Huygens clocks we ever saw, made by Stollenwerk, was sold to Mr Paxton for only fifty one guineas, although it is said to have cost the Duke of Buckingham no less than one thousand. The cases were of the most exquisite marqueterie, and was also enriched with figures of boys, trophies and masks, in or-molu. The [illegible] of this piece of furniture was thoroughly good, and the [illegible] of the several decorations rendered the whole a most beautiful and remarkable With some exceptions, the carved and gilded Venetian furniture, at least the pier tables, were, in our estimation, the least tasteful of the furniture in the state rooms; for though the general character was rich and effective, the [illegible] were coarse in style and workmanship, and decidedly objectionable. The handsomest of all the cabinets of any kind on view at Stowe was one in the state bedroom, a superb piece of old German work. In form it resembled a table of the graceful outline of the period of Louis the fourteenth; in this supported a cabinet, in which the side portions projected from the centre in graceful curves. These wings contained drawers, inlaid with silver, and landscapes in the most exquisite taste, and bordered with or-mouli. T[illegible] drawers opened by means of springs in the central division of the cabinet, which, on being pressed, force the drawers forward, and the same principle is applied to the drawers in the lower or table portion. The marqueterie is composed of different-coloured woods and pearl. The panel to the door of the central portion is filled with a bas relief, in silver gilt, of Bacchus and Ariadne, of the most exquisite workmanship; and on opening the door several other small drawers are disclosed. Two small figures of Cupid, each made of a lusus naturæ of pearl, crown the pillars of the central portion: but, from their colour, were rather disagreeable than ornamental. This superb piece of furniture was purchased by Mr. Russell (for Baron Rothschild) for the sum of 235 guineas.

There was a companion table, of somewhat similar form to the former, but not so richly varied in outline nor so elaborately inlaid, which Mr. Redfern, of Warwick, purchased for 175 guineas. The bas relief on the door of this cabinet contained flowers by Boulanger, and subjects after Berghem.

CINQUE-CENTO LAMP.

The marqueterie table, &c., at Stowe were chiefly of admirable character, and especially some of the earlier lots, such as lot 256, which was purchased by Mr. Redfern for £58, in which the surface of the table was beautifully inlaid in marqueterie, and the legs with white metal.

The pieces of Sèvres and Dresden china which adorned the state dressing-room and state bedchamber were chiefly of very beautiful character. Lot 1059, an ewer and basin, is a truly exquisite specimen of Sèvres, its form being most graceful, its colour and decoration most harmonious. The ground colour of the ewer and basin is jade green; the lip of the former being richly gilded, in beautiful pattern, and wreaths and other graceful enrichments, studded with imitations of precious stones, and subjects, painted from the antique, cover the surface of both in the most elegant style it is possible to imagine. Lord Ward purchased this lot for seventy-seven guineas. An ewer and cover and basin, of green and gold, painted with bouquets of flowers, sold for fifty guineas. A large salver, turquoise, with a subject painted on it after Watteau, and ornamented with bouquets, mounted in or-molu, with handles fashioned like dragons, realised thirty-three guineas.

A flower-stand, of very elegant form in two divisions, and having a rural landscape painted in the central panel, and enriched with flowers, also painted, was purchased by Mr. Webb, for £40 10s.; and a large bowl, having fruits and flowers, and a subject after Watteau painted within it, and Cupids on the outside, on a turquoise ground, was also purchased by Mr. Webb, for forty-six guineas.

A set of four Dresden salts, on tripod stands, realised £4 10s., and a pair of leaf-shaped dishes, of Dresden ware, sold for £3 10s.

There were also some pieces of old Chelsea china, of which four coffee-cups, of blue and gold, having dancing figures on them, fetched six guineas.

A noble bowl and cover, of old Japan, were purchased by Mr. Batterson for sixteen guineas.

ST. NICHOLAS CHURCH, GREAT YARMOUTH.

RESTORATION OF SAINT NICHOLAS CHURCH, GREAT YARMOUTH.

On Tuesday the 24th ult., this ancient edifice—one of the largest parish churches in England—which had been extensively altered and restored, was opened for Divine service.

The Church of Saint Nicholas, it may be interesting to premise, was founded in the latter part of the eleventh or early in the twelfth century, by Herbert de Lozinga, the first Bishop of Norwich, who, for several simonical practices, was enjoined to build a number of churches and monasteries. St. Nicholas has, however, undergone so much alteration at various periods, that it now presents of which rises an embattled tower, having a spire in the manner of our ancient cathedrals, to which it bears a stron[g resemblance].

The extensive alterations and re[storations] which this [church] was lately subjected, consisted in the removal of the [unsightly] galleries, and other deformities by which this [edifice] was incumbered, have been entirely removed, and the [whole] open and airy, and other pews, have given place to sittings of uniform [size] congregation. The two columns which had been removed from the nave, and by which the fabric was much weakened, have been rebuilt; and the four early English arches destroyed by such removal have been restored. The great west door, which had been blocked up, has been re-opened. The two side areas west of the chancel has been thrown open; the roofs of the nave, south aisle, and north and south transepts, have been re-decorated, and their ancient shields and curious bosses re-painted and emblazoned. The beautiful arches under the tower have been thrown open and restored, their piers partially rebuilt, and the ceiling of the intersection elevated about twenty feet. When the brickwork is removed from the tower arch leading into the chancel, an unblemished view will be obtained from one end of the Church to the other. The north transept (which was in a very ruinous state) has been entirely rebuilt in a most substantial manner, and a new early-decorated window inser ed. The new stiffings are entirely of oak, many of them with handsomely carved finials; and the fronts of the official seats are richly panelled.

The amount expended upon the fabric itself, and in the substantial repairs of the church, exceeds £14000, of which £5000 only (instead of £7250, as the committee had originally been led to expect) has been received of the churchwardens.

The amount obtained by voluntary contributions reached £3002 6s. 3d., which, however, after appropriating £500 for the establishment of National Schools, is insufficient to discharge the present liabilities by the sum of £560.

THE RE-OPENING

was attended by a very large and highly respectable congregation; and the Church was filled immediately after the opening of the doors, the number present being between 4000 and 5000.

At about half past ten the Lord Bishops of Norwich and Oxford entered the sacred edifice, attended by a numerous body of clergymen in their robes, the restoration committee, churchwardens, the mayor of the borough, and the body corporate.

The noble organ at this moment pealed forth its sweet and powerful notes, and the Church, crowded as it was by the élite of the town and neighbourhood, presented a truly interesting appearance, which was considerably enlivened by the pleasing effect produced by the bright sun streaming through the new stained windows.

The Morning Service was chanted by the Rev. Precentor Symonds, and full choral services were beautifully rendered by the Norwich Cathedral choir. The following is the programme: Voluntary Mr. Warne. The "Venite" Chant by Mr Buck. The First Psalm Chant by Mr. Buck. The Second Psalm, chanted by the Rev. the Precentor. The Psalms were accompanied by Mr. White. The "Te Deum," King, in C, and "Jubilate," King, in C, were accompanied by Mr. Warne. Sanctus—Nine Responses by Mr. Slatter, accompanied by Mr. Warne. Anthem before the Sermon, from the "Messiah," accompanied by Mr. White—"For unto us a child is born." Anthem after the Sermon—Dr. Clarke, accompanied by Mr. Warne—"In Jewry is God known." Voluntary, by Mr. Warne.

The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of the diocese, from Matt xvi. 16, 18: "And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Immediately on the close of the morning service, a cold collation was served in the Town Hall; the Rev. Henry Mackenzie, late Minister of St. Nicholas Church, ably filling the chair.

After the usual loyal toasts (in the proposal of which the chairman stated that a very handsome donation had been presented to the Restoration Funds by her Majesty the Queen Dowager), "the Church," "the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich," "the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Oxford," "the Rev. Mr. Hill, the new Incumbent of the Parish," "the Clergy," "the Mayor and Corporation," and other toasts, were heartily drunk, and responded to in very interesting addresses.

The health of several illustrious strangers was then given, in proposing which, the chairman complimented M. Guizot on the fame he had won as a man of letters and as an historian.

M. Guizot rose to reply, and was received with a hearty greeting of applause After expressing his warmest thanks for the pleasing compliment which had just been paid to him by the chairman, and their excellent prelate, he alluded to the fact, that he had now visited England on two different occasions, both of wh ch were of deep interest to himself and to his country. He first came to our shores as an exile; and he could not but feel grateful inside to express his heartfelt gratitude at the cordial and hospitable reception with which he had been on each occasion received. His attendance on that day was contrary to his usual custom, yesterday evening having induced him to avoid public meetings as seldom as possible. The circumstances was, however, one of no ordinary interest, and he had felt that he could not but yield to the pressing invitations he had received; and he never gladly declined to attend a meeting where he saw around him. After a brief comparison of the present state of his own country with that of the time when he visited England before, M. Guizot, at some length, congratulated the assembly on the progress of the arts and sciences and happiness which they now enjoyed, and on the industry which was so characteristic of that nation. He concluded by earnestly recommending all to maintain their faith, and to support with their influence the Established Church.

The chairman proposed the health of Baron Alderson, as treasurer of the Restoration Funds, which was acknowledged by the Baron in a lengthened address.

THE EVENING SERVICE.

Shortly after three o'clock the Church was again crowded to excess. The programme of the service was as follows:—Voluntary—Mr. Warne. Psalms, accompanied by Mr. Warne; the chants by Messrs. Battchill and Parnell, from Handel; Magnificat, King, in C: Nunc dimittes, King, in C, accompanied by Mr. Warne; anthem before the sermon, accompanied by Mr. Warne—"Behold, all—" He was cut off, &c.; anthem after the sermon, accompanied by Mr. White "I was glad" —Purcell.

The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Oxford founded his sermon on the 9th verse of the 9th chapter of the Book of Ezra: "For we were bondmen; yet our God hath not forsaken our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the Kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem."

Collections were made after each service on behalf of the Restoration Funds, and the clear profit will leave about £450 towards the discharge of a debt of £560.

IRELAND.

There is no news of interest this week from Ireland. His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has awarded £20 to constable Williams, of Mullinahone, and £5 to each of his men, for the success they so nobly displayed in the attempt on the part of Mr. W. Smith O'Brien to tamper with their allegiance. He has also promoted Williams to the rank of supernumerary head constable of the second class, with two chevrons of constables, and the senior sub-constable to the rank of constable, with a chevron, and to each of the other men a chevron. Constable Madden, who arrested Messrs. Meagher, O'Donoghue, and Leyne, has been promoted a supernumerary head constable of the second class, with a pecuniary reward of £100; and Sub Constables John Carrol, John Enright, Michael Culinan, and Thomas Coyle, who assisted at the arrests, £20 each.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Wind indecision is fast becoming a proverb. Last week furnished a new instance, which may yet be succeeded by another before the Parliamentary session closes. On Wednesday se'nnight, Lord John Russell stated, that the vote to provide for the deficit in the Budget must be taken until next session, and, upon this understanding, the English Funds advanced, with every prospect of further improvement. On the Friday follo-ing, however, a new light illuminated the Ministry, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer suddenly announced his intention of immediately providing for the deficit of two millions, either by the issue of Exchequer Bills, or a new creation of Stock. This unexpected announcement, while it removed one uncertainty as far as the period for taking the loan was concerned, substituted another in relation to the description of security in which it would be constructed. The consequence was a decline in Consols and Exchequer Bills, which is already beginning to be felt; the Market having been dull upon a decline of three-quarters per cent. upon the prices of last week. Consols on Monday opened at 85¾ 86, and some monetary purchases improved quotations to 86, which was the closing quotation. On Tuesday this price was barely maintained; and on Wednesday a decline to 85¾ was registered. Prices, however, improved during the early part of Thursday, but afterwards declined. This will no doubt be followed by the state of the market for a long period. Exchequer Bills have declined to 24 .7, and the remainder of the funds are heavy, prices closing at the following rates: Bank Stock, 197; Reduced Annuities, 85¾; Consols, 86 ¾ ; New 3½ per Cent. Annuities, 85¼; Ditto, New Annuities, 8 5-16 ; India Bonds, under £1000, 19 pm., Consols for Account, 85¼; Exchequer Bills, £1000, March, 27 pm., Ditto, £1000, June, 25 pm.; Ditto, £500, March, 27 pm.; Ditto, Small, 27 pm.

In the Foreign Market the only improvement of any consequence has been in Portuguese, which have improved about two per cent. Dutch have also displayed an upward tendency. Business has, however, been on the most limited scale, the following quotations being little better than nominal:—Mexican, Five per Cents., Account, 16¼; Portuguese Four per Cents., Account, 23; Russian Bonds, 103¾; Spanish, Five per Cent, Account, 12¾; Ditto, Passive, 3¼; Ditto, Three per Cent., Account, 23¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 45.

Shares continue dogged, and, consequently, business quite impossible. The closing of the capit-l accounts is the only mode by which this description of security will recover public confidence; and shareholders will do well to zealously attend the several meetings called, and attempt to attain this important result. Prices are, for Brit.s. and Exeter, 59½, Caledonian, New £10, 9¾; East Anglian, £18, 2; and H. & ; Eastern Counties, 13¾ xi; Ditto, 8 per cent., 60; Ditto, New, 2½; East Lancashire, New, £10, 4¼; Great Western, £15, 15¾ xd; Lancashire and Yorkshire, New, Gua. 6 per cent., 2½; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 28¾ xd; London and North-Western, 115½; Ditto, New, 7¾; London and South-Western, 39¼; Ditto, Thirds, 14 dis; Midland, 59; Ditto, £50 Shares, 12; North British, 20; North Staffordshire, 8½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 26 xd; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 2½; Shrewsbury and Chester, 8 per Cent. Pref., 4½; Portuguese Four per Cent., Account, 23; Russian Bonds, 103¾; Spanis., Five per Cent, Guaranteed, 27½; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 1½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, Original New, 27½; Ditto, ditto, Extension, No. 2, 10½; York and North Midland, East and West Riding Extension, 26 xd; Northern of France, 8; Orleans and Bordeaux, 14; Paris and Lyons, 44.

SATURDAY MORNING. Consols opened yesterday at 86¼; but on the publication of news from Paris, asserting the advance of the French troops to the assistance of the Ital ans, prices yielded, and 85¾ became the current quotation for money and time. Shares remained dull, and in the Foreign House there was no change of importance.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrivals of English wheat, considering as yet so by small quantities, are more extensive than those of the previous week, but of very middling quality To-day the stands were well filled with samples of both red and white wheat, which moved off in moderate request at Monday's prices. In oats, other kinds scarcely any business was transacted, as in some instances, a slight decline in the quotations may be noted. Barley and malt remain in a very quiet state, without any alteration worthy of notice. A considerable quantity of foreign wheat has come in, the demand for which has been very heavy, at full previous money. Beans, peas, and tares, as well as floating cargoes, were neglected. Grinding and distilling barley was very dull, and prices were barely supported. Fine malting qualities were in request, and fully maintained. In other sorts quite the reverse has been the case, and many must have been accepted. All other articles of grain are without alteration in value. The arrivals from Ireland are large.

ARRIVALS.—English wheat, 5450 barley, ——; oats, 40 Irish oats, ——; Foreign wheat, 14,490; barley, 6200; oats, 2100; flour, 1100 sacks; Irish oats, 1200, 2720 qrs.

RECENT ASCENT OF THE PETER BOTTE MOUNTAIN, IN THE MAURITIUS.—(SEE PAGE 142.)

VAUXHALL.

The mercury has gone up in the barometer, and the price of admission has fallen to a shilling; and, consequently, Vauxhall has been crowded this week, and all its old associations have been revived. We need not here enter into a history of Vauxhall. Our business is with the Vauxhall of the present day, which we fear is coming towards the close of the season—perhaps of the property altogether. Yet we are comforted in the recollection that no public favourite ever had so many "positively last appearances" as Vauxhall. For years we have been informed, at the conclusion of each season, that Vauxhall would that week close for ever; and for years, at the commencement of the succeeding one, we have been assured that it would re-open "on a scale of magnificence hitherto unattempted." Our own opinion is that it will never be done away with.

But many years hence, if we all live, we shall find the Jardins Mabille exactly the same as it is now, and with very nearly the same unvaried style of entertainments. We should, however, in justice state that this year there has been no lack of enterprise and liberality on the part of the lessees to cater for the public, and this throughout a continuance of unprecedented depressing weather. The inimitable Jubs, and equally original Fell—horsemanship with the best available orchestra—fireworks, lamps, fountains, and fancy fairs, have all been in full swing; and now the wonderful performances of Van Amburgh, with his trained animals, have been added to the programme of amusements. With the name of this extraordinary man is the public [illegible] acquainted. Some [illegible] blue-bottles from the "Lion King" [illegible] to the foremost keeper, who makes the leopards jump through the hoops in the wild beast show, can come near Mr. Van Amburgh. There is no concealment of "bottling" the animals in his exhibition. He rolls about amongst and upon the fierce creatures of the desert and the jungle, as a child would do with a large family dog on the hearth-rug; and they seem in turn to regard him with the same degree of affection. In fact, so completely at ease do they all appear together, that one cannot help thinking the ferocious of the lion or tiger is the exception rather than the rule of their nature; and that Mr. Van Amburgh is doing no more than any lady else might. We expect, however, that a struggle would experience a different reception.

The animals are in splendid condition. They are shown on the stage of the rotunda theatre, the public being admitted to the ring as soon as the horsemanship is finished; and during the past week they have attracted thousands.

Since we wrote the above we hear that several important alterations are about to be made on the property, the chief one being the enclosure of the different walks by dioramic views, so as to form a winter resort a "Jardin d'Hiver" on the plan of the fairy palaces in the Champs Elysées, with a Hippodrome attached, containing a circus eighty-four feet in diameter—twice the size of the one lately at Drury-Lane.

BERZELIUS.

BERZELIUS, the greatest chemist of this, or of any other age, is dead. In the sixty-ninth year of his age, after fifty years of anxious attention to the chemics, phenomena of nature, all that was perishable of Berzelius has returned to the great laboratory, in which organic matter passes through those wonderful transmutations by which it is again and again fitted to perform its destinies.

Born at Väfversunda, in Ostgothland, on the 29th of August, 1779, he would have numbered out his sixty-nine years had he lived until this day, when we express our regret for so great a loss to the world of science.

At the age of eighteen Berzelius became the pupil of Afzelius, a relative of the great Bergmann, to whom the world is indebted for the discovery of that extraordinary genius Charles William Scheele; and the three names thus closely associated, of Bergmann, Scheele, and Berzelius, will for ever place the science of Sweden in a most prominent position in the history of the progress of the European mind.

Having passed his examination, and served for some years as an assistant, he at length graduated at Upsal, in 1804. He then became chemical assistant to Spaarman, the lecturer on Natural Philosophy at Stockholm; and upon his master's death, in 1806, he was appointed to fill his chair. Berzelius was the first continental chemist who introduced experiments into his lectures, and thus, as may be supposed, his school became exceedingly popular.

BERZELIUS.

The contributions made by Berzelius to our knowledge have been numerous. He was the discoverer of that curious element selenium and of the metal cerium. He demonstrated the acid character of silica, and removed all doubt about the nature of silicates, which led to an entirely new system of mineralogy. His investigations into the atomic constitution of bodies, by which he was enabled to extend the views of Dalton and Davy, were most extensive and complete. Some of his latest researches have been on what he has called the allotropic condition of bodies, that is, the existence of the same atoms in different physical states, as in the diamond, graphite, and charcoal; and his papers on this intricate subject are of the utmost value.

The works of Berzelius were extensive in nearly every department of experimental science; and his "Manual of Chemistry," which has been translated into almost every European language except the English, is a model which stands quite unequalled by any treatise. Its accurate and full information, given in the clearest manner, renders it one of the best text-books which can be employed by the professed and amateur chemist.

Berzelius was connected by honorary diplomas with eighty-eight of the scientific societies of Europe, and his sovereign, feeling the chemist was an honour to his native land, conferred upon him the distinctions of nobility. On his wedding-day, Charles John, King of Sweden, wrote to Berzelius intimating him that he had conferred the title of Baron upon him, to mark his sense of the services he had rendered to his country.

In 1822 Berzelius commenced the publication of his "Lehrbuch," an annual report on the progress of the chemical and allied physical sciences, which he has continued to the present time.

In his habits Berzelius was industrious and frugal. Labour was the pleasure of his life; and passing from his laboratory to his study, leaving but little time for the loyalties of the world, he made himself an honour to his country, and was beloved by all in the city of Stockholm. Sometimes rather severe in his criticism of others, he was willing to submit his own views to rigid scrutiny; and few men ever lived whose life and works exhibit so entire a devotion to truth for its own value.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

RARELY have Legislators gained so little popularity as in the "laborious and protracted Session" which has just been brought to a close. It does not leave a good character behind it. There are none to say a word in its favour. Like Wordsworth's Maiden of the river Dove, it is one whom

> There are none to praise,
> And very few to love.

It will chiefly be memorable for its unusual duration; its large promises and mean performances; its prolixity of speed; its slowness to pass measures of a reformatory tendency, and its alacrity to pass measures of coercion. Mr. Disraeli, who has snatched the mantle formerly so gracefully worn by Lord Lyndhurst, and become the regular Parliamentary Mentor of her Majesty's Opposition, reviewed last week the doings of the Session, and laid all the faults with which the public has hitherto been content to load the back of the House upon the backs of her Majesty's Ministers. His speech contained an able—we will not say a strictly impartial or very benevolent—abstract of the doings of Parliament, and of the Administration from the first assembling of the House in November of last year, to its ultimate prorogation in the first week of September. Mr. Disraeli drew the conclusions from the facts which he adduced, that Ministers, and not the House, were to blame for all the prolixity and waste of time that had occurred; that if there had been delays, it was not the forms of the House which were responsible, but the Ministerial blunders in the Sugar Bill, the four budgets of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the crude measures launched into the House without due foresight or preparation, and the general vacillation and incompetency of the Government. Lord John Russell's reply, though not equal, as an oratorical effort, to the brilliant and ill-natured attack of this Conservative sharpshooter, was by no means unsuccessful. His Lordship passed over, without other comment than a slight deprecation, the increasing long-windedness of our representatives, and maintained that with sedition in England, incipient rebellion in Ireland, and convulsion in Europe, the work of administration was the chief business to which the Government was bound to direct its attention; and that neither the Government nor the House was to blame for the little progress that had been made with measures of a purely legislative character, seeing that sedition in England had been met with a vigorous arm; that rebellion in Ireland had been suppressed; that revolutions on the Continent had not shaken the institutions of Great Britain; and that, however convulsed the state of Europe might have been, peace had hitherto been preserved in England. The country will no doubt be prepared to forgive to some extent both the House and the Government for the sins of omission for which the Session is notorious, in consideration of the great advantages which have been and are to be derived from the vigorous maintenance of public order, for which Lord John Russell took credit to himself, and which undoubtedly has signalised the year 1848. But, nevertheless, it cannot shut its eyes against the evils resulting from the interminable speechifying in which men of all parties indulge, and from the want of care and discrimination and wisdom displayed by successive Governments, in introducing and discussing, in March, April, May, or June, measures which are certain to be abandoned as soon as August begins to unfold visions of grouse and red deer before the expectant eyes of our jaded and home-sick legislators, weary of the atmosphere of St. Stephen's, and panting for the fresh air of the forest or the moorland. The fact is, that there is far too much law-making in this country. The abandonment of so many bills every Session is not in itself an evil. The evil lies in their introduction, and in the waste of time occasioned by their discussion, stage after stage, until that final period when August hurries them, not prematurely, but satisfactorily, into the gloomy limbo of the recess. All may regret that large measures, such as the Navigation Laws and the Health of Towns Bill, have either made no progress at all, or been mutilated and perverted from their original intent: but few will regret, with Mr. Disraeli, the abandonment of the forty-seven bills whose fate he deplores; or rejoice with Lord John Russell, that although forty-seven have been abandoned by their projectors, the Government has carried no less than one hundred and five bills out of one hundred and twenty-five which it introduced at the commencement of the Session.

It seems to us that both Mr. Disraeli in his attack upon, and Lord John Russell in his defence of, the Government, for the omissions and commissions of the legislative year, left out of view the most important of all the considerations connected with the business of the Session—the proposed increase of the Income Tax—its abandonment—and the consequent addition of two millions to the permanent debt of the country. As every man ought to pay his own debts, so ought every generation to provide for the means of its own Government, and for the necessities of its own position. It is not just to our posterity, near or remote, to add to the already large public burdens of this country, and to inflict upon them an additional penalty for having been born an age or more after ourselves. The addition that has been made to our debt during the present year, and the unsatisfactory condition in which the finances of the nation must be considered to be as long as expenditure so greatly exceeds income as it does at present, are both, we think, very fairly chargeable upon the present Ministry. When, on the 18th of February last, the Government, through the medium of its Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced its intention to increase the Income Tax to 5 per cent., the announcement was made with a correct appreciation of the necessities of the State, and of the most available and prudent means of providing for them. The great outcry in the country against the present Income Tax that arose at that time, was not directed again st it because it was a direct tax, or because it was a tax upon income and property; but because it was unfairly and oppressively levied upon temporary income as distinguished from permanent property. On the contrary, it was generally conceded that such a tax was in itself just whilst it was universally conceded that it was necessary. The opposition to the proposal to increase it from three per cent. to five was directed against it by the possessors of temporary incomes dependent upon life, health, and ability, entirely upon the ground of its oppressiveness to them. The hardship was palpable to all the struggling classes of the community, that the man with £10,000 snugly and safely invested in Government securities should pay in no greater proportion than the poor professional man deriving his precarious £300 per annum from the exercise of his skill and industry. But the Ministers insisted upon retaining this objectionable feature of the tax. They would not modify it in the slightest degree. When agitation arose, when the feelings of the country were excited, and when the overthrow of the French monarchy warned all statesmen of the danger of resisting the just demands of a whole people, the Ministry, rather than modify this system of injustice, consented to forego altogether the proposed addition to the tax, and trust to the chapter of accidents, or to a loan, to meet the deficiency which they had calculated would arise in the national income. This is the great fault of the Ministry and the Session. This is the sin which the Government and the House of Commons have committed against the country; and for this they will yet be held responsible. A five per cent. Property Tax and a three per cent. Income Tax might have been carried through Parliament. Agitation would have subsided in the face of such a concession to a reasonable demand; and the country would have been spared the disgrace of living upon borrowed money, at a time when it was more than ever essential that it should incur no additional liabilities, or increase by an iota the entanglement and perplexity of the national finances. Before this question all others sink into insignificance. It is a question that must be met. It is a problem that must be solved, however difficult the task. The Ministry that neglects it, dallies with it, or misunderstands it, proclaims its own unfitness, and must yield office to wiser men. The next session of Parliament will be invested with an importance that is to be hoped that the men in power at that time will be somewhat more convinced of its paramount urgency, than the members of the Russel Administration.

MINISTERIAL MOVEMENTS.

Lord John Russell, after visiting her Majesty at Balmoral Castle, Aberdeenshire, will, with Lady Russell, visit his noble relatives the Earl and Countess of Minto, at Minto Castle, Roxburghshire, subsequently joining the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, at Woburn Abbey.

The Marquis of Lansdowne left town during the week, for Bowood, Wiltshire, where the Marchioness, the Earl and Countess of Shelburne, and a select circle have been assembled for some days.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston will pass the greater part of the recess at Broadlands, Hants. It is understood that the noble Viscount will come to town occasionally during the absence of the Premier.

Lord Sudbury, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, will act at the Foreign office during the noble Viscount's absence.

Sir George Grey, Home secretary, will remain in Scotland during the whole of the Royal progress. Mr. Lewis, M.P., Under-Secretary to the Home Department, will remain in town during Sir George's absence.

Earl and Countess Grey left town on Wednesday for Datchett-park, Windsor, for a few days, and thence proceeded to Howick-house, Northumberland, for the recess.

The Earl of Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty, with the other Lords present, during the recess, making official inspections of the principal naval service throughout the kingdom, and intend, amongst other places, to proceed to Holyhead.

The Earl of Minto will receive a family circle at Minto Castle, Roxburghshire.

The Marquis of Clanricarde will join the Marchioness and family in a few days at Southgate, Kent.

The Earl and Countess of Clarendon are expected to visit their youthful family at the Grove, near Watford, early next month.

Viscount Morpeth, after making some official visits, will join his venerable parents, the Earl and Countess of Carlisle, at Castle Howard, Yorkshire.

Sir John Cam Hobhouse, Bart., and Miss Hob ouse, left town during the week for the right honorable baronet's seat in Wiltshire.

The Marquis of Anglesey, Master-General of the Ordnance, will receive a circle during the recess at Beaudesert, Staffordshire.

It is expected that Sir William Somerville, Bart., Chief Secretary for Ireland, will be actively engaged during the recess in reference to measures for the amelioration of that part of the empire.

Joint Stock Companies Act.—An important Act of Parliament affecting joint-stock Companies, trading companies, and some other forms of partnership, has just been passed. The Act is entitled "An Act to amend the Acts for facilitating the winding up the affairs of Joint Stock Companies and also to make further provisions in relation to such Companies, and also to facilitate the dissolution and winding up of Joint Stock Companies and other partnerships. The Acts referred to by this statute (11 and 12 Vict., cap. 45), are the 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 3, the 8 and 9 Vict., cap. 98, and the 9 and 10 Vict., cap. 78. The Act is to apply to the 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 111, and to joint stock companies, and to certain building societies. On a creditor obtaining judgment or an order for payment, an application can be made to the Court of Chancery in a summary manner, where no fiat in bankruptcy has issued, and the court can order a dissolution of the company, and appoint an "official manager" to wind up the affairs, with full powers to act for the benefit of all parties. The same result to follow a declaration by a company of their insolvency. The Act contains 128 sections, with a schedule of forms; and many of the sections have reference to the power of the Court of Chancery and to the duties of "official managers," whose appointment by the Court of Bankruptcy, by the 12th section constituted Masters Extraordinary in Chancery; and matters may be referred to them in a summary manner, where no fiat in bankruptcy has issued, and to which petitions under this Act are to be referred, and they are to appoint, after hearing parties, the official managers. In all proceedings the new law is to be termed "Joint Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848."

War Medals.—The distribution of the war medals will not be retarded by the embarkation of the Board of General Officers. It will take place as soon as the examination is sufficiently advanced as the Mint to admit of a certainty to any considerable extent.

The total number of families relieved with out door relief in England and Wales during the week ending the 26th of February, 1848, was 340,247; and the number of individuals, 792,456; the cost being £65,360. 247; and the number of individuals, 792,456; the cost being £65,360. 18s. 8d. The number relieved will probably be nearly the same each week. The number relieved in the week ending 4th of February, 1843, was 121,359. A similar week in the year 1847, ending 5th of February, 1848, shows the following results:—Number of families relieved, 321,017; number of persons, 64,748; amount of relief, £47,991 7s. Number of persons relieved with in-door relief, 109,36 .

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Domestic affairs this week in Paris have had sufficient interest to occupy the public mind, almost, although not altogether, to the exclusion of the Anglo-Italian question.

The news of security created in the capital under the mild but firm administration of General Cavaignac has led the National Assembly, in the quest in which that body has taken there, as to the necessity of maintaining the siege, to pronounce by a large majority in favour of the continuance of that measure. It is straightening the hands of the only man who has had the ability and the energy to form a réunion of order out of the most chaotic elements of Revolution; and, at the same time, striking a heavy blow against the machinations of the Anarchists, who, like wreckers on the coast, thrive best amid the weakness, the sufferings, and the ruin of their fellow-men Useful legislation now takes the place of new and impracticable schemes, enacted without reflection or deliberation, and attended with the most baneful results to the prosperity of the country, and the happiness of society.

The Assembly has rejected the decree of the Provisional Government which abolishes imprisonment for debt. Some modifications will, however, be made in the existing law on that subject General Cavaignac appeared before the Committee on Legislation on Friday week, for the purpose of giving explanations respecting the journals which had been suspended. The substance of the explanation was, that he would not permit the principle of the Rep ublic to be disputed or discussed; that the question of the relative advantages of a Republic or Constitutional Monarchy was not to be examined, but the journals were to be at Liberty to attack the acts and the persons of the Government. He denied that any intention was ever entertained, or any discussion held in the Cabinet, as to the suppression of the Constitutionnel, but he maintained it a right of suppression, and declared that he suppressed certain journals entirely for the interest of the Republic, menaced at the moment it was being established. He added, that the Assembly had the power of expressing its disapprobation at any moment of any act of the Executive Government In fine, the General appealed to the members of the Committee individually, not as legislators, but as statesmen, and besought them to take into consideration the line of conduct which he was pursuing.

After trial by jury, it has been decide by the same Committee that the verdict shall be given by majority, and not by unanimity, as in England.

On Saturday, in the National Assembly, there was an animated discussion on the proposition of M. Luxchenberger, demanding that the state of siege should be raised pending the debate on the Constitution. Several members declared that, from the information they had received, they were of opinion that the debate should be postponed. M. Ledru-Rollin declared that the debate on the Constitution could not be preceded with a lifting of the state of siege. General Cavaignac declared that he considered the state of siege necessary for the public safety; but it did not make it a Cabinet question, and left the matter entirely to the Assembly. He announced it as the unanimous opinion of himself and his colleagues, that the continuance of the state of siege was necessary for the public safety; but if the Assembly, with the state of Paris under its eyes, thought that the state of siege might be d ecently ta ed, he and his colleagues were still content to conduct the Government, reserving to themselves the responsibility of any consequences which might ensue from the measures adopted by the Assembly. It was evident that the Assembly cannot unanimously concurred in this with the Government, but another division was, that the vote of last night did not imply the power of suspension of the liberty of the press? The chief of the executive and his colleagues maintained that it did, and that this power was their condition of the state of siege itself, indispensable to the maintenance of order. Ultimately the Assembly divided upon the question, and voted the continuance of the state of siege, including the power of the absolute suspension of the liberty of the press by a majority of 252 votes against 140

General Cavaignac took the opportunity to repeat the assertion of the principles on which he had acted, and on which he would continue to act, in suspending the journals. He declared that he would certainly suspend any journal which should call in question the Republican principle. All discussion in the press as to the relative advantages of a Republic and a constitutional monarchy, was forbidden under pain of suppression, but otherwise declined warfare. The speech of the chief of the Executive Power possessed eminently the merit of perspicuity—it was impossible for the dullest apprehension to mistake him.

A diplomatic rumour was given on Saturday by the President of the Assembly, at which were present General Cavaignac and Lord Normanby. The drama question being the subject of conversation, both of these personages expressed their astonishment at the reports of Frenchmen and Englishmen on the subject.

Several members of the Assembly having waited on General Cavaignac to ask him the truth of the reports current respecting the embarkation of troops at Marseilles, destined for Venice and Ancona, the General replied that no troops had yet been expedi ed, but that the French and English squadrons in the Adriatic had orders to protect Venice from any hostile enterprise on the part of Austr a

On Sunday the review which took place in Paris was favoured with most magnificent weather. General Cavaignac, accompanied by Generals Lamoricière and Changarnier, and a brilliant staff, arrived at twelve o'clock at the Champs de Mars, when the legions of the National Guard of Paris, including the artillery, the Garde Mobile, and the troops of the line, were under arms to receive them. He rode Militaire to the river The General passed before the first of each, beginning with the National Guards, who loudly cheered him with cries of Vive le General Cavaignac! Vive la garde nationale! He afterwards took his station in front of the Ecole Militaire, and the various soldiers and troops filed before him. The concourse of people was immense, and the most per fect order was observed

A regiment of Cuirassiers in garrison at Sarreguemin, and a regiment of the Line in garrison at Metz, have been ordered to join the army of the Alps.

Several batteries of artillery have also received orders to march from the northern departments to Dijon, as well as two batteries which had been placed on the war footing at Lyons.

Four battalions of the Garde Mobile were to join the same army

M. Bastide Wilhames has been appointed to command the French naval force on the coast of Africa, in place of Admiral Baudin. The French ships of war on that station are to be reduced to nine

Letters from Bastia state that the first column of Italian refugees, formed in that town, had left for Toulon. It was to be shortly followed by the second. The Government had ordered them to be organised into a legion by one of the generals commanding a brigade of the Army of the Alps. Every incorporation was to take place at Brignolles, to the amount of 3000 Italians, and the few French officers and non-commissioned officers. The moment a battalion of 1000 shall be ready, it will be immediately marched to another town. Most of the refugees at Corte arrived were young men belonging to the moveable and allions of Lombardy.

It appears from official returns that the decree issued on the 16th of March last by the Provisional Government, imposing an addition of 45 per cent on the assessed taxes, was expected to have produced a sum of 19,728,845 francs (£1,000,000), of which 90,131,777 francs (£3,800,000) have been paid, and 39,497,1s francs (£3,960,000) remain to be collected.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Monday.—At half-past eleven o'clock, M. Marrast, President, took the chair.

M. Goudchaux, Minister of Finance, deposited on the table a project of decree for authorising the immediate discussion of the chapter of direct taxes of the budget, in order to enable the Councils General to assess that tax in their respective departments

M. de Falloux next ascended the tribune, and asked why the proposition of M. Laurent de l'Ardèche, to the effect of instituting an inquiry into the machinations of political parties, had not yet been reported upon by the Committee of the Interior. He had opposed it, but the last words of the speech of the President of the Council, on Saturday, had considerably modified his ideas on the subject. The inquiry now was of opinion that the inquiry should be unanimously demanded by the Assembly. He h d imagined that all parties were dissolved since the establishment of the Republic, and that they had lost all connexion, all organization, their existence being now without object. There must be an end, said M. de Falloux, to all insinuations to the contrary—justice must be armed, or calumny disarmed.

General Cavaignac replied, that he had expressed himself in terms as clear and precise as possible, and had not, he was certain, used an expression, or formed an insinuation, that could apply to any member of the Assembly. If he had been misunderstood, he was now explained all such suspicion, for he never supported, and did not directly or indirectly asserted, that one of his colleagues could betray his duties. What he said merely referred to the press, and he had particularly in view a journal, the Gazette de France, which stated that the country would not prosper until the Republic was established below and Monarchy above. That was his enemy—the only enemy he attacked. Another writer had declared that he was ready to shed not the last drop of his blood, but the last drop of his blood, for the triumph of Monarchy He was aware that a great number of Legitimists of the most respectable class were sincerely attached to the Republic, but he also knew that many others were resolutely and incessantly labouring to overturn it

M. Falloux said he was happy to hear from the mouth of Gen. Cavaignac that his words only applied to the press

The Assembly having decided that it should devote in future four days per week, Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, to the discussion of the Constitution, adjourned for an hour

At two o'clock the sitting was resumed, and the Assembly proceeded to discuss the preamble of M. Parieu's project of decree, to the effect that the National Assembly should not dissolve itself without having previously voted the organic laws, and that a special decree, issued immediately after the promulgation of the Constitution, should fix the laws to be voted by the Constituent Assembly. That proposition had obtained the adhes on of the Constitution Committee, and M. Marrast had recommended its adoption.

M. Dahirel de Saint moved the adjournment of the proposition, which he considered inopportune, premature, and imprudent. Should the Assembly, however, be of a contrary opinion, he would ask leave to develop a proposition of his own.

After some further discussion, the question of the adjournment was put to the vote, and rejected by 552 to 180

M. Goudchaux, Minister of Finance, afterwards gave an account of the execution of the decree relative to the Lyons Railroad. It appeared from his statement that shareholders at Paris and Lyons had agreed to pay the 250 francs remaining to the amount of 500 francs per share. The Minister asked for a further delay to the 15th inst., and claimed by the Lyons shareholders, which was granted by the Assembly.

The Assembly subsequently resumed the discussion on M. Duprat's proposition

The President read the first article:—"The National Assembly shall not dissolve itself without having previously voted the organic laws."

M Kerdrel moved that the Assembly should confine itself to vote the electoral law. That motion was rejected. Amid r amendment, developed by M. Vesin, it was carried the same fate, after which the first article was voted by an immense majority

The 2nd article, providing that "a special decree, issued immediately after the vote of the Constitution, shall fix the laws to be framed by the Constituent Assembly," was adopted by the same majority

M Desloyards next proposed an additional article to the effect of postponing the elections of the Assembly until after the vote of the laws. The proposition, however, was unfavourably received by the Assembly, and when put from the chair only supported by 10 or 12 members

Le Flo'enti: We shall now proceed to the vote on the ensemble of the proposition of M Pascal Duprat, on which twenty members have demanded a division of the House.

Le Flo'enti was the result:—For the bill, 595; against it, 154; majority 432. In consequence, the bill was declared to be adopted, and the National Assembly is not to separate until it has voted the organic laws.

The discussion on the Constitution then resumed the remainder of the sitting.

The Assembly rose at a quarter past six.

Tuesday.—At half-past one o'clock M. Marrast took the chair

The President announced that the bill had been deposited in the bureaux, for the election of six Vice-Presidents and two Secretaries

M Bixio obtained 541; M. Corbon, 454; M George Lafayette, 419; M. Lacrosse, 342; M. Leon de Malleville, 304; M. Pagnerre, 263; M. Stourm, 238; and Cormenin, 237 votes

The six first having obtained the required majority, were proclaimed Vice-Presidents of the Assembly for a ensuing month

The two Secretaries were re-elected: M Landrin by 355 votes, and M. Berard by 386

After some discussion on the general subject of the Constitution, the debate opened on the preamble of the Constitution

Julien Arnaud asked, that the declaration of principles, which preceded the Constitution, in the project presented by the Committee, should only be discussed after the vote of the articles of the Constitution itself, and when the latter should have been referred to the Committee, in virtue of a decree of the Assembly

M. Dupont, member of the Constitution Committee, observed that the adjournment proposed amounted to a rejection of the preamble

After a few words from M. Dupont, the proposition was rejected

M Fayet, Bishop of Orleans; M. Coquerel, the Protestant Minister; and M Freslon, severally spoke on the subject of the preamble; and it being now six o'clock, the Chamber adjourned

Wednesday At half-past twelve o'clock M. Marrast took the chair

The Assembly resumed the adjourned discussion on the preamble of the Constitution.

M Delille combated the amendment moved on the previous day by M Parieu, who proposed to substitute for the words "in the presence of God, and in the name of the French people, the National Assembly decrees." M. Delisle maintained the indispensable utility of a preamble, being the exposé of the principles on which the Constitution of the Republic was founded

M Henry Level, who followed, proposed the substitution of this paragraph to the preamble:—"In the presence of God, and in the name of the French people, the National Assembly, considering that, by proclaiming the Republic, France has principally in view to ensure a more equitable division of the burdens and advantages of society among the citizens, and to make them, in arrive, within any new combination, by the successive and constant action of the institutions and laws, to the highest degree of morality, instruction, and welfare, decrees the following constitutional articles."

M. Crémieux advocated the necessity of a preamble, and stated that the only constitutions which had been published without such a declaration of rights and duties had been those established in a manner widely different from certain modern ones, a despotism, did not conceive in the opinion of M. Crémieux relative to the utility of a preamble.

M. Lamartine, while professing himself disposed to differ in opinion with MM. Freslon and Cazalès, and while he regretted the right of the Assembly to place a declaration of principles in front of the Constitution, he admitted the difficulty of fixing the limit of equality and liberty that must be retained in order to avoid the different systems advocated of late by the different social sects, several of them with no other view than the subversion of society itself. He then attacked the agrarian system preached by M. Proudhon, which, he simulated, would be the destruction of the land, and the ruin of the industrious. He based the doctrine of that individual, who declared property to be a robbery and denied the existence of God, on the principles of Babeuf, the revolutionist of February, which had overturned an oligarchy, and extended the political rights hitherto enjoyed by 250,0 0 persons, to the universal ty of citizens, and the day after the revolution had established the penalty of death. That was an act of supreme fraternity, which gave it a right to inscribe that principle in front of its Constitution. He had been, he said, accused of Communism, though no man was more trained with a greater passion for property, which he considered the second wish of all labour. He had travelled much, and found everywhere property to be the exact scale of the civilisation and degradation of nations. He was a partisan of the right of labour, and he understood it in a manner widely different from certain modern societies, whose doctrines amounted to the annihilation of all capital, and, consequently, of all labour. He and his colleagues, assembled at the Hôtel de Ville, thought that the proletarians, placed in exceptionable circumstances, in times of calamity, incapable to provide for a manner us fo ts, from want of labour, illness, or any other justified cause, had a right to be relieved by the Republic, in the name of the brotherhood of fraternity; and they thought so, both for the sake of the proletarians and property itself, which was defended by laws, but was still left unprotected by benefits. This was why they understood the right to labour, which the people had moreover conquered by the blood it had shed for the establishment of the Republic.

M. Besnard said that he was not converted by the eloquent words of M. Lamartine to the opinion of the partisans of the preamble, which, if he was to judge from the numerous amendments, satisfied no one. The shortest constitutions, as well as the shortest laws, were always the best, and he accordingly voted the suppression of the preamble

The division on the amendment of M. Freneau was then closed, and, upwards of 20 members having to go under a division, a ballot took place, which gave the following results:—Number of voters, 716; an absolute majority, 359 for the amendment, 223; against it, 491. The amendment was rejected.

ITALIAN STATES

PIEDMONT AND LOMBARDY.—There is no news of any interest this week Pacific assertion of the Italian question is very generally rejected among well-informed circles; but though Charles Albert may participate in that expectation, he is preparing also for the alternative of war at the close of the armistice He is said at length to admit that he is not a consummate warrior, and that he feels the necessity for the reorganisation of his fine army by officers whose competency to the task cannot be questioned. He has in consequence offered the place of Chef de l'Etat Major of his army, with the rank of Lieutenant-General, to the distinguished Polish General Chrzanowski, who, it is believed, will accept it

On the evening of the 24th ult., at half-past nine o'clock, a courier, despatched by Field-Marshal Radetzky, arrived at Trieste with an open letter of the Minister of War and Marine of his Majesty the King of Sardinia, addressed to Vice-Admiral Albini, enjoining the Excellency to raise the blockade immediately, to abandon the waters of Venice, and to order the Redmontese troops there stationed to march back to Sardinia

The Sardinian deputies were presented on the 27th to the King and the Duke of Genoa, by whom they were most graciously received. They had the honour of dining with their Majesties, who conferred on their President the Grand Cordon of the order of St Maurice and St Lazarus.

The Venice Gazette of the 29th ult. publishes an appeal made by the Provisional Government to the Venetian ladies, urging them to relieve the sufferings of the poor, by affording them bedding, clothes, &c.

The columns of General Garibaldi, after having had several encounters with the enemy, and being reduced to a state of complete destitution, had dissolved itself, and retired into Tirano. Garibaldi arrived at Agno by the lake. Another Italian chief, Colonel Aylos, had entered the Canton of Grisons.

The Milan Gazette of the 28th ult. publishes a proclamation issued by Marshal Prince Schwarzenberg, the military governor of that city. The Prince commands that all natives of Lombardy residing in Milan, except those born there, shall, within eight days, procure a certificate of the birth from the district to which they belong. The masters of furnished hotels are called on to make a return to the authorities of all persons residing in their houses

On the 1st inst. a decree of Radetzky's named Marsha. Wimpfen to the post of Military Governor of Milan, in lieu of Prince Schwarzenberg

Letters from Turin of the 2nd inst. state that the Austrians still retained the material of war which the Piedmontese had left at Peschiera, in violation of the express stipulations of the armistice of the 9th of August. The Austrians, on the other hand, insisted on the evacuation of Osopo, a small fortress of the province of Udine, which was totally independent of Piedmont. The Sardinian Cabinet was resolved that it could not exercise no control over the garrison. Marshal Radetzky continued to make it a pretext for not executing the clause of the armistice respecting Peschiera

Tuscany.—The latest accounts from Leghorn state that the disturbances which had taken place in that city had ceased. The Ducal troops had entered and fraternised with the National Guard and the people

ROME.—The Italienne of Bologna announces that the Roman Ministry would remain in office until the 5th inst., the day on which the Chambers were to be prorogued until November next. It was believed that a more moderate Cabinet would then be formed

NAPLES AND SICILY.—Intelligence of Malta to the 28th ult. states that the British fleet was still at Naples on the 21st, and that the French squadron was at Palermo on the 23rd.

SPAIN

From Madrid, under date of the 29th ult., we learn that the Minister of the Interior, the Chargés d'Affaires of Portugal, Holland, Brazil, and Chili, and the Duke de Glucksberg, had arrived at Seville, to assist at the accouchement of the Duchess de Montpensier.

The Bank of San Fernando had received upwards of six millions of reals in bullion within the two preceding days. It was said that M Mon had already obtained 60 or 70 millions of reals from capitalists, and that he expected to command 100 millions in the beginning of September, when he would commence to carry his financial plan into execution

The Captain General of Valencia had left that city at the head of a column of troops, in pursuit of a Carlist band which had appeared in the Maestrazgo.

On the 1st instant, a Royal decree calling out 25,000 men of the levy of the year 1847, for six years, was published

Queen Christina, the Duke de Riansares, and their children, had returned from La Granja. Father Cyril, Archbishop of Cuba, former favourite of Ferdinand VII., and Don Carlos, have arrived at Rome. The Heraldo announces that Count de Vista Hermosa had resigned the post of Political Chief of Madrid, and would be replaced by the Marquis de Pensafiorida.

AUSTRIA.

There is no intelligence of any specific interest this week from Vienna. According to the Cologne papers, Communism, repulsed by the good feeling and the sound sense of the German nation, has found an asylum in Vienna, where its doctrines are more or less openly avowed by part of the press, and by a considerable fraction of the population

BELGIUM

The Belgian workmen who left Paris to revolutionise their native country, shortly after the French Revolution of February, and who were captured at the little affair of Risquons-Tout, have been lately tried before a commission at Antwerp, which finished its labours on the 30th ult. Seventeen of the wretched men were sentenced to death, fifteen others were acquitted.

RUSSIA

The following letter has been addressed to Field-Marshal Radetzky by the Czar of all the Russias

After carefully watching the movements of the troops confided to your command, for the maintenance of the legitimate rights of your Monarch, as I have been informed of the splendid exploits which you gained at Somma-Campagna and Custoza, we have thought it just to send to you a Knight of the First Class of the Order of the Holy Grand-Martyr and Victorious George—George, the 5 agrafs of which we send you with this letter. Granting you, by this, the highest military decoration in our empire, a fresh proof of our eminent recognition of your long and glorious services

We remain for ever most graciously disposed towards you

Peterhof, August 19 NICOLAS.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN

The armistice for seven months between the belligerent powers has been ratified by the respective plenipotentiaries.

TURKEY

Accounts from Constantinople announce the occurrence of a dreadful fire in that capital, which destroyed property to the amount of £500,000 sterling.

UNITED STATES

Advices to the 22nd ult. have been received this week from New York The most important news by this arrival is that of a destructive fire which occurred at the city of Lowell, the capital of the State of New Hark, on the 17th of August. Most of the commercial portion of the city, with fifteen or twenty densely populated streets and squares, was in five hours reduced to ruins. From Herkimer street, where the fire broke out, to Columbia-street, where it was arrested, the distance was more than half a mile. The ruins covered an area of 200 acres, every foot of which was densely covered with buildings; there were more houses upon it than upon any equal space in the city. Four-fifths of the buildings burnt were brick, most of them large and substantial structures; many of them three and four stories high.

The latest accounts from the scene of the calamity represent that 439 valuable houses were destroyed; besides which 11 tow-boats, between 40 and 50 canal boats, 1 schooner, and 2 boats, were burnt o the water; and the burning wrecks of these vessels floating against the Columbia-street-bridge, set it on fire, whence the conflagration was communicated to the Columbia-street-market. A large quantity of produce, flour, &c., in warehouse, was likewise consumed

It was estimated that upwards of 20 lives were lost, but it was impossible to ascertain the number with any degree of certainty. The destruction of property amounted in the aggregate to more than 3,000,000 dollars, say £600,000 sterling.

Politically there was nothing new. Efforts were making by certain parties to create excitement on the Irish question, but the matter was regarded with indifference by the public generally; and the degree of interest manifested by the few Americans who took any part in the various meetings might be accounted for by the fact that the general election was at hand, and Irish votes were wanted

MEXICO.

According to the latest accounts, Parades was still at large, but concealed from the Government forces, which were in search of him. Some of his confederates had been captured Another pronunciamento had taken place, and a revolution planned at Matamoras, by Don Placenza Miranda, had been discovered. The exact object of this new revolution was not known; but it was thought to have been promised by a desire to obtain 1,000,000 dollars in case expected to arrive at Matamoras. The Central Government had ordered forward a strong body of troops to suppress the revolt.

In Yucatan, the whites had defeated the Indians in numerous engagements and recovered most of the towns

WEST INDIES

Advices have been received this week by the Tay steamer.

The Tay brings on freight 60,144 silver dollars, 69,632 gold dollars, 83,578 dollars gold dust, 81,468 dollars gold in bars and melted, 2000 dollars of panama, £9596 4s. 2d. British coin, 393,178 dollars in bars and melted silver, 2860 doz. in French coin, 56.0 dollars in pearls, 103,429 dollars in plate pura, 10 Dutch pounds and 73 rupees; and a general cargo, consisting of 15 barrels of coffee, 172 bags of coffee, 1 case of cigars, 25 bales of sarsaparilla, 13 cases of cascades, and 35 packages sundries

Refugees from Hayti continued to arrive in considerable numbers at Jamaica, up to the 7th ult., when the Tay left; and it was reported that illegal and causeless executions of coloured men were frequent

The Jamaica House of Assembly met on the 3rd of August. The Governor in his opening speech reminded the Legislature that they had been called together in consequence of addresses from several public meetings, and also in consequence of the commissioners of public accounts having declined to issue the treasury certificates, which, from the estimates laid before the Assembly in the preceding session, were known to be necessary to make the ways and means of the year commensurate with the authorised expenditure. He addressed an antic patory remonstrance to the House of Assembly against voting expenditure and withholding the means

The Planters' Bank had failed, it was hoped only temporarily Shortly after the arrival of the post in Kingston on the morning of Saturday July 22, it was reported that one of the agents of this bank on the south side of the island had decamped with about £12,000; a run upon it for specie began, which the cashier met till the usual hour of closing On Monday the bank was re-opened, but the run continuing, it was soon found prudent to suspend payment, at least for a week. The other banks stood aloof On the 27th of July an intimation signed by a large number of respectable merchants and others was published in the Kingston papers, stating their willingness to receive the notes of the Planters' Bank "as heretofore, in way of its issue, well knowing as we do that the bank must and will redeem them to the last shilling" On the 7th of August, however, ten firms and individuals had issued this intimation, advertised that, "from the difficulty experienced in passing Planters' Bank notes," they withdrew their names, and would "henceforth only receive them at their option."

Dry weather was setting much needed in some districts of the island The 12th of August had passed off in perfect tranquillity, and the apprehensions which had been entertained respecting the temper of the black peasantry were rapidly giving way

At St. Thomas all was quiet.

GUARD OF HONOUR AT BALMORAL.—A detachment of the 93rd Highlanders, consisting of 100 men, under the command of Captain Leith Hay, have proceeded according to orders to Balmoral, on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to the Highlands.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The marriage of Lady Jane Fitzgerald, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Leinster, with Mr Repton, M.P., took place on Tuesday morning, at the parish church of St. Martin's-in-the-fields, in the presence of a large and distinguished circle

A vessel has just arrived from Callao, having on board 1300 tons weight of guano. This is the largest importation of this article for manuring purposes which has taken place for a very considerable time past. The same vessel brought 430 bales of tobacco, which would appear to be a rather unusual and remarkable importation from the southern part of the globe.

The Admiral arrived from Rotterdam during the week with an entire cargo of flowers, upwards of 2300 parcels, being the largest importation at one time that has yet occurred

On Sunday, according to previous arrangement, one hundred and fifty surgeons and chemists, residing in that district of the metropolis between Bishopsgate-street and Hackney, closed their shops from eleven in the morning till six in the evening, and no cases except of urgent necessity were attended to during that interval.

By an Act of Parliament which has recently come into operation (11th and 12th Vict., c. 46), provision is made that accessories before the fact to any felony may be punished in the same degree as the principal; and with regard to accessories after the fact, they may be tried along with the principal felon, or tried whether the principal felon has or has not been previously convicted, or whether he is amenable to justice, and may be punished as such accessory, notwithstanding the non-conviction of the principal felon.

A company is projected for establishing the omnibus system in Dublin, where, owing to some imperfections in the Police Acts, now at length remedied, the omnibus has been hitherto a prohibited article.

An enormous fresh-water trout, taken in Lough Neagh (Ireland), and weighing 22lb., was exhibited in the Exchange News Room, Liverpool, a day or two ago, and attracted much attention from the admirers of piscatorial wonders

A site near Birmingham has been given by Mr. Adderley, M.P., to the Committee of Council of Education, for the purpose of erecting a training institution on a large scale for the whole of that diocese. The building is to be commenced without delay, £3000 having been raised towards the first outlay, and £400 a year towards the annual expenses of the institution. The Board contemplate the establishment of a large middle school, in connexion with this institution, on the same plan as the school at York.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRANCE.—THE SALLE DES PAS PERDUS.

THE SALLE DES PAS PERDUS.

THIS spacious saloon of the Palace of the National Assembly, at Paris, usually presents, during the sittings, a very interesting scene. Here the Representatives are seen by their solicitors, the journalists, &c., on their way to the House; and upon one of these occasions our Artist has sketched the large apartment. It boasts of considerable architectural importance; and the groups of sculpture upon the floor (the largest one that of Pætus and Arria, with the celebrated motto, "Pæte, non dolet"), and the sculptural decoration of the coved ceiling give the place a classic air, independent of its interest as an official endeavours.

Our Artist at Paris assures us that the present is the only representation given of this apartment. Before the Revolution it was forbidden to be sketched, and no one would dare to smuggle the subject against orders.

The name (Salle des Pas Perdus, literal y, Saloon of the Lost Steps) is gene [illegible] ance to the large ante-room that opens into courts of justice, [illegible] edifices, where solicitors and clients wait for judges and barristers; or, in palaces, suitors watch the egress of Ministers and men in office. To the salle at the Palace of the Assembly flock the Representatives, as soon as they can escape from the reserve of the House; here they converse and debate with greater freedom; and the discussion becomes more interesting, as journalists and strangers join in it. Some ladies, too, may occasionally be seen among the visitors. In the middle group of the accompanying Illustration we see General [illegible]ac in private dress, such as he generally wears when he presides over the Assembly. He carries his portfolio under his arm, and on his way to the House is conversing with his colleagues in office.

Some time ago, smoking was forbidden here; and one of the malignant chroniclers of Paris [illegible] endeavoured to make his readers believe that certain members of the late Provisional Government might be seen here in society by no means immaculate, [illegible] their "Havannahs," and occasionally strolling beneath the trees of the adjoining garden. However, the story was too strong for the credulity of the Parisians: as to the cigar, it is no longer tolerated. Neither is the place so picturesque as when the students of the School of St. Cyr used to bivouac in it, with the National Guards, Artillerymen, &c. It is, however, still a good school for the physiognomist, who may here study the head and front of the statesmen that pass before his eyes in the course of the day; and, in an adjoining room, the Daguerréotype is employed to reproduce their characteristics.

CAUSSIDIERE.

AMONG the Revolutionary notabilities whom the overthrow of the French Monarchy, in February last, brought conspicuously before the eyes of Europe, one of the most remarkable is Marc Caussidière, the ex-Prefect of Police under the Provisional Government: not that he is a man who bears the impress of genius on his brow, like some of his colleagues, or who is even gifted with a high order of talent; but that he is the type of a class, whose turbulence, conspiracies, personal daring, recklessness, ignorance, and wrong-headedness have made them a noted, hated, and dreaded body—the horror and antipathy of all regular Governments, whether Monarchical or Republican—the leaders of the Communist workmen and partisans of the Red Republic.

Caussidière, the beau idéal of this dangerous class, was born at Lyons in 1809. His parents, at the time of his birth, were plunged in the most abject poverty, from which Marc, with all his plotting, has seldom been able to escape.

He took part in all the insurrectionary movements, whether at Lyons or other places, which have occurred since the Revolution of 1830, and his well-known [illegible] in this respect, coupled with certain personal qualities, made him a great favourite with the ouvriers Républicains; for he was a good-natured, kind-hearted, jovial fellow—ever ready for a debauch or a row—free with his money [illegible] happened to have any—sticking close to his friends in bad fortune as [illegible]—always willing to be the foremost in any danger—always steady in his detestation of the 'infâme' Louis Philippe, and in his devotedness to ultra Republicanism.

In the plotting and preparations which preceded the frightful insurrection of 1834 Caussidière took an active part, but he did not happen to be at Lyons when the revolt broke out. No sooner, however, did he hear of it than he endeavoured to support it by exciting an insurrection at St. Etienne, where he then was. He did effect a partial rising of the mob, and even got so far as to build barricades and begin firing; but he and the other [illegible]olanders were overmatched by the police and soldiery, were captured, and I digné in gaol. In the struggle which preceded the arrest Caussidière came into personal collision with a police agent, and it was alleged that he slew him by stabbing him in the back. On his trial, however, along with the other insurgents before the Chamber of Peers, he was acquitted of the charge of murder, but was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment, on the charge of conspiracy and insurrection. He was ultimately released from confinement, in consequence of a general decree of amnesty, and once more betook himself to his old trade of conspirator, at which the Revolution of February found him busy as ever.

MARC CAUSSIDIÈRE.

His means of living at the time is said to have been derived from a salary which he had from the Réforme newspaper, for travelling through the provinces to push the circulation of that journal. Into the revolution of February he plunged with all the ardour of gratified hopes long deferred; and on the [illegible]amation of the Provisional Government he had address enough to get himself [illegible]stalled in the Prefecture of Police. But even in this responsible [illegible] his plotting spirit was not laid aside, and for the part which he took in promoting the insurrectionary demonstration on the 15th of May against the [illegible] he was a [illegible]

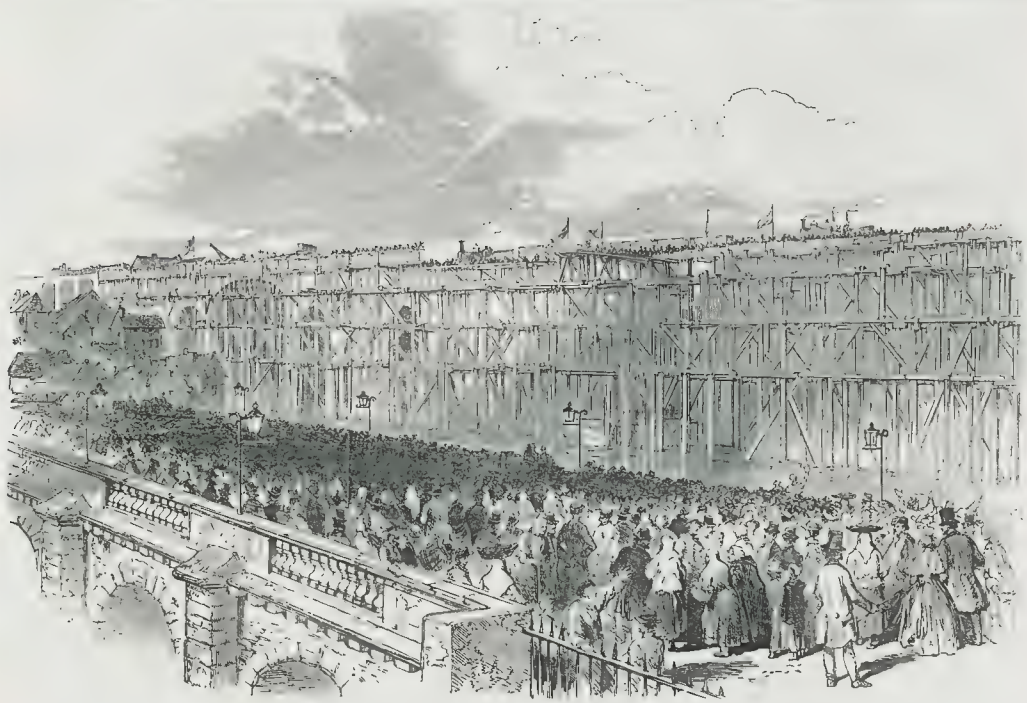
Caussidière is a man of gigantic stature and strength, with a little head, who speaks generally in argot, or French slang, interminged with an abundance o oaths and sacres

His whereabouts since his disappearance from the National Assembly has not yet been ascertained. Many are of opinion that he has not left Paris but lies there in secret in some of his old haunts, waiting for better times.

M. LOUIS BLANC has addressed the following communication to the morning papers:—"MONSIEUR, Seriez-vous assez bon pour insérer la note ci-inclose? Je vous en serais reconnaissant. Agréez, Monsieur, je vous prie, l'assurance de mes sentiments dévoués. Londres, Septembre 2. LOUIS BLANC. Plusieurs personnes, qui partagent en Angleterre les opinions de M. Louis Blanc, paraissant disposées à lui donner un témoignage public de sympathie, M. Louis Blanc les prie de recevoir l'expression de sa profonde gratitude; mais, en même temps, il croit devoir leur faire connaître son intention d'éviter tout ce qui serait de nature à porter ombrage au Gouvernement Anglais. C'est dans le calme de l'étude et le silence de la retraite que M. Louis Blanc a résolu d'attendre que des jours meilleurs se lèvent pour son pays; et il serait désolé que l'appel fait par lui à l'hospitalité Anglaise devînt une cause, même passagère, d'agitation."

THE MOTHER OF CAVAIGNAC.—General Cavaignac, who, by one of those sudden changes so common in history, has become the hero of the day, is the son of an old member of the Convention, who died in exile. His Republican baptism, therefore, dates very far back. His moderate, but firm opinions, were not calculated to render him acceptable to a Monarchical Government. Consequently he was forced to win his rank step by step at the point of the sword and with the assistance of his courage in Algiers. His manners are very striking, and would render him a marked man anywhere. He speaks with emphasis and accent, and his voice is clear and distinct. His countenance is highly expressive of frankness and candour. There is one trait in his character which is exceedingly interesting. It is that, iron soldier as he is, he entertains for his mother, who is still alive, an almost infantine affection, and obeys her as implicitly as though he were still a child. She is a woman who, notwithstanding seventy-three years have passed over her head, possesses all her faculties unimpaired by age, and still preserves the indomitable resolution which distinguished her in her younger days. True as a Roman matron to the faith of her youth, she may be said to have swaddled her children in the flag of the Republic, under the folds of which her husband died.—Paris paper.

SALE OF THE DIORAMA.—On Tuesday this well-known place of amusement was brought to the hammer by Mr. Lolkhild, at Garraway's. The sale was attended by a large company. The property consisted of the buildings of the Diorama, which were stated to have cost upwards of £10,000, held for the unexpired term of the lease for 74 years; the powerful and costly machinery; the two pictures by M. Diosse now exhibiting, "The Interior of St. Mark's Church, Venice," and "Mount Ætna;" the thirteen large pictures which have been exhibited in former years, and the building ground in the rear of the premises. The property was put up at £8500, and after a spirited competition, was knocked down at £6750.



OPENING OF THE HIGH LEVEL RAILWAY BRIDGE, AT NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

THE POTATO DISEASE.

At the meeting of the Botanical Society of London, held on the 1st instant, J. E. Grey, Esq., F.R.S., President, in the chair, Dr. John Parkin read a paper on the potato disease. The writer commenced by stating that, although it was too late to adopt the measures recommended by him in the work "On the Prevention and Treatment of the Potato Disease," there was yet time for the adoption of those which he had advised for arresting its progress after it had commenced, either in the haulm or the root. These measures, in addition to the employment of chalk and sulphuric acid, and the burning of stubble, which Dr. Parkin recommends in all cases when these agents can be easily obtained, and the crop is small, consist either in cutting off the haulm, pulling up the stem, or raising the roots with a fork, according as the disease exists in the one or the other of these parts of the plant. It was stated by Dr. Parkin that sometimes the disease commences in the haulm, sometimes in the root, the root proper, but more generally in the underground stem. The modus operandi of these measures was explained by Dr. Parkin, and this part of the subject has been fully treated in his work. Dr Parkin further advised that the tubers should be left in the ground until required for use, as no doubt, he said, could exist, that exposure to the air hastened the process of decay after it had attacked the tubers. The writer concluded by stating it to be his intention to favour the Society on a future occasion with additional evidence which he had obtained, not only with respect to the efficacy of these measures, but of those, also, which he has recommended for the prevention of the disease.

OPENING OF THE HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE, BETWEEN NEWCASTLE AND GATESHEAD.

In our Journal for May, 1847, we illustrated this great work of railway construction, from a picture cleverly painted by Mr. Carmichael, in commemoration of so interesting an event in the annals of our scientific age.

The bridge, as our readers may recollect, forms the important junction between the York and Newcastle, and the Newcastle and Berwick Railways; and on Tuesday week (August 29) the vast structure was opened for the conveyance of goods and passengers across the River Tyne. This will long be a memorable day in the records of science and enterprise. Not many years ago, the act of an individual seriously entertaining the thought of throwing such a bridge over the Tyne, stripped of the marvellous adjunct of the said bridge being crossed by a locomotive engine weighing sixteen tons, and drawing nine carriages heavily laden with passengers, was alone sufficient to suggest the idea that it was time his friends were looking after him.

The weather was fine for the opening ceremony. At two o'clock Mr. G. Hudson, M.P., the Chairman of the York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Company, arrived at Gateshead; he was accompanied by his son, Mr. George Hudson, jun., Mr. T. E. Harrison, Mr. N. Wood, Mr. R. Spoor, Mr. J. J. Wright, &c. They were met at the station by the Mayor of Newcastle (Mr. S. Lowrey), the Mayor of Gateshead (Mr. J. Potts), and a great number of the Aldermen and Councillors of those respective Corporations, besides many others of the gentry of Newcastle, Gateshead, North and South Shields, Sunderland, and other places in the district. A train, consisting of nine carriages and a luggage van, and preceded by a powerful engine, was speedily filled by the party assembled at the station. One of the compartments of a first-class carriage was occupied by a party of ladies. Another carriage was occupied by the band of Messrs. Hawks and Crawshay.

At half-past two o'clock the train started, and, upon entering the bridge, was greeted with a loud discharge of artillery from the Castle and various other places. The bells of St. Nicholas then commenced a merry peal, and the most deafening cheers were given by the congregated thousands on every side, as the train smoothly and quietly, at a moderately quick pace, and without the slightest interruption or accident, glided from Durham to Northumberland.

The train, in traversing every portion of the immense viaduct on the north side, both westward and eastward, afforded the passengers a view of the ancient town of Newcastle at once novel and extensive. In a very few minutes the train arrived in safety at the Manors Station of the North Shields Railway, where Mr. Hudson and his friends alighted, and proceeded to the Queen's Head, where a sumptuous entertainment had been provided for them by the Mayor of Newcastle.

Upwards of 70 gentlemen sat down to luncheon, the Mayor presiding; the vice chair was filled by the Sheriff, Captain Wentworth.

His worship, after luncheon, proposed "The health of the Queen," which was drunk with the greatest enthusiasm.

The Mayor next proposed "Success to the York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Company, with the health of Mr. G. Hudson and his staff" (Loud cheers.) Introducing this toast, his Worship paid a just tribute to Mr. Hudson's enterprise and able conduct in managing the pecuniary affairs of the companies over which he presided, which had enabled him to accomplish this great engineering work. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Hudson, who, on rising, was received with reiterated cheers, after thanking the Mayor and the company for the compliment, observed, "although the occasion was one which gave him great pleasure, he could not forget that his late friend, and who was once the near neighbour of those he addressed, was no more. (Hear, hear.) He could not but regret that they were deprived of the smiles and congratulations by which the event would have been hailed by that distinguished individual, whose wisdom had carried him to the highest point of reputation for engineering excellence. He alluded to his late friend, Mr. George Stephenson, who was the originator of this undertaking. (Cheers.) But, although they might repine and feel distress at that melancholy event, yet he was sure the projector of this undertaking would live, not only in the recollection of parties who knew him personally, but of generations yet to come; he would be regarded as one of the greatest benefactors of his species."

Mr Hudson then adverted to the pleasing fact, that in passing upwards of two hundred properties, having upwards of two hundred parties to deal with, in only three or four instances were the terms disputed—a fact which spoke as much for the honour and integrity of the inhabitants of Newcastle and the district, as any event that could be recorded; and it was also honourable to the railway company. (Applause.) Mr. Hudson added, that it was to his friend, Mr. Stephenson, and his colleague, Mr. Harrison, that he was chiefly indebted for the efficiency with which his undertakings had been executed. (Cheers.)

Mr. Harrison, and Mr. Allport, the Manager of the York and Newcastle Railway, then briefly addressed the company.

Mr. Hudson then gave "The health of the Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle," and the Mayor gave "The health of the contractors, Messrs. Rush and Lawton, and Messrs. Hawks and Crawshay;" and next, "The health of Mr. Robert Stephenson."

Mr. Hudson, in the absence of Mr. Stephenson, acknowledged the toast. He said, those who knew Mr. Stephenson well, could testify that no individual ever deserved better the compliment which had just been paid to him, for a more high-minded and honourable man, and one more deserving of respect, did not exist anywhere. (Applause.) His friends around him knew that, on behalf of the railway companies over which he presided, in the months of October and September, about £400,000 had to be repaid to the Bank of England, which had been borrowed of that establishment. He had been able to fulfil that engagement, besides carrying on the works. (Applause.) He believed there was an elasticity in the English character that could surmount all difficulties. Works had been executed which would have appalled any but Englishmen, and which could not have been executed by any other private companies in the world. (Applause.) Nothing surprised foreigners more than to see works of such magnitude executed entirely by private companies, and however bad the legislation might be, there was an elasticity in the country which would baffle it all. (Applause.) So long as the same indomitable and enterprising spirit existed amongst our commercial men, we could not fail to have prosperity. He concluded by proposing the health of the artisans and labourers who had been employed in constructing the High Level Bridge. (Great applause.)

Some other toasts were then drunk. Mr. N. Wood, in returning thanks for "The Coal Trade," which was proposed by the Mayor, observed, that to the coal trade alone the new communication by the High Level Bridge would be of immense importance. In one concern with which he was connected they had, yesterday, about 30 horses employed in carting coke, the produce of coal, across the Tyne. This day that labour and expense had been superseded. When he considered the saving which would be effected in this one item alone, he felt that, sanguine as he was, he could not anticipate the extent to which the High Level Bridge might be advantageously used.

The numerous workmen employed on the works at the High Level Bridge, to the number of 1100, were liberally entertained by the contractors, Messrs. Rush and Lawton. The cost of the entertainment was £300, of which sum Mr. Hudson had subscribed £50.

As we have already detailed this vast structure, we need but refer the reader to our Journal of May 1, 1847. In the first of the present Illustrations our Artist has shown the triumph of the opening day; and in the second Engraving is seen a magnificent arch, of 80 feet span, which carries the line, and spans Dean-street; the height from the surface to the level of the rails being also 80 feet, and there being three arches of 25 feet span on each side of the main arch.
